P R E F A C E.

IT is the fate of those who toil at the lower employments of life, to be rather driven by the fear of evil, than attracted by the prospect of good; to be exposed to censure, without hope of praise; to be disgraced by miscarriage, or punished for neglect, where success would have been without applause, and diligence without reward.

Among these unhappy mortals is the writer of dictionaries; whom mankind have considered, not as the pupil, but the slave of science, the pioneer of literature, doomed only to remove rubbish and clear obstructions from the paths through which Learning and Genius press forward to conquest and glory, without bestowing a smile on the humble drudge that facilitates their progress. Every other authour may aspire to praise; the lexicographer can only hope to escape reproach, and even this negative recompense has been yet granted to very few.

I have, notwithstanding this discouragement, attempted a Dictionary of the English language, which, while it was employed in the cultivation of every species of literature, has itself been hitherto neglected; suffered to spread, under the direction of chance, into wild exuberance; resigned to the tyranny of time and fashion; and exposed to the corruptions of ignorance, and caprices of innovation.

When I took the first survey of my undertaking, I found our speech copious without order, and energetic without rules: wherever I turned my view, there was perplexity to be disentangled, and confusion to be regulated; choice was to be made out of boundless variety, without any established principle of selection; adulterations were to be detected, without a settled test of purity; and modes of expression to be rejected or received, without the suffrages of any writers of classical reputation or acknowledged authority.

Having therefore no assistance but from general grammar, I applied myself to the perusal of our writers; and noting whatever might be of use to ascertain or illustrate any word or phrase, accumulated in time the materials of a dictionary, which, by degrees, I reduced to method, establishing to myself, in the progress of the work, such rules as experience and analogy suggested to me; experience, which practice and observation were continually increasing; and analogy, which, though in some words obscure, was evident in others.

In adjusting the ORTHOGRAPHY, which has been to this time unsettled and fortuitous, I found it necessary to distinguish those irregularities that are inherent in our tongue, and perhaps coeval with it, from others which the ignorance or negligence of later writers has produced. Every language has its anomalies, which, though inconvenient, and in themselves once unnecessary, must be tolerated among the imperfections of human things, and which require only to be registered, that they may not be increased, and ascertained, that they may not be confounded: but every language has likewise its improprieties and absurdities, which it is the duty of the lexicographer to correct or proscribe.

As language was at its beginning merely oral, all words of necessary or common use were spoken before they were written; and while they were unfixed by any visible signs, must have been spoken with great diversity, as we now observe those who cannot read to catch sounds imperfectly, and utter them negligently. When this wild and barbarous jargon was first reduced to an alphabet, every penman endeavoured to express, as he could, the sounds which he was accustomed to pronounce or to receive, and vitiated in writing such words as were already vitiated in speech. The powers of the letters, when they were applied to a new language, must have been vague and unsettled, and therefore different hands would exhibit the same sound by different combinations.

From this uncertain pronunciation arise in a great part the various dialects of the same country, which will always be observed to grow fewer, and less different, as books are multiplied; and from this arbitrary representation of sounds by letters, proceeds that diversity of spelling observable in the Saxon remains, and I suppose in the first books of every nation, which perplexes or destroys analogy, and produces anomalous formations, that, being once incorporated, can never be afterwards dismissed or reformed.

Of this kind are the derivatives length from long, strength from strong, darling from dear, breadth from broad, from dry, drought, and from high, height, which Milton, in zeal for analogy, writes hight; Quid te exempta juvat spinis de pluribus una; to change all would be too much, and to change one is nothing.

This

P R E F A C E.

This uncertainty is most frequent in the vowels, which are so capriciously pronounced, and so differently modified, by accident or affectation, not only in every province, but in every mouth, that to them, as is well known to etymologists, little regard is to be shown in the deduction of one language from another.

Such defects are not errors in orthography, but spots of barbarity impressed so deep in the English language, that criticism can never wash them away: these, therefore, must be permitted to remain untouched; but many words have likewise been altered by accident, or depraved by ignorance, as the pronunciation of the vulgar has been weakly followed; and some still continue to be variously written, as authours differ in their care or skill: of these it was proper to inquire the true orthography, which I have always considered as depending on their derivation, and have therefore referred them to their original languages: thus I write enchant, enchantment, enchanter, after the French, and incantation after the Latin; thus entire is chosen rather than intire, because it passed to us not from the Latin integer, but from the French entier.

Of many words it is difficult to say whether they were immediately received from the Latin or the French, since at the time when we had dominions in France, we had Latin service in our churches. It is, however, my opinion, that the French generally supplied us; for we have few Latin words, among the terms of domestick use, which are not French; but many French, which are very remote from Latin.

Even in words of which the derivation is apparent, I have been often obliged to sacrifice uniformity to custom; thus I write, in compliance with a numberless majority, convey and inveigh, deceit and receipt, fancy and phantom; sometimes the derivative varies from the primitive, as explain and explanation, repeat and repetition.

Some combinations of letters having the same power, are used indifferently without any discoverable reason of choice, as in choak, choke; soap, sope; fewel, fuel, and many others; which I have sometimes inserted twice, that those who search for them under either form, may not search in vain.

In examining the Orthography of any doubtful word, the mode of spelling by which it is inserted in the series of the dictionary, is to be considered as that to which I give, perhaps not often rashly, the preference. I have left, in the examples, to every authour his own practice unmolested, that the reader may balance suffrages, and judge between us: but this question is not always to be determined by reputed or by real learning; some men, intent upon greater things, have thought little on sounds and derivations; some, knowing in the ancient tongues, have neglected those in which our words are commonly to be sought. Thus Hammond writes fecibleness for feasibleness, because I suppose he imagined it derived immediately from the Latin; and some words, such as dependant, dependent; dependance, dependence, vary their final syllable, as one or another language is present to the writer.

In this part of the work, where caprice has long wanted without controul, and vanity sought praise by petty reformation, I have endeavoured to proceed with a scholar's reverence for antiquity, and a grammarian's regard to the genius of our tongue. I have attempted few alterations, and among those few, perhaps, the greater part is from the modern to the ancient practice; and I hope I may be allowed to recommend to those, whose thoughts have been perhaps employed too anxiously on verbal singularities, not to disturb, upon narrow views, or for minute propriety, the orthography of their fathers. It has been asserted, that for the law to be known, is of more importance than to be right. Change, says Hooker, is not made without inconvenience, even from worse to better. There is in constancy and stability a general and lasting advantage, which will always overbalance the slow improvements of gradual correction. Much less ought our written language to comply with the corruptions of oral utterance, or copy that which every variation of time or place makes different from itself, and imitate those changes, which will again be changed, while imitation is employed in observing them.

This recommendation of steadiness and uniformity does not proceed from an opinion, that particular combinations of letters have much influence on human happiness; or that truth may not be successfully taught by modes of spelling fanciful and erroneous: I am not yet so lost in lexicography, as to forget that words are the daughters of earth, and that things are the sons of heaven. Language is only the instrument of science, and words are but the signs of ideas: I wish, however, that the instrument might be less apt to decay, and that signs might be permanent, like the things which they denote.

In settling the orthography, I have not wholly neglected the pronunciation, which I have directed, by printing an accent upon the acute or elevated syllable. It will sometimes be found, that the accent is placed by the authour quoted, on a different syllable from that marked in the alphabetical series; it is then to be understood, that custom has varied, or that the authour has, in my opinion, pronounced wrong. Short directions are sometimes given where the sound of letters is irregular; and if they are sometimes omitted, defect in such minute observations will be more easily excused, than superfluity.

In the investigation both of the orthography and signification of words, their ETYMOLOGY was necessarily to be considered, and they were therefore to be divided into primitives and derivatives. A primitive word, is that which which can be traced no further to any English root; thus circumspect, circumvent, circumstance, delude, conceal, and complicate, though compounds in the Latin, are to us primitives. Derivatives are all those that can be referred to any word in English of greater simplicity.

The derivatives I have referred to their primitives, with an accuracy sometimes needless; for who does not see that remoteness comes from remote, lovely from love, concavity from concave, and demonstrative from demonstrate? but this grammatical exuberance the scheme of my work did not allow me to repress. It is of great importance in examining the general fabrick of a language, to trace one word from another, by noting the usual modes of derivation and inflection; and uniformity must be preserved in systematical works, though sometimes at the expence of particular propriety.

Among other derivatives I have been careful to insert and elucidate the anomalous plurals of nouns and preterites of verbs, which in the Teutonic dialects are very frequent, and though familiar to those who have always used them, interrupt and embarrass the learners of our language.

The two languages from which our primitives have been derived are the Roman and Teutonic: under the Roman I comprehend the French and provincial tongues; and under the Teutonic range the Saxon, German, and all their kindred dialects. Most of our polysyllables are Roman, and our words of one syllable are very often Teutonic.

In assigning the Roman original, it has perhaps sometimes happened that I have mentioned only the Latin, when the word was borrowed from the French; and considering myself as employed only in the illustration of my own language, I have not been very careful to observe whether the Latin word be pure or barbarous, or the French elegant or obsolete.

For the Teutonic etymologies I am commonly indebted to Junius and Skinner, the only names which I have forbore to quote when I copied their books; not that I might appropriate their labours or usurp their honours, but that I might spare a general repetition by one general acknowledgment. Of these, whom I ought not to mention but with the reverence due to instructors and benefactors, Junius appears to have excelled in extent of learning, and Skinner in rectitude of understanding. Junius was accurately skilled in all the northern languages, Skinner probably examined the ancient and remoter dialects only by occasional inspection into dictionaries; but the learning of Junius is often of no other use than to show him a track by which he may deviate from his purpose, to which Skinner always presses forward by the shortest way. Skinner is often ignorant, but never ridiculous: Junius is always full of knowledge; but his variety distracts his judgment, and his learning is very frequently disgraced by his absurdities.

The votaries of the northern muses will not perhaps easily restrain their indignation, when they find the name of Junius thus degraded by a disadvantageous comparison; but whatever reverence is due to his diligence, or his attainments, it can be no criminal degree of censoriousness to charge that etymologist with want of judgment, who can seriously derive dream from drama, because life is a drama, and a drama is a dream; and who declares with a tone of defiance, that no man can fail to derive moan from μῶνος, monos, single, or solitary, who considers that grief naturally loves to be alone *.

Our knowledge of the northern literature is so scanty, that of words undoubtedly Teutonic, the original is not always to be found in any ancient language; and I have therefore inserted Dutch or German substitutes, which I consider not as a radical but parallel, not as the parents, but sisters of the English.

The words which are represented as thus related by descent or cognation, do not always agree in sense; for it is incident to words, as to their authors, to degenerate from their ancestors, and to change their manners when they change their country. It is sufficient, in etymological inquiries, if the senses of kindred words be found such as may easily pass into each other, or such as may both be referred to one general idea.

* That I may not appear to have spoken too irreverently of Junius, I have here subjoined a few Specimens of his etymological extravagance.

P R E F A C E.

The etymology, so far as it is yet known, was easily found in the volumes where it is particularly and professedly delivered; and, by proper attention to the rules of derivation, the orthography was soon adjusted. But to COLLECT the WORDS of our language was a task of greater difficulty: the deficiency of dictionaries was immediately apparent; and when they were exhausted, what was yet wanting, must be sought by fortuitous and unguided excursions into books, and gleaned as industry should find, or chance should offer it, in the boundless chaos of a living speech. My search, however, has been either skilful or lucky; for I have much augmented the vocabulary.

As my design was a dictionary, common or appellative, I have omitted all words which have relation to proper names; such as Arian, Socinian, Calvinist, Benedictine, Mahometan; but have retained those of a more general nature, as Heathen, Pagan.

Of the terms of art I have received such as could be found either in books of science or technical dictionaries; and have often inserted, from philosophical writers, words which are supported perhaps only by a single authority, and which being not admitted into general use, stand yet as candidates or probationers, and must depend for their adoption on the suffrage of futurity.

The words which our authours have introduced by their knowledge of foreign languages, or ignorance of their own, by vanity or wantonness, by compliance with fashion or lust of innovation, I have registered as they occurred, though commonly only to censure them, and warn others against the folly of naturalizing useless foreigners to the injury of the natives.

I have not rejected any by design, merely because they were unnecessary or exuberant; but have received those which by different writers have been differently formed, as viscid, and viscidit, viscous, and viscosity.

Compounded or double words I have seldom noted, except when they obtain a signification different from that which the components have in their simple state. Thus highwayman, woodman, and horsecourser, require an explanation; but of thieflike or coachdriver no notice was needed, because the primitives contain the meaning of the compounds.

Words arbitrarily formed by a constant and settled analogy, like diminutive adjectives in ish, as greenish, bluish, adverbs in ly, as dully, openly; substantives in ness, as vileness, faultiness, were less diligently sought, and sometimes have been omitted, when I had no authority that invited me to insert them; not that they are not genuine and regular offsprings of English roots, but because their relation to the primitive being always the same, their signification cannot be mistaken.

The verbal nouns in ing, such as the keeping of the castle, the leading of the army, are always neglected, or placed only to illustrate the sense of the verb, except when they signify things as well as actions, and have therefore a plural number, as dwelling, living; or have an absolute and abstract signification, as colouring, painting, learning.

The participles are likewise omitted, unless, by signifying rather habit or quality than action, they take the nature of adjectives; as a thinking man, a man of prudence; a pacing horse, a horse that can pace: these I have ventured to call participial adjectives. But neither are these always inserted, because they are commonly to be understood, without any danger of mistake, by consulting the verb.

Obsolete words are admitted, when they are found in authors not obsolete, or when they have any force or beauty that may deserve revival.

As composition is one of the chief characteristicks of a language, I have endeavoured to make some reparation for the universal negligence of my predecessors, by inserting great numbers of compounded words, as may be found under after, fore, new, night, fair, and many more. These, numerous as they are, might be multiplied, but that use and curiosity are here satisfied, and the frame of our language and modes of our combination amply discovered.

Of some forms of composition, such as that by which re is prefixed to note repetition, and un to signify contrariety or privation, all the examples cannot be accumulated, because the use of these particles, if not wholly arbitrary, is so little limited, that they are hourly affixed to new words as occasion requires, or is imagined to require them.

There is another kind of composition more frequent in our language than perhaps in any other, from which arises to foreigners the greatest difficulty. We modify the signification of many words by a particle subjoined; as to come off, to escape by a fetch; to fall on, to attack; to fall off, to apostatize; to break off, to stop abruptly; to hear

P R E F A C E.

Dear out, to justify; to fall in, to comply; to give over, to cease; to set off, to embellish; to set in, to begin a continual tenour; to set out, to begin a course or journey; to take off, to copy; with innumerable expressions of the same kind, of which some appear wildly irregular, being so far distant from the sense of the simple words, that no sagacity will be able to trace the steps by which they arrived at the present use. These I have noted with great care; and though I cannot flatter myself that the collection is complete, I believe I have so far assisted the students of our language, that this kind of phraseology will be no longer insuperable; and the combinations of verbs and particles, by chance omitted, will be easily explained by comparison with those that may be found.

Many words yet stand supported only by the name of Bailey, Ainsworth, Philips, or the contracted Dict. for Dictionaries subjoined; of these I am not always certain that they are read in any book but the works of lexicographers. Of such I have omitted many, because I had never read them; and many I have inserted, because they may perhaps exist, though they have escaped my notice: they are, however, to be yet considered as resting only upon the credit of former dictionaries. Others, which I considered as useful, or know to be proper, though I could not at present support them by authorities, I have suffered to stand upon my own attestation, claiming the same privilege with my predecessors, of being sometimes credited without proof.

The words thus selected and disposed, are grammatically considered; they are referred to the different parts of speech; traced, when they are irregularly inflected, through their various terminations; and illustrated by observations, not indeed of great or striking importance, separately considered, but necessary to the elucidation of our language, and hitherto neglected or forgotten by English grammarians.

That part of my work on which I expect malignity most frequently to fasten, is the Explanation; in which I cannot hope to satisfy those, who are perhaps not inclined to be pleased, since I have not always been able to satisfy myself. To interpret a language by itself is very difficult; many words cannot be explained by synonyms, because the idea signified by them has not more than one appellation; nor by paraphrase, because simple ideas cannot be described. When the nature of things is unknown, or the notion unsettled and indefinite, and various in various minds, the words by which such notions are conveyed, or such things denoted, will be ambiguous and perplexed. And such is the fate of hapless lexicography, that not only darkness, but light, impedes and distresses it; things may be not only too little, but too much known, to be happily illustrated. To explain, requires the use of terms less abstruse than that which is to be explained, and such terms cannot always be found; for as nothing can be proved but by supposing something intuitively known, and evident without proof, so nothing can be defined but by the use of words too plain to admit a definition.

Other words there are, of which the sense is too subtle and evanescent to be fixed in a paraphrase; such are all those which are by the grammarians termed expletives, and, in dead languages, are suffered to pass for empty sounds, of no other use than to fill a verse, or to modulate a period, but which are easily perceived in living tongues to have power and emphasis, though it be sometimes such as no other form of expression can convey.

My labour has likewise been much increased by a class of verbs too frequent in the English language, of which the signification is so loose and general, the use so vague and indeterminate, and the senses detorted so widely from the first idea, that it is hard to trace them through the maze of variation, to catch them on the brink of utter inanity, to circumscribe them by any limitations, or interpret them by any words of distinct and settled meaning; such are bear, break, come, cast, full, get, give, do, put, set, go, run, make, take, turn, throw. If of these the whole power is not accurately delivered, it must be remembered, that while our language is yet living, and variable by the caprice of every one that speaks it, these words are hourly shifting their relations, and can no more be ascertained in a dictionary, than a grove, in the agitation of a storm, can be accurately delineated from its picture in the water.

The particles are among all nations applied with so great latitude, that they are not easily reducible under any regular scheme of explication: this difficulty is not less, nor perhaps greater, in English, than in other languages. I have laboured them with diligence, I hope with success; such at least as can be expected in a task, which no man, however learned or sagacious, has yet been able to perform.

Some words there are which I cannot explain, because I do not understand them; these might have been omitted very often with little inconvenience, but I would not so far indulge my vanity as to decline this confession: for when Tully owns himself ignorant whether lessus, in the twelve tables, means a funeral song, or mourning garment; and Aristotle doubts whether ωἰς, in the Iliad, signifies a mule, or muleteer, I may surely, without shame, leave some obscurities to happier industry, or future information.

The rigour of interpretive lexicography requires that the explanation, and the word explained, should be always reciprocal; this I have always endeavoured, but could not always attain. Words are seldom exactly synonymous; a new term was not introduced, but because the former was thought inadequate: names, therefore, have often many ideas, ideas, but few ideas have many names. It was then necessary to use the proximate word, for the deficiency of single terms can very seldom be supplied by circumlocution; nor is the inconvenience great of such mutilated interpretations, because the sense may easily be collected entire from the examples.

In every word of extensive use, it was requisite to mark the progress of its meaning, and show by what gradations of intermediate sense it has passed from its primitive to its remote and accidental signification; so that every foregoing explanation should tend to that which follows, and the series be regularly concatenated from the first notion to the last.

This is specious, but not always practicable; kindred senses may be so interwoven, that the perplexity cannot be disentangled, nor any reason be assigned why one should be ranged before the other. When the radical idea branches out into parallel ramifications, how can a consecutive series be formed of senses in their nature collateral? The shades of meaning sometimes pass imperceptibly into each other; so that though on one side they apparently differ, yet it is impossible to mark the point of contact. Ideas of the same race, though not exactly alike, are sometimes so little different, that no words can express the dissimilitude, though the mind easily perceives it, when they are exhibited together; and sometimes there is such a confusion of acceptations, that discernment is wearied, and distinction puzzled, and perseverance herself hurries to an end, by crowding together what she cannot separate.

These complaints of difficulty will, by those that have never considered words beyond their popular use, be thought only the jargon of a man willing to magnify his labours, and procure veneration to his studies by involution and obscurity. But every art is obscure to those that have not learned it: this uncertainty of terms, and commixture of ideas, is well known to those who have joined philosophy with grammar; and if I have not expressed them very clearly, it must be remembered that I am speaking of that which words are insufficient to explain.

The original sense of words is often driven out of use by their metaphorical acceptations, yet must be inserted for the sake of a regular origination. Thus I know not whether ardour is used for material heat, or whether flagrant, in English, ever signifies the same with burning; yet such are the primitive ideas of these words, which are therefore set first, though without examples, that the figurative senses may be commodiously deduced.

Such is the exuberance of signification which many words have obtained, that it was scarcely possible to collect all their senses; sometimes the meaning of derivatives must be sought in the mother term, and sometimes deficient explanations of the primitive may be supplied in the train of derivation. In any case of doubt or difficulty, it will be always proper to examine all the words of the same race; for some words are slightly passed over to avoid repetition, some admitted easier and clearer explanation than others, and all will be better understood, as they are considered in greater variety of structures and relations.

All the interpretations of words are not written with the same skill, or the same happiness: things equally easy in themselves, are not all equally easy to any single mind. Every writer of a long work commits errors, where there appears neither ambiguity to mislead, nor obscurity to confound him; and in a search like this, many felicities of expression will be casually overlooked, many convenient parallels will be forgotten, and many particulars will admit improvement from a mind utterly unequal to the whole performance.

But many seeming faults are to be imputed rather to the nature of the undertaking, than the negligence of the performer. Thus some explanations are unavoidably reciprocal or circular, as hind, the female of the stag; stag, the male of the hind: sometimes easier words are changed into harder, as burial into sepulture or interment, drier into desiccative, dryness into ficcidity or aridity, fit into paroxysm; for the easiest word, whatever it be, can never be translated into one more easy. But easiness and difficulty are merely relative, and if the present prevalence of our language should invite foreigners to this dictionary, many will be assisted by those words which now seem only to increase or produce obscurity. For this reason I have endeavoured frequently to join a Teutonic and Roman interpretation, as to CHEER, to gladden, or exhilarate, that every learner of English may be assisted by his own tongue.

The solution of all difficulties, and the supply of all defects, must be sought in the examples, subjoined to the various senses of each word, and ranged according to the time of their authors.

When I first collected these authorities, I was desirous that every quotation should be useful to some other end than the illustration of a word; I therefore extracted from philosophers principles of science; from historians remarkable facts; from chymists complete processes; from divines striking exhortations; and from poets beautiful descriptions. Such is design, while it is yet at a distance from execution. When the time called upon me to range this accumulation of elegance and wisdom into an alphabetical series, I soon discovered that the bulk of my volumes would fright away the student, and was forced to depart from my scheme of including all that was pleasing or useful in English literature; and reduce my transcripts very often to clusters of words, in which scarcely any meaning is retained; thus to the weariness of copying I was condemned to add the vexation of expunging.

Some

P R E F A C E.

Some passages I have yet spared, which may relieve the labour of verbal searches, and intersperse with verdure and flowers the dusty desarts of barren philology.

The examples, thus mutilated, are no longer to be considered as conveying the sentiments or doctrine of their authours; the word for the sake of which they are inserted, with all its appendant clauses, has been carefully preserved; but it may sometimes happen, by hasty detraction, that the general tendency of the sentence may be changed: the divine may desert his tenets, or the philosopher his system.

Some of the examples have been taken from writers who were never mentioned as masters of elegance or models of style; but words must be sought where they are used; and in what pages, eminent for purity, can terms of manufacture or agriculture be found? Many quotations serve no other purpose, than that of proving the bare existence of words, and are therefore selected with less scrupulousness than those which are to teach their structures and relations.

My purpose was to admit no testimony of living authours, that I might not be misled by partiality, and that none of my cotemporaries might have reason to complain; nor have I departed from this resolution, but when some performance of uncommon excellence excited my veneration, when my memory supplied me, from late books, with an example that was wanting, or when my heart, in the tenderness of friendship, solicited admission for a favourite name.

So far have I been from any care to grace my pages with modern decorations, that I have studiously endeavoured to collect examples and authorities from the writers before the restoration, whose works I regard as the wells of English undefiled, as the pure sources of genuine diction. Our language, for almost a century, has, by the concurrence of many causes, been gradually departing from its original Teutonick character, and deviating towards a Gallick structure and phraseology, from which it ought to be our endeavour to recall it, by making our ancient volumes the ground-work of style, admitting among the additions of later times, only such as may supply real deficiencies, such as are readily adopted by the genius of our tongue, and incorporate easily with our native idioms.

But as every language has a time of rudeness antecedent to perfection, as well as of false refinement and declension, I have been cautious lest my zeal for antiquity might drive me into times too remote, and crowd my book with words now no longer understood. I have fixed Sidney's work for the boundary, beyond which I make few excursions. From the authours which rose in the time of Elizabeth, a speech might be formed adequate to all the purposes of use and elegance. If the language of theology were extracted from Hooker and the translation of the Bible; the terms of natural knowledge from Bacon; the phrases of policy, war, and navigation from Raleigh; the dialect of poetry and fiction from Spenser and Sidney; and the diction of common life from Shakespeare, few ideas would be lost to mankind, for want of English words, in which they might be expressed.

It is not sufficient that a word is found, unless it be so combined as that its meaning is apparently determined by the tract and tenour of the sentence; such passages I have therefore chosen, and when it happened that any authour gave a definition of a term, or such an explanation as is equivalent to a definition, I have placed his authority as a supplement to my own, without regard to the chronological order, that is otherwise observed.

Some words, indeed, stand unsupported by any authority, but they are commonly derivative nouns or adverbs, formed from their primitives by regular and constant analogy, or names of things seldom occurring in books, or words of which I have reason to doubt the existence.

There is more danger of censure from the multiplicity than paucity of examples; authorities will sometimes seem to have been accumulated without necessity or use, and perhaps some will be found, which might, without loss, have been omitted. But a work of this kind is not hastily to be charged with superfluities: those quotations, which to careless or unskilful perusers appear only to repeat the same sense, will often exhibit, to a more accurate examiner, diversities of signification, or, at least, afford different shades of the same meaning: one will show the word applied to persons, another to things; one will express an ill, another a good, and a third a neutral sense; one will prove the expression genuine from an ancient authour; another will show it elegant from a modern: a doubtful authority is corroborated by another of more credit; an ambiguous sentence is ascertained by a passage clear and determinate; the word, how often soever repeated, appears with new associates and in different combinations, and every quotation contributes something to the stability or enlargement of the language.

When words are used equivocally, I receive them in either sense; when they are metaphorical, I adopt them in their primitive acceptation.

I have sometimes, though rarely, yielded to the temptation of exhibiting a genealogy of sentiments, by showing how one authour copied the thoughts and diction of another: such quotations are indeed little more than repetitions, which might justly be censured, did they not gratify the mind, by affording a kind of intellectual history.

P R E F A C E.

The various syntactical structures occurring in the examples have been carefully noted; the licence or negligence with which many words have been hitherto used, has made our style capricious and indeterminate; when the different combinations of the same word are exhibited together, the preference is readily given to propriety, and I have often endeavoured to direct the choice.

Thus have I laboured by settling the orthography, displaying the analogy, regulating the structures, and ascertaining the signification of English words, to perform all the parts of a faithful lexicographer: but I have not always executed my own scheme, or satisfied my own expectations. The work, whatever proofs of diligence and attention it may exhibit, is yet capable of many improvements: the orthography which I recommend is still controvertible, the etymology which I adopt is uncertain, and perhaps frequently erroneous; the explanations are sometimes too much contracted, and sometimes too much diffused, the significations are distinguished rather with subtilty than skill, and the attention is harassed with unnecessary minuteness.

The examples are too often injudiciously truncated, and perhaps sometimes, I hope very rarely, alleged in a mistaken sense; for in making this collection I trusted more to memory, than, in a state of disquiet and embarrassment, memory can contain, and purposed to supply at the review what was left incomplete in the first transcription.

Many terms appropriated to particular occupations, though necessary and significant, are undoubtedly omitted; and of the words most studiously considered and exemplified, many senses have escaped observation.

Yet these failures, however frequent, may admit extenuation and apology. To have attempted much is always laudable, even when the enterprize is above the strength that undertakes it: To rest below his own aim is incident to every one whose fancy is active, and whose views are comprehensive; nor is any man satisfied with himself because he has done much, but because he can conceive little. When first I engaged in this work, I resolved to leave neither words nor things unexamined, and pleased myself with a prospect of the hours which I should revel away in feasts of literature, with the obscure recesses of northern learning, which I should enter and ransack; the treasures with which I expected every search into those neglected mines to reward my labour, and the triumph with which I should display my acquisitions to mankind. When I had thus inquired into the original of words, I resolved to show likewise my attention to things; to pierce deep into every science, to inquire the nature of every substance of which I inserted the name, to limit every idea by a definition strictly logical, and exhibit every production of art or nature in an accurate description, that my book might be in place of all other dictionaries whether appellative or technical. But these were the dreams of a poet doomed at last to wake a lexicographer. I soon found that it is too late to look for instruments, when the work calls for execution, and that whatever abilities I had brought to my task, with those I must finally perform it. To deliberate whenever I doubted, to inquire whenever I was ignorant, would have protracted the undertaking without end, and, perhaps, without much improvement; for I did not find by my first experiments, that what I had not of my own was easily to be obtained: I saw that one inquiry only gave occasion to another, that book referred to book, that to search was not always to find, and to find was not always to be informed; and that thus to pursue perfection, was, like the first inhabitants of Arcadia, to chase the fun, which, when they had reached the hill where he seemed to rest, was still beheld at the same distance from them.

I then contracted my design, determining to confide in myself, and no longer to solicit auxiliaries, which produced more incumbrance than assistance: by this I obtained at least one advantage, that I set limits to my work, which would in time be ended, though not completed.

Despondency has never so far prevailed as to depress me to negligence; some faults will at last appear to be the effects of anxious diligence and persevering activity. The nice and subtle ramifications of meaning were not easily avoided by a mind intent upon accuracy, and convinced of the necessity of disentangling combinations, and separating similitudes. Many of the distinctions which to common readers appear useless and idle, will be found real and important by men versed in the school philosophy, without which no dictionary can ever be accurately compiled, or skilfully examined.

Some senses however there are, which, though not the same, are yet so nearly allied, that they are often confounded. Most men think indistinctly, and therefore cannot speak with exactness; and consequently some examples might be indifferently put to either signification: this uncertainty is not to be imputed to me, who do not form, but register the language; who do not teach men how they should think, but relate how they have hitherto expressed their thoughts.

The imperfect sense of some examples I lamented, but could not remedy, and hope they will be compensated by innumerable passages selected with propriety, and preserved with exactness; some shining with sparks of imagination, and some replete with treasures of wisdom.

P R E F A C E.

The orthography and etymology, though imperfect, are not imperfect for want of care, but because care will not always be successful, and recollection or information come too late for use.

That many terms of art and manufacture are omitted, must be frankly acknowledged; but for this defect I may boldly allege that it was unavoidable: I could not visit caverns to learn the miner's language, nor take a voyage to perfect my skill in the dialect of navigation, nor visit the warehouses of merchants, and shops of artificers, to gain the names of wares, tools and operations, of which no mention is found in books; what favourable accident, or easy inquiry brought within my reach, has not been neglected; but it had been a hopeless labour to glean up words, by courting living information, and contesting with the fullness of one, and the roughness of another.

To furnish the academicians della Crusca with words of this kind, a series of comedies called la Fiera or the Fair, was professedly written by Buonaroti; but I had no such assistant, and therefore was content to want what they must have wanted likewise, had they not luckily been so supplied.

Nor are all words which are not found in the vocabulary, to be lamented as omissions. Of the laborious and mercantile part of the people, the diction is in a great measure casual and mutable; many of their terms are formed for some temporary or local convenience, and though current at certain times and places, are in others utterly unknown. This fugitive cant, which is always in a state of increase or decay, cannot be regarded as any part of the durable materials of a language, and therefore must be suffered to perish with other things unworthy of preservation.

Care will sometimes betray to the appearance of negligence. He that is catching opportunities which seldom occur, will suffer those to pass by unregarded, which he expects hourly to return; he that is searching for rare and remote things, will neglect those that are obvious and familiar: thus many of the most common and cursory words have been inserted with little illustration, because in gathering the authorities, I forbore to copy those which I thought likely to occur whenever they were wanted. It is remarkable that, in reviewing my collection, I found the word SEA unexemplified.

Thus it happens, that in things difficult there is danger from ignorance, and in things easy from confidence; the mind, afraid of greatness, and disdainful of littleness, hastily withdraws herself from painful searches, and passes with scornful rapidity over tasks not adequate to her powers, sometimes too secure for caution, and again too anxious for vigorous effort; sometimes idle in a plain path, and sometimes distracted in labyrinths, and dissipated by different intentions.

A large work is difficult because it is large, even though all its parts might singly be performed with facility; where there are many things to be done, each must be allowed its share of time and labour, in the proportion only which it bears to the whole; nor can it be expected, that the stones which form the dome of a temple, should be squared and polished like the diamond of a ring.

Of the event of this work, for which, having laboured it with so much application, I cannot but have some degree of parental fondness, it is natural to form conjectures. Those who have been persuaded to think well of my design, will require that it should fix our language, and put a stop to those alterations which time and chance have hitherto been suffered to make in it without opposition. With this consequence I will confess that I flattered myself for a while; but now begin to fear that I have indulged expectation which neither reason nor experience can justify. When we see men grow old and die at a certain time one after another, from century to century, we laugh at the elixir that promises to prolong life to a thousand years; and with equal justice may the lexicographer be derided, who being able to produce no example of a nation that has preserved their words and phrases from mutability, shall imagine that his dictionary can embalm his language, and secure it from corruption and decay, that it is in his power to change sublunary nature, and clear the world at once from folly, vanity, and affectation.

With this hope, however, academies have been instituted, to guard the avenues of their languages, to retain fugitives, and repulse intruders; but their vigilance and activity have hitherto been vain; sounds are too volatile and subtle for legal restraints; to enchain syllables, and to lash the wind, are equally the undertakings of pride, unwilling to measure its desires by its strength. The French language has visibly changed under the inspection of the academy; the style of Amelot's translation of father Paul is observed by Le Courayer to be un peu passé; and no Italian will maintain, that the diction of any modern writer is not perceptibly different from that of Boccace, Machiavel, or Caro.

Total and sudden transformations of a language seldom happen; conquests and migrations are now very rare: but there are other causes of change, which, though slow in their operation, and invisible in their progress, are perhaps as much superior to human resistance, as the revolutions of the sky, or intumescence of the tide. Commerce, however unnecessary, however lucrative, as it depraves the manners, corrupts the language; they that have frequent intercourse with strangers, to whom they endeavour to accommodate themselves, must in time learn a mingled dialect, like the jargon which serves the traffickers on the Mediterranean and Indian coasts. This will not alwas be confined to the exchange, the warehouse, or the port, but will be communicated by degrees to other ranks of the people, and be at last incorporated with the current speech.

There are likewise internal causes equally forcible. The language most likely to continue long without alteration, would be that of a nation raised a little, and but a little above barbarity, secluded from strangers, and totally employed in procuring the conveniencies of life; either without books, or, like some of the Mahometan countries, with very few: men thus busied and unlearned, having only such words as common use requires, would perhaps long continue to express the same notions by the same signs. But no such constancy can be expected in a people polished by arts, and classed by subordination, where one part of the community is sustained and accommodated by the labour of the other. Those who have much leisure to think, will always be enlarging the stock of ideas, and every increase of knowledge, whether real or fancied, will produce new words, or combinations of words. When the mind is unchained from necessity, it will range after convenience; when it is left at large in the fields of speculation, it will shift opinions; as any custom is disused, the words that expressed it must perish with it; as any opinion grows popular, it will innovate speech in the same proportion as it alters practice.

As by the cultivation of various sciences, a language is amplified, it will be more furnished with words deflected from their original sense; the geometrician will talk of a courtier's zenith, or the eccentric virtue of a wild hero, and the physician of sanguine expectations and phlegmatic delays. Copiousness of speech will give opportunities to capricious choice, by which some words will be preferred, and others degraded; vicissitudes of fashion will enforce the use of new, or extend the signification of known terms. The tropes of poetry will make hourly encroachments, and the metaphorical will become the current sense: pronunciation will be varied by levity or ignorance, and the pen must at length comply with the tongue; illiterate writers will, at one time or other, by public infatuation, rise into renown, who, not knowing the original import of words, will use them with colloquial licentiousness, confound distinction, and forget propriety. As politeness increases, some expressions will be considered as too gross and vulgar for the delicate, others as too formal and ceremonious for the gay and airy; new phrases are therefore adopted, which must, for the same reasons, be in time dismissed. Swift, in his petty treatise on the English language, allows that new words must sometimes be introduced, but proposes that none should be suffered to become obsolete. But what makes a word obsolete, more than general agreement to forbear it? and how shall it be continued, when it conveys an offensive idea, or recalled again into the mouths of mankind, when it has once become unfamiliar by disuse, and unpleasing by unfamiliarity.

There is another cause of alteration more prevalent than any other, which yet in the present state of the world cannot be obviated. A mixture of two languages will produce a third distinct from both, and they will always be mixed, where the chief part of education, and the most conspicuous accomplishment, is skill in ancient or in foreign tongues. He that has long cultivated another language, will find its words and combinations crowd upon his memory; and haste and negligence, refinement and affectation, will obtrude borrowed terms and exotick expressions.

The great pest of speech is frequency of translation. No book was ever turned from one language into another, without imparting something of its native idiom; this is the most mischievous and comprehensive innovation; single words may enter by thousands, and the fabrick of the tongue continue the same, but new phraseology changes much at once; it alters not the single stones of the building, but the order of the columns. If an academy should be established for the cultivation of our style, which I, who can never wish to see dependance multiplied, hope the spirit of English liberty will hinder or destroy, let them, instead of compiling grammars and dictionaries, endeavour, with all their influence, to stop the licence of translatours, whose idleness and ignorance, if it be suffered to proceed, will reduce us to babble a dialect of France.

If the changes that we fear be thus irresistible, what remains but to acquiesce with silence, as in the other insurmountable distresses of humanity? It remains that we retard what we cannot repel, that we palliate what we cannot cure. Life may be lengthened by care, though death cannot be ultimately defeated: tongues, like governments, have a natural tendency to degeneration; we have long preserved our constitution, let us make some struggles for our language.

In hope of giving longevity to that which its own nature forbids to be immortal, I have devoted this book, the labour of years, to the honour of my country, that we may no longer yield the palm of philology, without a contest, to the nations of the continent. The chief glory of every people arises from its authours: whether I shall add any thing by my own writings to the reputation of English literature, must be left to time: much of my life has been lost under the pressures of disease; much has been trifled away; and much has always been spent in provision for the day that was passing over me; but I shall not think my employment useless or ignoble, if by my assistance foreign nations, and distant ages, gain access to the propagators of knowledge, and understand the teachers.

teachers of truth; if my labours afford light to the repositories of science, and add celebrity to Bacon, to Hooker, to Milton, and to Boyle.

When I am animated by this wish, I look with pleasure on my book, however defective, and deliver it to the world with the spirit of a man that has endeavoured well. That it will immediately become popular I have not promised to myself: a few wild blunders, and risible absurdities, from which no work of such multiplicity was ever free, may for a time furnish folly with laughter, and harden ignorance in contempt; but useful diligence will at last prevail, and there never can be wanting some who distinguish desert; who will consider that no dictionary of a living tongue ever can be perfect, since while it is hastening to publication, some words are budding, and some falling away; that a whole life cannot be spent upon syntax and etymology, and that even a whole life would not be sufficient; that he, whose design includes whatever language can express, must often speak of what he does not understand; that a writer will sometimes be hurried by eagerness to the end, and sometimes faint with weariness under a task, which Scaliger compares to the labours of the anvil and the mine; that what is obvious is not always known, and what is known is not always present; that sudden fits of inadvertency will surprize vigilance, slight avocations will seduce attention, and casual eclipses of the mind will darken learning; and that the writer shall often in vain trace his memory at the moment of need, for that which yesterday he knew with intuitive readiness, and which will come uncalled into his thoughts to-morrow.

In this work, when it shall be found that much is omitted, let it not be forgotten that much likewise is performed; and though no book was ever spared out of tenderness to the authour, and the world is little solicitous to know whence proceeded the faults of that which it condemns; yet it may gratify curiosity to inform it, that the English Dictionary was written with little assistance of the learned, and without any patronage of the great; not in the soft obscurities of retirement, or under the shelter of academick bowers, but amidst inconvenience and distraction, in sickness and in sorrow. It may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed. If the lexicons of ancient tongues, now immutably fixed, and comprised in a few volumes, be yet, after the toil of successive ages, inadequate and delusive; if the aggregated knowledge, and co-operating diligence of the Italian academicians, did not secure them from the censure of Beni; if the embodied criticks of France, when fifty years had been spent upon their work, were obliged to change its œconomy, and give their second edition another form, I may surely be contented without the praise of perfection, which, if I could obtain, in this gloom of solitude, what would it avail me? I have protracted my work till most of those whom I wished to please have sunk into the grave, and success and miscarriage are empty sounds: I therefore dismiss it with frigid tranquillity, having little to fear or hope from censure or from praise.

THOUGH the Britains or Welsh were the first possessors of this Island, whose names are recorded, and are therefore in civil history always considered as the predecessors of the present inhabitants; yet the deduction of the English language, from the earliest times of which we have any knowledge to its present state, requires no mention of them: for we have so few words which can, with any probability, be referred to British roots, that we justly regard the Saxons and Welsh as nations totally distinct. It has been conjectured, that when the Saxons seized this country, they suffered the Britains to live among them in a state of vassalage, employed in the culture of the ground, and other laborious and ignoble services. But it is scarcely possible, that a nation, however depressed, should have been mixed with another in considerable numbers without some communication of their tongue, and therefore, it may, with great reason, be imagined, that those, who were not sheltered in the mountains, perished by the sword.

The whole fabrick and scheme of the English language is Gothick or Teutonic: it is a dialect of that tongue, which prevails over all the northern countries of Europe, except those where the Slavonian is spoken. Of these languages Dr. Hickes has thus exhibited the genealogy.

Of the Gothick, the only monument remaining is a copy of the gospels somewhat mutilated, which, from the silver with which the characters are adorned, is called the silver book. It is now preserved at Upsal, and having been twice published before, has been lately reprinted at Oxford, under the inspection of Mr. Lye, the editor of Junius. Whether the diction of this venerable manuscript be purely Gothick, has been doubted; it seems however to exhibit the most ancient dialect now to be found of the Teutonic race; and the Saxon, which is the original of the present English, was either derived from it, or both have descended from some common parent.

What was the form of the Saxon language, when, about the year 450, they first entered Britain, cannot now be known. They seem to have been a people without learning, and very probably without an alphabet; their speech, therefore, having been always cursory and extemporaneous, must have been artless and unconnected, without any modes of transition or involution of clauses; which abruptness and inconnection may be observed even in their later writings. This barbarity may be supposed to have continued during their wars with the Britains, which for a time left them no leisure for softer studies; nor is there any reason for supposing it abated, till the year 570, when Augustine came from Rome to convert them to Christianity. The Christian religion always implies or produces a certain degree of civility and learning; they then became by degrees acquainted with the Roman language, and so gained, from time to time, some knowledge and elegance, till in three centuries they had formed a language capable of expressing all the sentiments of a civilised people, as appears by king Alfred's paraphrase or imitation of Boethius, and his short preface, which I have selected as the first specimen of ancient English.

Of the following version of the gospels the age is not certainly known, but it was probably written between the time of Alfred and that of the Norman conquest, and therefore may properly be inserted here.

Translations seldom afford just specimens of a language, and least of all those in which a scrupulous and verbal interpretation is endeavoured, because they retain the phraseology and structure of the original tongue; yet they have often this convenience, that the same book, being translated in different ages, affords opportunity of marking the gradations of change, and bringing one age into comparison with another. For this purpose I have placed the Saxon version and that of Wickliffe, written about the year 1380, in opposite columns; because the convenience of easy collation seems greater than that of regular chronology.

L U K, CHAP. I.

IN the dayes of Eroude kyng of Judee ther was a preft Zacarye by name: of the ſort of Abia, and his wyf was of the doughtriſ of Aaron: and hir name was Elizabeth.

2 An bothe weren juſte bifoſe God: goýnge in alle the maundementis and juſtifyingis of the Lord withouten playnt.

3 And thei hadden no child, for Elizabeth was bareyn and both weren of greet age in her dayes.

4 And it beſel that whanne Zacarye ſchould do the office of preſthod in the ordiſ of his couſe to fore God.

5 Aſtir the cuſtom of the preſthod, he wente forth by lot and entride into the temple to encenſen.

6 And at the multitude of the puple was without forth and preyede in the our of encenſyng.

7 And an aungel of the Lord apperide to him: and ſtood on the right half of the auter of encenſe.

8 And Zacarye feyng was aſrayed: and drede fel upon him.

9 And the aungel ſayde to him, Zacarye drede thou not: for thy preier is herd, and Elizabeth thi wiſ ſchal bere to thee a ſone: and his name ſchal be clepid Jon.

10 And joye and gladyng ſchal be to thee: and manye ſchulen have joye in his natyvyte.

11 For he ſchal be great bitore the Lord: and he ſchal not drinke wyn ne ſydyr, and he ſchal be fulfid with the Holy Goſt yit of his modir wombe.

12 And he ſchal converte manye of the children of Iſrael to her Lord God.

13 And he ſchal go biſore in the ſpyrite and vertu of Helye: and he ſchal turne the hertis of the ſadriſ to the ſoniſ, and men out of beleewe: to the prudence of juſt men, to make redy a ƿerfyt puple to the Lord.

14 And Zacarye ſeyde to the aungel: whereof ſhall Y wyte thiſ? for Y am old: and my wyf hath gone ſer in hir dayes.

15 And the aungel anſwerde and ſeyde to him, for Y am Gabriel that ſtonde nygh biſore God, and Y am ſent to thee to ſpeke and to evangelife to thee theſe thingiſ, and lo thou ſchalt be doumbe.

16 And thou ſchalt not mowe ſpeke, til into the day in which theſe thingiſ ſchulen be don, for thou haſt not beleewed to my wordiſ, whiche ſchulen be fulfid in her tyme.

17 And the puple waſ abidyng Zacarye: and thei won-driden that he taryede in the temple.

18 And he gedde out and myghte not ſpeke to hem: and thei knewen that he hadde ſeyn a viſioun in the temple, and he bekenide to hem: and he dwellide ſtille doumbe.

19 And it waſ done whanne the dayes of hiſ office weren fullid: he wente into hiſ houſ.

20 And aſtir theſe dayes Elizabeth hiſ wiſ conſeyvede and hidde hir fyve monethiſ and ſeyde:

21 For ſo the Lord dide to me in the dayes in which he biheld to take away my reproſ among men.

22 But in the ſixte monethe the aungel Gabriel waſ ſent from God: into a cytee of Galilee whos name waſ Nazareth.

23 To a maydun weddid to a man; whos name waſ Joſeph of the houſ of Dauith, and the name of the maydun waſ Marye.

24 And the aungel entride to hir, and ſayde, heil full of grace the Lord be with thee: bleſſid be thou among wym-men.

25 And whanne ſche hadde herd: ſche waſ troublid in hiſ word, and thoughte what manner ſalutacioun thiſ waſ.

26 And the aungel ſeid to hir, ne drede not thou Marye: for thou haſ founden grace anentis God.

27 Lo thou ſchalt conſeyve in wombe, and ſchalt bere a ſone: and thou ſchalt clepe hiſ name Jheſuſ.

28 Thiſ ſchal be gret: and he ſchal be clepid the ſone of higheſte, and the Lord God ſchal geve to him the ſeete of Dauith hiſ ſadir.

29 And he ſchal regne in the houſ of Jacob withouten ende, and of hiſ rewme ſchal be noon ende.

30 And Marye ſeyde to the aungel, on what maner ſchal thiſ thing be done? for Y knowe not man.

31 And the aungel anſwerde and ſeyde to hir, the holy Goſt ſchal come fro above into thee: and the vertu of the higheſte ſchal ouer ſchadowe thee: and therfore that holy thing that ſchal be borun of thee: ſhall be clepid the ſone of God.

32 And to Elizabeth thi coſyn, and ſche alſo hath conſeyved a ſone in hir elde, and thiſ monethe is the ſixte to hir that is clepid bareyn.

33 For every word ſchal not be impoſſyble anentis God.

34 And Marye ſeide to the hond maydun of the Lord: be it doon to me aſtir thi word; and the aungel departide fro hir.

35 And Marye roos up in tho dayes and wente with haste into the mountaynes into a citee of Judee.

36 And sche entride into the hous of Zacarye and grette Elizabeth.

37 And it was don as Elizabeth herde the salutacioun of Marye the young childe in hir wombe gladide, and Elizabeth was fulfild with the holy Gost.

38 And cryede with a gret voice and seyde, bleffid be thou among wymmen and bleffid be the fruyt of thy wombe.

39 And wherof is this thing to me, that the modir of my Lord come to me?

40 For lo as the vois of thi salutacioun was maad in myn eris: the yong child gladide in joye in my wombe.

41 And bleffid be thou that hast beleeved: for thilke thingis that ben seid of the Lord to thee schulen be parfytylly don.

42 And Marye seyde, my soul magnifieth the Lord.

43 And my spiryt hath gladid in God myn helthe.

44 For he hath behulden the mekenesse of his handmaydun: for lo for this alle generaciouns schulen seye that I am bleffid.

45 For he that is mighti hath don to me grete thingis, and his name is holy.

46 And his merfy is fro kyndrede into kyndredis to men that dreden him.

47 He made myght in his arm, he scateride proude men with the thoughte of his herte.

48 He sette down myghty men fro seete and enhaunside meke men.

49 He hath fulfillid hongry men with goodis, and he has left riche men voide.

50 He havyng mynde of his merfy took up Israel his child.

51 As he hath spokun to oure fadris, to Abraham, and to his seed into worldis.

52 And Marye dwellide with hir as it were thre monethis and turned agen into his hous.

53 But the tyme of beringe child was fulfillid to Elizabeth, and sche bar a sone.

54 And the neyghbouris and cosyns of hir herden that the Lord had magnyfyed his merfy with hir, and thei thankiden him.

55 And it was doon in the eightithe day thei camen to circumfide the child, and thei clepiden him Zacarye by the name of his fadir.

56 And his modir answeride and seide, nay; but he schal be clepid Jon.

57 And thei seiden to hir, for no man is in thi kynrede that is clepid this name.

58 And they bikenyden to his fadir, what he wolde that he were clepid.

59 And he axinge a poyntel wroot seyinge, Jon is his name, and alle men wondriden.

60 And annoon his mouth was openyd and his tunge, and he spak and bleffide God.

61 And drede was maad on all hir neyghbouris, and all the wordis weren puplichid on alle the mounteynes of Judee.

62 And alle men that herden puttiden in her herte, and seiden what maner child schal this be, for the hond of the Lord was with him.

63 And Zacarye his fadir was fulfillid with the holy Gost, and profeciede and seide.

64 Bleffid be the Lord God of Israel, for he has visitid and maad redempcioun of his puple.

65 And he has rered to us an horn of helthe in the hous of Dauith his child.

66 As he spak by the mouth of hise holy prophetis that weren fro the world.

Of the Saxon poetry some specimen is necessary, though our ignorance of the laws of their metre and the quantities of their syllables, which it would be very difficult, perhaps impossible, to recover, excludes us from that pleasure which the old bards undoubtedly gave to their contemporaries.

The first poetry of the Saxons was without rhyme, and consequently must have depended upon the quantity of their syllables: but they began in time to imitate their neighbours, and close their verses with correspondent sounds.

The two passages which I have selected, contain apparently the rudiments of our present lyric measures, and the writers may be justly considered as the genuine ancestors of the English poets.

 Danne ꝥe hennet penbe.

About the year 1150, the Saxon began to take a form in which the beginning of the present English may be plainly discovered; this change seems not to have been the effect of the Norman conquest, for very few French words are found to have been introduced in the first hundred years after it; the language must therefore have been altered by causes like those which, notwithstanding the care of writers and societies instituted to obviate them, are even now daily making innovations in every living language. I have exhibited a specimen of the language of this age from the year 1135 to 1140 of the Saxon chronicle, of which the latter part was apparently written near the time to which it relates.

Nearly about this time the following pieces of poetry seem to have been written, of which I have inserted only short fragments; the first is a rude attempt at the present measure of eight syllables, and the second is a natural introduction to Robert of Gloucester, being composed in the same measure, which, however rude and barbarous it may seem, taught the way to the Alexandrines of the French Poetry.

In these fragments, the adulteration of the Saxon tongue, by a mixture of the Norman, becomes apparent; yet it is not so much changed by the admixture of new words, which might be imputed to commerce with the continent, as by changes of its own forms and terminations; for which no reason can be given.

Hitherto the language used in this island, however different in successive time, may be called Saxon; nor can it be expected, from the nature of things gradually changing, that any time can be assigned, when the Saxon may be said to cease, and the English to commence. Robert of Gloucester, however, who is placed by the critics in the thirteenth century, seems to have used a kind of intermediate dialect, neither Saxon nor English; in his work therefore we see the transition exhibited, and as he is the first of our writers in rhyme, of whom any large work remains, a more extensive quotation is extracted. He writes apparently in the same measure with the foregoing author of St. Margarete, which polished into greater exactness, appeared to our ancestors so suitable to the genius of the English language, that it was continued in use almost to the middle of the seventeenth century.

As ýt vel, þe výtý ger of ýs kýnedom.
At Wýnbourne he was ýbured, as God gef þat cas, þe gode Alfred, ýs broþer, after hym kýng was.

ALFRÉD, þýs noble man, as in þe ger of grace he nom

Eýgte hondred & sýxtý & tuelue þe kýnedom.
Arist he adde at Rome ýbe, & vor ýs grete wýsdom, þe pope Leon hym blestede, þo he þuder com,
And þe kýnge's croune of hys lond, þat in þýs lond gut ýs:

And he led hym to be kýng, ar he kýng were ýwýs.
An he was kýng of Engeland, of alle þat þer come,
þat vof þus ýlad was of þe pope of Rome,
An suppe oper after hym of þe archebýshopes echon.
So þat hýuor hym þore kýng nas þer non.
In þe Soup sýde of Temese nýne bataýles he nome
Agen þe Deneýs þe vorst ger of ýs kýnedom.
Nýe ger he was þus in þýs lond in batale & in wo,
An ofte sýþe aboue was, and býneþe ofter mo;
So longe, þat hym nere bý leuede bote þre sýren in ýs hond,

Hamtesýre, and Wýltesýre, and Somersfete, of al ýs lond.
A day as he werý was, and asuoddrýnge hym nome
And ýs men were ýwend auýsseþ, Seýn Cutbert to hym com.

"Ich am," he seýde, "Cutbert, to þe ýcham ýwend
"To brýnge þe gode týtýnges. Fram God ýcham ýsend.
"Vor þat folc of þýs lond to sýnne her wýlle al geue,
"And gut nolle herto her sýnnes býleue
"þoru me & oper halewen, þat in þýs londe were ýbore;
"þan vor gou býddeþ God, wanne we bep hym býuore,
"Hour Louerd mýd ýs eyen of milce on þe lokeþ þeruore,
"And þý poer þe wole gýue agen, þat þou ast neý verlore.
"And þat þou þer of sop ýse, þou stalt abbe tokýnýnge.
"Vor þým men, þat bep ago to day auýssýnge,
"In lepes & in coufles so much vyfs hii stelde hym brýnge,
"þat ech man wondry stoll of so gret cacchýnge.
"And þe mor vor þe harde vorste, þat þe water ýfrore hys
"þat þe more agen þe kunde of výtýnge ýt ýs.
"Of serue ýt wel agen God, and ýlef me ýs messager,
"And þou stalt þý wýlle abyde, as ýcham ýtold her."
As þýs kýng herof awoc, and of thýs sýgte þogte,
Hys výtýares come to hym, & so gret won of fýfs hym brogte, þat wonder ýt was, & namelyche vor þe weder was so colde.
þo lýuede þe god man wel, þat Seýn Cutbert adde ýtold.

In Deuenýsýre þer after arýuede of Deneýs þre and tuenty slypuol, men, all agen þe þeýs, þe kýnge's broþer of Denemarch duc of ost was.
Oure kýnge's men of Engeland, mette hem bý cas,
And smýte þer an bataýle, and her gret duc slowe,
And eýgte hondred & fourty men, & her caronyes to drowe.
þo kýng Alfred hurde þýs herte gladede þo, þat lond folc to hym come so þýcke so ýt mýgte go,
Of Somersfete, of Wýltesýre, of Hamtesýre þerto.
Euere as he wende, and of ýs owe folc al so.
So þat he adde poer ýnou, and atte laste hii come,
And a bataýle at Edendone agen þe Deneýs nome.
And slowe to grounde, & wonne þe maystre of the velde.
þe kýng & ýs grete duke býgonne hem to zelde
To þe kýng Alfred to ýs wýlle, and ostages toke, Vorto wende out of ýs lond, gýf he ýt wolde loke;
And gut þerto, vor ýs loue, to auonge Cristendom.
Kýng Gurmund, þe hexte kýng, vorst þer to come.
Kýng Alfred ýsgodfader was. & ýbaptýfed ek þer were pretty of her hexte dukes. and mucho of þat folc þere
Kýng Alfred hem huld wýp hym tuelfdawes as he hende,
And sþe he gef hem large gýftes, and let hym wende.
Hii, þat nolde Cristyn be, of lande slowe þo,
And býgonde see in France dude wel mucho wo.
gut þe sýrewen come agen, and mucho wo here wrogte.
Ac þe kýng Alfred atte laste to flame hem eure brogte.
Kýng Alfred was þe wýfst kýng, þat long was býuore.
Vor þey me segge þe lawes bep in worre týme vorlore,
Nas ýt nogt so hiis daye. vor þey he in worre were,
Lawes he made rýgtuollore, and strengore þan er were,
Clerc he was god ýnou, and gut, as me telleþ me,
He was more þan ten ger old, ar he coupe ýs abece.
Ac ýs gode moder ofte smale gýftes hym tok,
Vor to býleue oper ple, and loký on ýs boke.
So þat by þor clergye ýs rýgt lawes he wonde,
þat neuere er nere ý mad, to gourný ýs lond.
And vor þe worre was so mucho of þe luper Deneýs, þe men of þýs sulue lond were of þe worse þeýs.
And robbede and slowe opere, þeruor he býuonde,
þat þer were hondredes in eche contrýe of ýs lond,
And in ech toune of þe hodred a tepýnge were also,
And þat ech man wýpoute gret lond in tepýnge were ýdo,
And þat ech man knewe oper þat in tepýnge were,
And wuste somdel of her stat, gýf, me þu vp hem bere.
So streýt he was, þat þey me ledde amýdde weyes heye
Seluer, þat non man ne doste ýt nýme, þey he ýt seye.
Abbeys he rerde moný on, and moný studes ýwys.
Ac Wynchestrye he rerde on, þat nýwe muþre ýclupedýs.
Hys lýf eýgte and tuenty ger in ýs kýnedom ýlaste.
After ýs dep he was ýbured at Wýnchestre at laste.

Sir John Mandeville wrote, as he himself informs us, in the fourteenth century, and his work, which comprising a relation of many different particulars, consequently required the use of many words and phrases, may be properly specified in this place. Of the following quotations, I have chosen the first, because it shows, in some measure, the state of European science as well as of the English tongue: and the second, because it is valuable for the force of thought and beauty of expression.

IN that lond, ne in many othere bezonde that, no man may see, the sterre transmontane, that is clept the sterre of the see, that is unmevabl, and that is toward the Northe, that we clepen the lode sterre. But men see another sterre, the contrarie to him, that is toward the Southe, that is clept Antartyk. And right as the schip men taken here avys here, and governe hem be the lode sterre, right so don schip men bezonde the parties, be the sterre of the Southe, the which sterre apperethe not to us. And this sterre, that is toward the Northe, that we clepen the lode sterre, ne apperethe not to hem. For whiche cause, men may wel perceyve, that the londe and the see ben of rownde schapp and forme. For the partie of the firmament scheweth in o contree, that schewethe not in another contree. And men may well preven be experience and sotyle compassment of wytt, that zif a man fond passages be schippes, that wolde go to serchen the world, men myghte go be schippe alle aboute the world, and aboven and benethen. The whiche thing I prove thus, afre that I have seyn. For I have been toward the parties of Braban, and beholden the Astrolabre, that the sterre that is clept the transmontayne, is 53 degrees highe. And more forthere in Almayne and Bewme, it hath 58 degrees. And more forthe toward the parties septemtrionales, it is 62 degrees of heghte, and certyn minutes. For I my self have mesured it by the Astrolabre. Now schulle ze knowe, that azen the Transmontayne, is the tother sterre, that is clept Antartyk; as I have seyd before. And tho 2 sterres ne meeven neverre. And be hem turnethe alle the firmament, righte as dothe a wheel, that turnethe be his axille tree; so that tho sterres beren the firmament in 2 egalle parties; so that it hathe als mochel aboven, as it hath benethen. Afre this, I have gon toward the parties meridionales, that is toward the Southe: and I have founden, that in Lybye, men seen first the sterre Antartyk. And so fer I have gon more in tho contrees, that I have founde that sterre more highe; so that toward the highe Lybye, it is 18 degrees of heghte, and certeyn minutes (of the which, 60 minutes maken a degree) after goynge be see and be londe, toward this contree, of that I have spoke. and to other yles and londes bezonde that contree, I have founden the sterre Antartyk of 33 degrees of hghte, and mo mynutes. And zif I hadde had companye and schippyng, for to go more bezonde, I trowe wel en certyn, that wee scholde have seen alle the roundnesse of the firmament alle aboute. For as I have seyd zou be for, the half of the firmament is betwene tho 2 sterres: the whiche halfondelle I have seyn. And of the other halfondelle, I have seyn toward the Northe, undre the Transmontane 62 degrees and 10 mynutes; and toward the partie meridionale, I have seen undre the Antartyk 33 degrees and 16 mynutes: and thanne the halfondelle of the firmament in alle, ne holdethe not but 180 degrees. And of tho 180, I have seen 62 on that o part, and 33 on that other part, that ben 95 degrees, and nyghe the halfondelle of a degree; and so there ne faylethe but that I have seen alle the firmament, saf 84 degrees and the halfondelle of a degree; and that is not the fourthe part of the firmament. For the 4 partie of the roundnesse of the firmament holt 90 degrees: so there faylethe but 5 degrees and an half of the fourthe partie. And also I have seen the 3 parties of alle the roundnesse of the firmament, and more zit 5 degrees and an half. Be the whiche I seye zou certeynly, that men may envirowne alle the erthe of alle the world, as wel undre as aboven, and turnen azen to his contree, that hadde companye and schippyng conduyt: and alle weyes he scholde fynde men, londes, and yles, als wel as in this countree. For zee wyten welle, that thei that ben toward the Antartyk, thei ben strenghte, feet azen feet of hem, that dwellen undre the transmontane; als wel as wee and thei that dwellyn undre us, ben feet azenft feet. For alle the parties of see and of lond han here appositees, habitables or trepassables, and thei of this half and bezond half. And wytethe wel, that afere that, that I may parceyve and comprehend, the londes of Prestre John, emperour of Ynde ben undre us. For in goynge from Scotland or from Englund toward Jerusalem, men gon upward always. For our lond is in the lowe partie of the erthe, toward the West: and the lond of Prestre John is the lowe partie of the Erthe, toward the Est: and thei han there the day, whan wee have the nyghte, and also highe to the contrarie, thei han the nyghte, whan wee han the day. For the erthe and the see ben of round forme and schapp, as I have seyd befor. And than that men gon upward to o cost, mengone downward to another cost. Also zee have herd me seye, that Jerusalem is in the myddes of the world; and that may men preven and schewen there, be a sphere, that is pighte in to the erthe, upon the hour of midday, whan it is equenoxium, that schewethe no schadwe on no syde. And that it scholde ben in the myddes of the world, David wytnesse the it in the Psautre, where he seythe, Deus operatus est salutē in medio terre. Thanne thei that parten fro the parties of the West, for to go toward Jerusalem, als many iourneyes as thei gon upward for to go thidre, in als many iorneyes may thei gon fro Jerusalem, unto other confynes of the superficialtie of the erthe bezonde. And whan mengon bezonde tho iourneyes, toward Ynde and to the foreyn yles, alle is envoyronynge the roundnesse of the erthe and of the see, undree oure contrees on this half. And therefore hathe it befallen many tymes of o thing, that I have herd counte, whan I was zong; how a worthi man departed sometyme from our countrees, for to go serche the world. And so he passed Ynde, and the yles bezonde Ynde, where ben mo than 5000 yles: and so longe he wente be see and lond, and so envirownd the world be many seysons, that he fond an yle, where he herd speke his own language, callynge on oxen in the plowghe, such wordes as men speken to bestes in his own contree: whereof he hadde gret mervayle: for he knewe not how it myghte be. But I seye, that he had gon so longe, be londe and be see, that he had envyround alle the erthe, that he was comen azen envirownyge, that is to seye, goynge aboute, unto his owne marches, zif he wolde have passed forthe, til he had founden his contree and his owne knouleche. But he turned azen from thens, from whens he was come fro; and so he lost moche peynefulle labour, as him self seyde, a gret while afre, that he was comen hom. For it befelle afre, that he wente in to Norweyge; and there tempest of the see took him; and he arryved in an yle; and whan he was in that yle, he knew wel, that it was the yle, where he had herde speke his owne langage before and the callynge of the oxen at the plowghe: and that was possible thing, but how it semethe to symple men unlerned, that men ne mowe not go undre the erthe, and also that men scholde falle toward the hevne, from undre! But that may not be, upon lesse, than wee mowe falle toward hevne, fro the erthe where we ben. For fro what partie of the erthe, that men duele, outhen aboven or benethen, it semethe alweyes to hem that duellen, that thei gon more righte than any other folk. And righte as it semethe to us, that thei ben undre us, righte so it semethe hem, that wee ben undre hem. For zif a man myghte falle fro the erthe unto the firmament; be grettere refoun, the erthe and the see, that ben so grete and so hevy, scholde fallen to the firmament: but that may not be: and therefore seithe oure Lord God, Non timeas me, qui suspendi terrā ex nichilo? And alle be it, that it be possible thing, that men may so envyronne all the world, natheless of a 1000 perones, on ne myghte not happen to returnen in to his contree. For, for the gretenesse of the erthe and of the see, men may go be a 1000 and a 1000 other weyes, that no man cowde reyde him perfutely toward the parties that he cam fro, but zif it were be aventure and happ, or be the grace of God. For the erthe is fulle large and fulle gret, and holt in roundnesse and aboute envyroun, be aboveven and be beneath 20425 myles, afre the opynoun of the old wise astronomeres. And here seyenges I repreve naughte. But afre my lytyle wyt, it semethe me, sayynge here reverence, that it is more. And for to have bettere understondynge, I seye thus, be ther ymagyned a figure, that hathe a gret compas; and aboute the poynt of the gret compas, that is clept the centre, be made another litille compas: than afre, be the gret compas devised be lines in manye parties; and that alle the lynes meeten at the centre; so that in as manye parties, as the gret compas schal be departed, in als manye, schalle be departed the litille, litille, that is aboute the centre, alle be it, that the spaces ben lesse. Now thanne, be the gret compas represented for the firmament, and the litille compas represented for the erthe. Now thanne the firmament is devysed, be astronomeres, in 12 signes; and every signe is devysed in 30 degrees, that is 360 degrees, that the firmament hathe aboven. Also, be the erthe devysed in als manye parties, as the firmament; and lat every partye answer to a degree of the firmament; and wytethe it wel, that afre the auctoures of astronomye, 700 furlonges of erthe answeren to a degree of the firmament; and tho ben 87 miles and 4 furlonges. Now be that here multiplyed be 360 fithes; and than thei ben 31500 myles, every of 8 furlonges, afre myles of our contree. So moche hathe the erthe in roundnesse, and of heghte envyroun, afre myn opynyoun and myn undirstondynge. And zee schulle undirstonde, that afre opynyoun of olde wise philosophres and astronomeres, oure contree ne Ireland ne Wales ne Scotland ne Norweye ne the other ylles costynge to hem, ne ben not in the superficyalte cownted aboven the erthe; as it schewethe be alle the bokes astronomye. For the superficialtee of the erthe is departed in 7 parties, for the 7 planetes; and tho parties ben clept clymates. And oure parties be not of the 7 clymates: for thei ben descendynge toward the West. And also these yles of Ynde, which beth evene azenst us, beth noght reckned in the clymates: for thei ben azenst us, that ben in the lowe contree. And the 7 clymates strecken hem envyrounyng the world.

II. And I John Maundeville knyghte aboveseyd, (alle thoughe I be unworthi) that departed from our contrees and passed the see, the zeer of grace 1322. that have passed manye londes and manye yles and contrees, and cerched manye fulle straunge places, and have ben in many a fulle gode honourable companye, and at many a faire dede of armes, (alle be it that I dide none myself, for myn unable insuffiance) now I am comen hom (wawgree my self) to reste: for growtes, artetykes, that me distreynen tho diffynen the ende of my labour, azenst my wille (God knowethe.) And thus takynge solace in my wrecched reste, recordynge the tyme passed, I have fulfilled theise thinges and putte hem wryten in this boke, as it wolde come in to my mynde, the zeer of grace 1356 in the 34 zeer that I departede from oure contrees. Wherefore I preye to alle the rederes and hereres of this boke, zif it plesse hem, that thei wolde preye to God for me: and I schalle preye for hem. And alle tho that seyn for me a Pater noster, with an Ave Maria, that God forzeve me my synnes, I make hem partneres and gtaunte hem part of alle the gode pilgrimages and of alle the gode dedes, that I have don, zif ony be to his plesance: and noghte only of tho, but of alle that evere I schalle do unto my lyfes ende. And I beseche Almyghty God, fro whom alle godenes and grace comethe fro, that he vouchesaf, of his excellent mercy and habundant grace, to fulle fylle hire soules with inspiracioun, of the Holy Gost, in makynge defence of alle hire gostly enemyes here in erthe, to hire salvacioun, both of body and soule; to worschipe and thankynge of him, that is three and on, withouten begynnyng and withouten endynge; that is withouten qualitee, good, and witnouten quantytee, gret: that in alle places is present, and alle thinges contenynge; the whiche that no goodnesse may amende, ne non evelle empeyre; that in perfeyte trynytee lyveth and regneth God, be alle worldes and be alle tymes. Amen, Amen, Amen.

The first of our authours, who can be properly said to have written English, was Sir John Gower, who in his Confession of a Lover, calls Chaucer his disciple, and may therefore be considered as the father of our poetry.

NOWE for to speke of the commune,
It is to drede of that fortune,
Which hath befall in in sondrye londes:
But ofte for defaute of bondes
All fodeinly, er it be wist,
A tunne, when his lie arist
Tobreketh, and renneth all aboute,
Which els shulde nought gone out.

And eke full ofte a littell skare
Vpon a bank, er men be ware,
Let in the streme, whiche with gret peine,
If any man it shall restraine.
Where law failleth, errour groweth.
He it not wise, who that ne troweth.
For it hath proued oft er this.
And thus the common clamour is
In euery londe, where people dwelleth:
And eche in his complainte telleth,
How that the worlde is miswent,
And therevpon his argument
Yeueh euery man in sondrie wise:
But what man wolde him selfe auise
His conscience, and nought misuse,
He maie well at the first excuse
His God, whiche euer stant in one,
In him there is defaute none
So must it stand vpon vs selue,
Nought only vpon ten ne twelue,
But plenary vpon vs all.
For man is cause of that shall fall.

The History of our language is now brought to the point at which the history of our poetry is generally supposed to commence, the time of the illustrious Geoffrey Chaucer, who may perhaps, with great justice, be stiled the first of our versifiers who wrote poetically. He does not however appear to have deserved all the praise which he has received, or all the censure that he has suffered, Dryden, who, mistaking genius for learning, in confidence of his abilities, ventured to write of what he had not examined, ascribes to Chaucer the first refinement of our numbers, the first production of easy and natural rhymes, and the improvement of our language, by words borrowed from the more polished languages of the Continent. Skinner contrarily blames him in harsh terms for having vitiated his native speech by whole cartloads of foreign words. But he that reads the works of Gower will find smooth numbers and easy rhymes, of which Chaucer is supposed to have been the inventor, and the French words, whether good or bad, of which Chaucer is charged as the importer. Some innovations he might probably make, like others, in the infancy of our poetry, which the paucity of books does allow us to discover with particular exactness; but the works of Gower and Lydgate, sufficiently evince, that his diction was in general like that of his contemporaries: and some improvements he undoubtedly made by the various dispositions of his rhymes, and by the mixture of different numbers, in which he seems to have been happy and judicious. I have selected several specimens both of his prose and verse; and among them, part of his translation of Boetius, to which another version, made in the time of Mary, is opposed. It would be improper to quote very sparingly an author of so much reputation, or to make very large extracts from a book so generally known.

CHAUCE R.

ALAS! I wepyng am constrained to begin verse of sorrowfull matter, that whilom in florishyng studie made delitable dities. For lo! rendyng muses of Poetes enditen to me thynges to be writen, and drerie teres. At laste no drede ne might overcame tho muses, that thei ne weren fellows, and followeden my waie, that is to saie, when I was exiled, thei that weren of my youth whilom welfull and grene, comforten now sorrowfull wierdes of me olde man: for elde is comen unwarely upon me, hasted by the harmes that I have, and sorowe hath commaunded his age to be in me. Heres hore aren shad overtimeliche upon my hed: and the slacke skinne tremblethe of mine empted bodie. Thilke deth of men is welefull, that he ne cometh not in yeres that be swete, but cometh to wretches often icleped: Alas, alas! with how dese an ere dethe cruell turneth awaie fro wretches, and naieth for to close wepyng eyen. While fortune unfaithfull favoured me with light godes, that sorrowfull houre, that is to saie, the deth, had almoste drete myne hedde: but now for fortune cloudie hath chaunged her decevable chere to meward, myne unpitous life draweth along ungreable dwellynges. O ye my frendes, what, or whereto avanted ye me to ben welfull? For he that hath fallin. stode in no stedfast degre.

IN the mene while, that I still record these thynges, with my self, and marked my wepelie complainte with office of pointell: I saugh stondyng aboven the hight of myn hed a woman of full grete reverence, by semblaunt. Her eyen brennyng, and clere, seying over the common might of menne, with a lively colour, and with soche vigueur and strength that it ne might not be nempned, all were it so, that she were full of so grete age, that menne woulden not trowen in no manere, that she were of our elde.

The stature of her was of doutous judgements, for sometye she constrained and thronke her selven, like, to the common mesure of menne: And sometye it seemed, that she touched the heven with the hight of her hedde. And when she hove her hedde higher, she perced the self heven, so that the sight of menne loking was in ydell: ner clothes wer maked of right delie thredes, and subtel craft of perdurable matter. The whiche clothes she had woven with her owne handes, as I knewe well after by her self declaryng, and shewyng to me the beautie: The whiche clothes a darknesse of a forleten and dispised elde had dusked and darked, as it is wonte to darke by smoked Images.

In the netherest hemme and border of these clothes menne redde woven therein a Grekishe A. that signifieth the life active, and above that letter, in the hiest bordure, a Grekishe C. that signifieth the life contemplative. And betwene these two letters there were seen degrees nobly wrought, in manner of ladders, by which degrees menne might climben from the netherest letter to the upperest: nathelless handes of some men hadden kerve that clothe, by violence or by strength, and everiche manne of hem had borne awaie soche peces, as he might getten. And forsothe this foresaid woman bare

COLVILLE.

ITHAT in tyme of of prosperite, and floryshyng studye, made pleasante and delectable dities, or verses: alas now beyng heauy and sad ouerthrowen in aduersitie, and compelled to fele and tast heuynes and grief. Beholde the muses Poeticall, that is to saye: the pleasure that is in poetes verses, do appoynt me, and compel to writ these verses in meter, and the sorrowfull verses do wet my wretched face with very waterye teares, yssuinge out of my eyes for sorowe. Whiche muses no feare without doate could ouercome, but that they wold folow me in my journey of exile or banishment. Sometye the ioye of happy and lusty delectable youth dyd comfort me, and now the course of sorrowfull olde age causeth me to reioyse. For hasty old age vnlooked for is come vpon me with al her incommodities and euyls, and sorowe hath commaunded and brought me into the same old age, that is to say: that sorowe causeth me to be olde, before my time come of olde age. The hoer heares do grow vntimely vpon my heade, and my reuiled skinne trembleth my flesh, cleane consumed and wasted with sorowe. Mannes death is happy, that cometh not in youth, when a man is lustye, and in pleasure or welth: but in time of aduersitie, when it is often desyred. Alas Alas howe dull and desse be the eares of cruell death vnto men in misery that would sayne dye: and yet refusythe to come and shutte vp theyr carefull wepyng eyes. Whiles that false fortune fauoryd me with her transitorye goodes, then the howre of death had almost ouercom me. That is to say, deathe was redy to oppresse me when I was in prosperitie. Nowe for bycause that fortune beyng turned, from prosperitie into aduersitie (as the clere day is darkyed with cloudes) and hath chaunged her deceyuable countenance: my wretched life is yet prolonged and doth continue in dolour. O my frendes, why houe you so o fen bosted me, saynge that I was happy when I had honor possessions riches, and authoritie whych be trausitory thynges. He that hath fallen was in no stedfast degre.

WHYLES that I considerydde pryuylye with my selfe the thynges before sayd, and descrybed my wofull complaynte after the manner and offyce of a wrytter, me thought I sawe a woman stand ouer my hed of a reuerend countenance, hauing quycke and glysteryng clere eyes, aboue the common sorte of men in lyuely and delectable coloure, and ful of strength, although she semed so olde that by no meanes she is thought to be one of this oure tyme, her stature is of douteful stnowledge, for now she shewethe herselfe at the common length or statour of men, and other whiles she semeth so high, as though she touched heauen with the crown of her hed. And when she wold stretch fourth her hed hygher, it also perced thorough heauen, so that mens syghte could not attaine to behold her. Her vestures or cloths were perfyte of the fyneste thredes, and subtilyl workemanshyp, and of substaunce permanent, whych vestures she had woven with her own hands as I perceyued after by her owne sayne. The kynde or beawtye of the whyche vestures, a certayne darkenes or rather ignoraunce of oldenes forgotten hadde obscuryd and darkened, as the smoke is wont to darken images that stand nyghe the smoke. In the lower parte of the said vestures was read the Greke letter P. wouen whych signifieth practise or actyffe, and in the hygher parte of the vestures the Greke letter T. whych estandeth for theorica, that signifieth speculation or contemplation. And betwene both the sayd letters were sene certayne degreers, wrought after the maner of ladders, wherein was as it were a passage or waye in steppes or degrees from the lower part where the letter P. was which is vnderstand from practys, or actyf, unto the hygher parte wher the letter T. was whych is vnderstand speculation or contemplacion. smale bokes in her right hand, and in her left hand she bare a scepter. And when she sawe these poetical muses approachyng about my bed, and, endityng wordes to my wepynges, she was a little amoved, and glowed with cruell eyen. Who (quoth she) hath suffered approchen to this fike manne these comen strompettes, of which is the place that menne callen Theatre, the whiche onely ne aswagen not his sorrowes with ramedies, but thei would feden and norishe hym with swete venime? Forsothe, that ben tho that with thornes, and prickynges of talentes of affections, which that ben nothyng fructuous nor profitable, distroien the Corne, plentuous of fruites of reson. For thei holden hertes of men in usage, but thei ne deliver no folke fro maladie. But if ye muses had withdrawn fro me with your flatteries any unconnyng and unprofitable manne, as ben wonte to finde comenly among the people, I would well suffre the lasse greuously. For why, in soche an unprofitable man myn ententes were nothing endamaged. But ye withdrawn fro me this man, that hath ben nourished in my studies or scoles of Eleaticis, and of Academicis in Grece. But goeth now rather awaie ye Mermaidens, whiche that ben swete, till it be at the last, and suffreth this man to be cured and heled by my muses, that is to say, by my notefull sciences. And thus this companie of muses iblamed casten wrothly the chere downward to the yerth, and shewing by rednesse ther shame, thei passeden sorrowfully the thresholde. And I of whom the sight plounged in teres was darked, so that I ne might not know what that woman was, of so Imperial auctoritie, I woxe all abashed and stonied, and cast my sight doune to the yerth, and began still for to abide what she would doen afterward. Then came she nere, and set her doune upon the utterest corner of my bed, and she beholdyng my chere, that was cast to the yerth, hevie and grevous of wepyng, complained with these words (that I shall faine) the perturbacion of my thought.

The conclusions of the ASTROLABIE.

This book (written to his son in the year of our Lord 1391, and in the 14 of King Richard II.) standeth so good at this day, especially for the horizon of Oxford, as in the opinion of the learned it cannot be amended, says an Edit. of Chaucer.

LYTEL Lowys my sonne, I perceiue well by certaine evidences thyne abylyte to lerne sciences, touching nombres and proporcions, and also well confydre I thy besey prayer in especyal to lerne the tretise of the astrolabye. Than for as moche as a philosopher saithe, he wrapeth hym in his frende, that condiscendeth to the ryghtfull prayers of his frende: therefore I have given the a sufficient astrolabye for oure orizont, compowned after the latitude of Oxenforde: upon the whiche by mediacion of this lytell tretise, I purpose to teche the a certaine nombre of conclusions, pertaining to this same instrument. I say a certaine nombre of conclusions for thre causes, the first cause is this. Truste wel that al the conclusions that have be founden, or els possiblye might be founde in so noble an instrument as in the astrolabye, ben unknowen perfetely to anye mortal man in this region, as I suppose. Another cause is this, that sothely in any cartes of the astrolabye that I have ysene, ther ben some conclusions, that wol not in al thinges perfourme ther behestes: and some of hem ben to harde to thy tender age of ten yere to conceive. This tretise divided in five partes, wil I shewe the wondir light rules and naked wordes in Englishe, for Latyne ne canst thou nat yet but smale, my litel sonne. But nevertheless suffiseth to the these trewe conclusyons in English, as well as suffiseth to these noble clerkes Grekes these same conclusions in Greke, and to the Arabines in Arabike, and to Jewes in Hebrewe, and to the Latin folke in Latyn: whiche handes of some vyolente perfonen had cut the syde vestures and had taken awaye certayne pecis thereof, such as euery one coulde catch. And she her selfe dyd bare in her ryght hand litel bokes, and in her lefte hande a scepter, which foresayd philosophy (when she saw the muses poetical present at my bed, speking sorrowfull wordes to my wepynges) beyng angry sayd (with terrible or frownyng countenance) who suffred these crafty harlottes to com to this fycke man; whych can help hym by no means of his grieve by any kind of medicines, but rather increase the same with swete poyson. These be they that doo dystroye the fertile and plentious commoditytes of reason and the fruytes thereof wyth their pryckyng thornes, or barren affectes, and accustome or subdue mens myndes with sickenes, and heuynes, and do not delyuer or heale them of the same. But yf your flatterye had conueyed or withdrawn from me, any vnlearned man as the comen sorte of people are wonte to be, I coulde haue ben better contentyd, for in that my worke should not be hurt or hyndered. But you haue taken and conueyed from me this man that hath ben brought vp in the studyes of Aristotel and of Plato. But yet get you hence maremaidens (that seme swete untill you haue brought a man to deathe) and suffer me to heale this my man wyth my muses or sciences that be holesome and good. And after that philosophy had spoken these wordes the sayd companie of the muses poetically beyng rebukyd and sad, cast down their countenance to the ground, and by blussyng confessed their shamfastnes, and went out of the dores. But I (that had my syght dull and blynd with wepyng, so that I knew not what woman this was hauing soo great auctoritie) was amafyed or astonyed, and lokyng downward, towarde the ground, I began pryvlye to look what thyng she would saye ferther, then she had said. Then she approachyng and drawyng nere vnto me, sat doune vpon the vtermoost part of my bed, and lokyng vpon my face sad with wepyng, and declynyng towarde the earth for sorow, bewayled the trouble of my minde with these sayynges folowyng.

whiche Latyn folke had hem firste out of other diuers languages, and write hem in ther owne tonge, that is to faine in Latine.

And God wote that in all these languages and in manye mo, have these conclusyons ben sufficiently lerned and taught, and yet by diuers rules, right as diuers pathes leden diuers folke the right waye to Rome.

Now wol I pray mekely every person discrete, that redeth or hereth this lytel tretise to have my rude ententing excused, and my superfluite of wordes, for two causes. The first cause is, for that curious endityng and hard sentences is full hevy at ones, for soch a child to lerne. And the seconde cause is this, that sothely me semeth better to writen unto a childe twise a gode sentence, than he foriete it ones. And, Lowis, if it be so that I shewe the in my lith Englishe, as trewe conclusions touching this mater, and not only as trewe but as many and subtil conclusions as ben yshewed in Latin, in any comon tretise of the astrolabye, conne me the more thanke, and praye God save the kinge, that is lorde of this langage, and al that him saithe bereth, and obeith everiche in his degree, the more and the lasse. But confydreth well, that I ne usurpe not to have founden this werke of my labour or of myne engin. I name but a leude compilatour of the labour of olde astrologiens, and have it translated in myn Englishe only for thy doctrine: and with this swerde shal I slene envy.

The first party.

The first partye of this tretise shal reherce the figures, and the members of thyne astrolaby, bycause that thou shalte have the greter knowinge of thine owne instrument.

The

The seconde party,

The seconde partye shal teche the to werken the very practice of the foresaid conclusions, as ferforthe and also narowe as may be shewed in so smale an instrument portatife aboute. For wel wote every astrologien, that smallest fractions ne wol not be shewed in so smal an instrument, as in subtil ables calculated for a cause.

The PROLOGUE of the TESTAMENT of LOVE.

MANY men ther ben, that with eres openly sprad so moche swalowen the deliciousnesse of jestes and of ryme, by quaint knittinge coloures, that of the godenesse or of the badnesse of the sentence take they litel hede or els none.

Sothelye dulle witte and a thoughtfulle soule so fore have mined and grafted in my spirites, that soche craft of enditinge woll nat ben of mine acquaintaunce. And for rude wordes and boistous percen the herte of the herer to the inrest point, and planten there the sentence of thynges, so that with litel helpe it is able to spring, this boke, that nothyng hath of the grete flode of wytte, ne of femelyche coloures, is dolven with rude wordes and boistous, and so drawe togidre to maken the catchers thareof ben the more redy to hent sentence.

Some men there ben, that painten with colours riche and some with wers, as with red inke, and some with coles and chalke: and yet is there gode, matter to the leude peple of thylke chalkye purtreiture, as hem thinketh for the time, and afterward the syght of the better colours yeven to hem more joye for the first leudenesse. So sothly this leudle cloudy occupacyon is not to prayse, but by the leude, for comenly leude leudenesse commendeth. Eke it shal yeve fight that other precyous thynges shall be the more in reverence. In Latin and French hath many soveraine wittes had grete delyte to endite, and have many noble thynges fulfild, but certes there ben some that speken their poysye mater in French, of whiche speche the Frenche men have as gode a fantasie as we have in heryng of Frenche mens Englishe. And many termes there ben in Englyshe, whiche unneth we Englishe men connen declare the knowleginge: howe should than a Frenche man borne? soche termes connejumpere in his matter, but as the jay chattereth Englishe, Right so truely the understandyn of Englishmen woll not stretche to the privie termes in Frenche, what so ever we bollen of straunge langage. Let than clerkes enditen in Latin, for they have the propertie of science, and the knowinge in that facultie: and lette Frenchemen in ther Frenche also enditen ther quaint termes, for it is kyndely to ther mouthes; and let us shewe our fantasies in such wordes as we lerneden of our dame's tonge. And although this boke be lytel thank worthy for the leudenesse in travaile, yet soch writing exiten men to thilke thynges that ben necessarie: for every man thereby may as by a perpetual myrrour sene the vices or vertues of other, in whyche thyng lightly may be conceved to eschue perils, and necessities to catch, after as adventures have fallen to other peple or persons.

Certes the soverainst thinge of desire and molt creature resonable, have or els shuld have full appetite to ther perfeccyon; unresonable bestes mowen not, sithe reson hath in hem no workinge: than resonable that wol not, is compared to unresonable, and made lyke hem. Forsothe the most soveraine and final perfeccion of man is in knowynge of a sothe, withouten any entent decevable, and in love of one very God, that is inchaungeable, that is to knowe, and love his creatour.

Nowe principally the mene to brynge in knowleging and lovyng his creatour, is the consideracyon of thynges made by the creatour, wher through by thylke thynges that ben made, understandynge here to our wyttes, arne the unsene pryvities of God made to us syghtfull and knowing, in our contemplacion and understandinge. These thynges than forsothe moche bringen us to the ful knowlegine sothe, and to the parfyte love of the Maker of heavenly thynges. Lo! David saith: thou haste delited me in makinge, as who saith, to have delite in the tune how God hat lent me in consideracion of thy makinge. Wherof Aristotle in the boke de Animalibus, saith to naturell philosophers: it is a grete likynge in love of knowinge the creature: and also in knowinge of causes in kindelye thynges, confidrid, forsothe the formes of kindelye thynges and the shap, a gret kyndely love we shulde have to the wekman that hem made. The crafte of a werkman is shewed in the werk. Herefore trulie the philosophers with a lyvely studie manie noble thynges, righte precious, and worthy to memorye, writen, and by a gret swet and travaille to us lesten of causes the properties in natures of thynges, to whiche therefore philosophers it was more joy, more lykynge, more herty lust in kindely vertues and matters of reson the perfeccion by busy study to knowe, than to have had all the trefour, al the richesse, al the vaine glory, that the passed emperours, princes, or kinges hadden. Therefore the names of hem in the boke of perpetuall memorie in vertue and pece arne writen; and in the contrarie, that is to faine, in Styxe the foule pitte of helle arne thilke pressed that soch godenes hated. And bicause this boke shall be of love, and the prime causes of stering in that doynge with passions and diseses for wantinge of desire, I wil that this boke be cleped the testament of love.

But nowe thou rede, who is thilke that will not in scorne laughe, to here a dwarfe or els halfe a man, say he wil rende out the swerde of Hercules handes, and also he shulde set Hercules Gades a mile yet ferther, and over that he had power of strenght to pull up the spere, that Alifander the noble might never wagge, and that passinge al thinge to ben mayster of Fraunce by might, there as the noble gracious Edward the thirde for al his grete prowesse in victories ne might al yet conquere?

Certes I wote well, ther shall be made more scorne and jape of me, that I so unworthely clothed altogether in the cloudie cloude of unconning, wil putten me in prees to speke of love, or els in the causes of that matter, sithe al the gretest clerkes han had ynough to don, and as who saith gathered up clene toforne hem, and with ther sharp fithes of conning al mowen and made thereof grete rekes and noble, ful of al plenties to fede me and many an other. Envye forsothe commendeth noughte his resen, that he hath in hain, be it never so trusty. And although these noble repers, as gode workmen and worthy ther hier, han al draw and bounde up in the sheves, and made many shokes, yet have I ensample to gadre the smale crommes, and fullin ma walet of tho that fallen from the bourde among the smalle houndes, notwithstanding the travaile of the almoigner, that hath draw up in the cloth al the remissails, as trenchours, and the relese to bere to the almesse. Yet also have I leve of the noble husbnde Boece, although I be a straunger of conninge to come after his doctrine, and these grete workmen, and glene my handfuls of the shedyng after ther handes, and yf me faile ought of my ful, to encrease my porcion with that I shal drawe by privities out of shokes; a flye servaunte in his owne helpe is often moche commended; knowynge of trouthe in causes of thynges, was more hardier in the firste sechers, and so sayth Aristotle, and lighter in us that han folowed after. For ther passing study han freshed our wittes, and oure understandynge han excited in consideracion of trouthe by sharpenes of ther resons. Utterly these thynges be no dremes ne japes, to throwe to hogges, it is lifelych mete for children of trouthe, and as they me betiden whan I pilgramed out of my kith in wintere, whan the wether out of mesure was boistous, and the wyld wynd Boreas, as his kind asketh, with dryinge colds maketh the waves of the ocean so to arise unkindly over the commune bankes that it was in point to spill all the erthe.

The PROLOGUES of the CANTERBURY Tales of CHAUCER, from the MSS.

WHEN that Aprilis with his shouris sote,
The drought of March had perced to the rote,
And bathid every veyn in such licour,
Of which vertue engendrid is the flour.
When Zephyrus eke, with his swete breth
Enspirid hath, in every holt and heth
The tender croppis; and that the yong Sunn
Hath in the Ramm his halve cours yrunn:
And smale foulis makin melodye,
That slepin alle night with opin eye,
(So prickith them nature in ther corage)
Then longin folk to go on pilgrimage:
And palmers for to sekin strange strondes,
To servin hallowes conthe in fondry londes:
And specially fro every shir's end
Of England, to Canterbury they wend,
The holy blisfull martyr for to seke,
That them hath holpin, whan that they were seke:

Befell that in that seson on a day
In Southwerk at the Tabberd as I lay,
Redy to wendin on my pilgrimage
To Canterbury, with devote corage,
At night wer come into that hostery
Welne nine and twenty in a company
Of fundrie folk, by aventure yfall
In felaship; and pilgrimes wer they all:
That toward Canterbury wouldin ride.

The chambers and the stablis werin wide,
And well we werin esid at the best:
And shortly whan the sunne was to rest,
So had I spokin with them everych one,
That I was of ther felaship anone;
And made forward erli for to rise,
To take our weye, ther as I did devise.
But natheles while that I have time and space,
Er' that I farther in this tale pace,
Methinkith it accordaunt to reson,
To tell you alle the condition
Of ech of them, so as it semid me,
And which they werin, and of what Degree,
And eke in what array that they we in:
And at a knight then woll I first begin.

The K N I G H T.

A knight ther was, and that a worthy man
That fro the tyme that he first began
To ridin out, he lovid Chevalrie,
Trowth and honour, fredome and curtesy
Full worthy was he in his Lordis were,
And thereto had he ridden nane more ferre
As well in Christendom, as in Hethnes;
And evyr honoured for his worthines.

At Aleffandre he was whan it was won;
Full oft thimis he had the board begon
Abovin alle naciouns in pruce;
In Lettow had he riddin, and in Luce,
No Christen-man so oft of his degree,
In Granada; in the sieg had he be
Of Algezir, and ridd in Belmary;
At Leyis was he, and at Sataly,
Whan that they wer won; and in the grete see
At many a noble army had he be:

At mortal battails had he ben fiftene,
And foughtin for our feith at Tramesene,
In listis thrys, and alwey slein his fo.

This ilke worthy knight, had been also Sometimis with the lord of Palathy,
Ayens another hethin in Turkey;
And evirmore he had a sov'rane prize;
And though that he was worthy, he was wise;
And of his port as meke as is a maid,
He nevyr yet no villany ne said
In all his life unto no manner wight:
He was a very parfit gentil knight.
But for to tellin you of his array,
His hors were good; but he was nothing gay,
Of fustian he werid a gipon,
Alle besmotrid with his haburgeon.
For he was late ycome from his viage,
And wente for to do his pilgrimage.

The HOUSE of F A M E. The First Boke.

NOW Herken, as I have you faied,
What that I mette or I abraied,
Of December the tenth daie,
When it was night, to slepe I laie,
Right as I was wont for to doen,
And fill allepe wondir sone,
As he that was werie forgo
On Pilgrimage milis two
To the corps of saint Leonarde,
To makin lithe that erst was harde.

But as me slept me mette I was Within a temple imade of glas,
In whiche there werin mo images
Of golde standyng in fondrie stages,
Sette in mor riche tabiracles,
And with perrè mo pinnacles,
And mo curious portraitureis,
And quint manir of figuris
Of golde worke, then I sawe evir.

But certainly I n'ist nevyr
Where that It was, hut well wist I
It was of Venus redily
This temple, for in purtreiture
I sawe anone right her figure
Nakid yfletyng in a se,
And also on her hedde parde
Her rosy garland white and redde,
And her combe for to kembe her hedde,
Her dovis, and Dan Cupido,
Here blindè sonne, and Vulcano,
That in his face ywas full broune.

But as I romid up and doune,
I founde that on the wall there was
Thus wirttin on a table of bras.

I woll now syng, if that I can,
The armis, and also the man,
That first came through his destine
Fugitive fro Troye the countre
Into Itaile, with full moche pine,
Unto the strondis of Lavine,
And tho began the storie anone,
As I shall tellin you echone.

First sawe I the distruction
Of Troie, thorough the Greke Sinon,
With his false untrue forswerynges,
And with his chere and his lesynges,
That made a horse, brought into Troye,
By whiche Trojans losse all their joye.

And aftir this was graved, alas!
How Ilions castill assailed was,

And

THE HISTORY OF THE

And won, and kyng Priamus slain,
And Polites his sonne certain,
Dispitoufly of Dan Pyrrhus.

And next that sawe I howe Venus,
When that she sawe the castill brende,
Doun from hevin she gan descende,
And bade her sonne Æneas fle,
And how he fled, and how that he
Escapid was from all the pres,
And toke his fathre's old Anchises,
And bare hym on his backe awaie,
Crying alas and welawaie!
The whiche Anchises in his hande,
Bare tho the goddis of the lande,
I mene thilke that unbrennid were.

Then sawe I next that all in fere
How Creusa, Dan Æneas wife,
Whom that he lovid all his life,
And her yong sonne clepid Julo,
And eke Ascanius also,
Fleddin eke, with full drierie chere,
That it was pite for to here,
And in a forest as thei went
How at a tournyng of a went Creusa was iloste, alas!
That rede not I, how that it was
How he her fought, and how her ghoste.
Bad hym to fle the Grekis holte,
And saied he must into Itaille,
As was his destinie, fauns faile,
That it was pitie for to here,
When that her spirite gan appere,
The wordis that she to him saied,
And for to kepe her sonne hym praied.

There sawe I gravin eke how he
His fathir eke, and his meinè,
With his shippis began to faile
Toward the countrey of Itaille,
As streight as ere thei mightin go.

There sawe I eke the, cruill Juno,
That art Dan Jupiter his wife,
That hast ihated all thy life
Mercilefs of all the Trojan blode,
Rennin and crie as thou were wode
On Æolus, the god of windes,
To blown out of allè kindes
So loudè, that he should ydrenche
Lorde, and ladie, and grome, and wonche
Of all the Trojanis nacion,
Without any' of their savacion.

There sawe I soche tempest arise,
That every herte might agrise
To se it paintid on the wall.

There sawe I eke gravin withall,
Venus, how ye, my ladie dere,
Ywepying with full wofull chere
Ypraid Jupiter on hie,
To save and kepin that navie
Of that dere Trojan Æneas,
Sithins that he your sonne ywas.

THIS wretched world 'is transmutacion
As wele and wo, now pore, and now honour,
Without ordir or due discrecion
Govirnid is by Fortun'is errour,
But nathèlesse the lacke of her favour
Ne maie not doe me syng though that I die,
J'ay tout perdu, mon temps & mon labour,
For finally Fortune I doe desie.
Yet is me left the sight of my resoun
To knowin frende fro foe in thy mirrour,
So moche hath yet thy tournyng up and doun,
I taughtin me to knowin in an hour,
But truly no force of thy reddour
To hym that ovir hymself hath maistrie,
My suffisaunce yshall be my succour,
For finally Fortune I doe desie.
O Socrates, thou stedfast champion,
She ne might nevir be thy turmentour,
Thou nevir dreddist her oppressioun,
Ne in her chere foundin thou no favour,
Thou knewe wele the disceipt of her colour,
And that her moste worship is for to lie,
I knowe her eke a false dissimulour.
For finally Fortune I doe desie.

The answere of Fortune.

No man is wretchid but himself it wene,
He that yhath hymself hath suffisaunce,
Why saiest thou then I am to the so kene,
That hath thy self out of my govirnaunce?
Saie thus grant mercie of thin habundaunce,
That thou hast lent or this, thou shalt not strive,
What wost thou yet how I the woll avaunce?
And eke thou hast thy bestè frend alive.
I have the taught division betwene
Frende of effeete, and frende of countinaunce,
The nedith not the gallè of an hine,
That curith eyin derke for ther penaunce,
Now seest thou clere that wee in ignoraunce,
Yet holt thine anker, and thou maiest arive
There bountie bereth the key of my substaunce,
And eke thou hast thy bestè frende alive.
How many have I refused to sustene,
Sith I have the fostrid in thy plesaunce?
Wolt thou then make a statute on thy quene,
That I shall be aie at thine ordinaunce?
Thou born art in my reign of variaunce,
About the whele with othir must thou drive
My lore is bet, then wicke is thy grevaunce,
And eke thou hast thy bestè frende alive.

Princes I praie you of your gentilnesse,
Let not this man and me thus crie and plain,
And I shall quitin you this businesse,
And if ye liste releve hym of his pain,

That to some bettir state he maie attain.

Lydgate was a monk of Bury, who wrote about the same time with Chaucer. Out of his prologue to his third book of the Fall of Princes a few stanzas are selected, which, being compared with the style of his two contemporaries, will show that our language was then not written by caprice, but was in a settled state.

LIKE a pilgrime which that goeth on foote,
And hath none horse to releue his trauayle,
Whote, drye and wery, and may finde no bote
Of wel cold whan thrust doth hym assaile,
Wine nor licour, that may to him auayle,
Tight so fare I which in my businesse,
No succour fynde my rudenes to redresse.

I meane as thus, I haue no fresh licour,
Out of the conduites of Calliope,
Nor through Clio in rhetorike no floure,
In my labour for to refresh me:
Nor of the susters in noumber thrife three,
Which with Cithera on Parnaso dwell,
They neuer me gaue drinke once of their wel.

Nor of theyr springes clear and cristaline,
That sprange by touchyng of the Pegase,
Their fauour lacketh my making ten lumine,
I fynde theyr bawme of so great scarcitie,
To tame their tunnes with some drop of plentie
For Poliphemus throw his great blindnes,
Hath in me derked of Argos the brightnes.

Our life here short of wit the great dulnes
The heuy soule troubled with trauayle,
And of memorye the glasfng brotlnes,
Drede and vncunning haue made a strong batail
With werines my spirite to assaile,

And with their subtil creping in most queint
Hath made my spirit in makyng for to feint.

And ouermore, the ferefull frowardnes
Of my stepmother called obliuion,
Hath a bastyll of foryetfulness,
To stoppe the passage, and shadow my reason
That I might haue no clere direccion,
In translating of new to quicke me,
Stories to write of olde antiquite.

Thus was I set and stode in double werre
At the metyng of feareful wayes tweyne,
The one was this, who euer list to lere,
Whereas good wyll gan me constrayne,
Bocchas taccomplish for to doe my payne,
Came ignorance, with a menace of drede,
My penne to rest I durst not procede.

Fortescue was chief justice of the Common-Pleas, in the reign of king Henry VI. He retired in 1471, after the battle of Tewkesbury, and probably wrote most of his works in his privacy. The following passage is selected from his book of the Difference between an absolute and limited Monarchy.

HY T may peradventure be marvelid by some men, why one Realme is a Lordshyp only Royall, and the Prynce thereof rulyth yt by his Law, callid Jus Regale; and another Kyngdome is a Lordschip, Royal and Politike, and the Prince thereof rulyth by a Lawe, callid Jus Politicum & Regale; sythen thes two Princes beth of egall Astate.

To this dowte it may be answered in this manner; The first Infitution of thes two Realmys, upon the Incorporation of them, is the cause of this diversyte.

When Nembroth by Might, for his own Glorie, made and incorporate the first Realme, and subduyd it to hymself by Tyrannye, he would not have it governyd by any other Rule or Lawe, but by his own Will; by which and for th' accomplishment thereof he made it. And therfor, though he had thus made a Realme, holy Scripture denyd to cal hym a Kyng, Quia Rex dicitur a Regendo; Whych thyng he dyd not, but oppresyd the People by Myght, and therfor he was a Tyrant, and callid Primus Tyrannorum. But holy Writ callith hym Robustus Venator coram Deo. For as the Hunter takyth the wyld beste for to sle and eate hym; so Nembroth subduyd to him the People with Might, to have their service and their goods, using upon them the Lordschip that is callid Dominium Regale tantum. After hym Belus that was callid first a Kyng, and after hym his Sone Ninus, and after hym other Panymys; They, by Example of Nembroth, made them Realmys, would not have them rulyd by other Lawys than by their own Wills. Which Lawys ben right good under good Princes; and their Kyngdoms a then most resemblyd to the Kyngdome of God, which renyith upon Man, rulyng him by hys own Will. Wherfor many Crystyn Princes usen the same Lawe; and therfor it is, that the Lawys sayen, Quod Principi placuit Legis habet vigorem. And thus I suppose first beganne in Realmys, Dominium tantum Regale. But afterward, when mankynd was more mansuete, and better disposyd to Vertue, Grete Communalities, as was the Feliship, that came into this Lond with Brute, wylling to be unyed and made a Body Politike callid a Realme, havynge an Heed to governe it; as after the Saying of the Philosopher, every Commualtie unyed of many parts must needs have an Heed; than they chose the same Brute to be their Heed and Kyng. And they and he upon this Incorporation and Infitution, and onyng of themselves into a Realme, ordeynyd the same Realme so to be rulyd and justfyd by such Laws, as they al would assent to; which Law therfor is callid Politicum; and bycause it is mynystrid by a Kyng, it is callid Regale. Dominium Politicum dicitur quasi Regimen, plurimum Scientia, seu Concilio ministratum

ministratum. The Kyng of Scotts reynith upon his People by this Lawe, videlicet, Regimine Politico et Regali. And as Diodorus Syculus saith, in his Boke de prisceis Historiis, The Realme of Egypte is rulid by the same Lawe, and therfor the Kyng therof chaungith not his Laws, without the Assent of his People. And in like forme as he saith is ruled the Kyngdome of Saba, in Felici Arabia, and the Lond of Libie; And also the more part of al the Realmys in Afrike. Which manner of Rule and Lordship, the sayd Diodorus in that Boke, praystith gretely. For it is not only good for the Prince, that may therby the more sewerly do Justice, than by his own Arbitriment; but it is also good for his People that receyve therby, such Justice as they desyer themself. Now as me seemeth, it ys shewyd opynly ynough, why one Kyng rulyth and reynith on his People Dominio tantum Regali, and that other reynith Dominio Politico & Regali: For that one Kyngdome beganne, of and by, the Might of the Prince, and that other beganne, by the Desier and Institution of the People of the same Prince.

Of the Works of Sir Thomas More it was necessary to give a larger specimen, both because our language was then in a great degree formed and settled, and because it appears from Ben Jonson, that his works were considered as models of pure and elegant style. The tale, which is placed first, because earliest written, will show what an attentive reader will, in perusing our old writers, often remark, that the familiar and colloquial part of our language, being diffused among those classes who had no ambition of refinement, or affectation of novelty, has suffered very little change. There is another reason why the extracts from this author are more copious: his works are carefully and correctly printed, and may therefore be better trusted than any other edition of the English books of that, or the preceding ages.

A merry iest how a sergeant would learne to playe the frere. Written by maister Thomas More in hys youth.

WYSE men alway,
Affirme and say,
That best is for a man:
Diligently,
For to apply,
The buiness that he can,
And in no wyse,
To enterpryse,
An other faculte,
For he that wyll,
And can no skyll,
Is neuer lyke to the.
He that hath laste,
The hosiers craft,
And falleth to making shone,
The smythe that shall,
To payntyng fall,
His thrift is well nigh done.
A blacke draper,
With whyte paper,
To goe to writyng scole,
An olde butler,
Becum a cutler,
I wene shall proue a sole.
And an olde trot,
That can I wot,
Nothyng but kisse the cup,
With her phisick,
Wil kepe one sicke,
Tyll she have foused hym vp.
A man of lawe,
That neuer sawe,
The wayes to bye and sell,
Wenyng to ryse,
By merchaundise,
I wish to spede hym well.
A merchaunt eke,
That wyll goo seke,
By all the meanes he may,
To fall in sute,
Tyll he dispute,
His money cleane away,
Pletyng the lawe,
For every strawe,
Shall proue a thrifty man,
With bate and strife,
But by my life,
I cannot tell you whan.
Whan an hatter
Wyll go smatter
In philosophy,

Or a pedlar,
Ware a medlar,
In theology,
All that ensue,
Such craftes new,
They driue so farre a cast,
That euermore,
They do therfore,
Beshrewe themselfe at last.
This thing was tryed
And veriefyed,
Here by a sergeant late,
That thrifly was,
Or he coule pas,
Rapped about the pate,
Whyle that he would
See how he could,
A little play the frere:
Now yf you wyll,
Knowe how it fyll,
Take hede and ye shall here.
It happed so,
Not long ago,
A thrifty man there dyed,
An hundred ponde,
Of nobles rounde,
That had he layd a side:
His sonne he wolde,
Should haue this golde,
For to beginne with all:
But to suffise
His childe, well thrife,
That money was to smal.
Yet or this day
I have hard say,
That many a man certesse,
Hath with good cast,
Be ryche at last,
That hath begonne with lesse.
But this yonge manne,
So well beganne,
His money to imploy,
That certainly,
His policy,
To see it was a joy,
For lest sum blast,
Myght ouer cast,
His ship, or by mischaunce,
Men with sum wile,
Myght hym begyle,
And minish his substaunce,

For to put out,
Al maner dout,
He made a good puruay,
For euery whyt,
By his owne wyt,
And toke an other way:
First fayre and wele
Therof much dele,
He dygged it in a pot,
But then him thought,
That way was nought,
And there he left it not.
So was he faine,
From thence agayne,
To put it in a cup,
And by and by,
Couetously,
He supped it fayre vp,
In his owne brest,
He thought it best,
His money to enclose,
Then wist he well,
What euer fell,
He coule it neuer lose.
He borrowed then,
Of other men,
Money and marchaundise:
Neuer paid it,
Up he laid it,
In like maner wyse.
Yet on the gere,
That he would were,
He reight not what he spent,
So it were nyce,
As for the price,
Could him not miscontent.
With lusty sporte,
And with resort,
Of ioly company,
In mirth and play,
Full many a day,
He liued merely.
And men had sworne,
Some men is borne,
To have a lucky howre,
And so was he,
For such degre,
He gat and fuche honour,
That without dout,
Whan he went out,
A sergeant well and fayre,

Was

E N G L I S H L A N G U A G E.

Was redy strayte,
On him to wayte,
As sone as on the mayre.
But he doubtlesse,
Of his mekenesse,
Hated such pompe and pride,
And would not go,
Companied so,
But drewe himself a side,
To saint Katharine,
Straight as a line,
He gate him at a tyde,
For deuocion,
Or promocion,
There would he nedes abyde.
There spent he fast,
Till all were past,
And to him came there meny,
To aske theyr det,
But none could get,
The valour of a peny.
With visage stout,
He bare it out,
Euen vnto the harde hedge,
A month or twaine,
Tyll he was fayne,
To laye his gowne to pledge.
Than was he there,
In greater feare,
Than ere that he came thither,
And would as fayne,
Depart againe,
But that he wist not whither.
Than after this,
To a frende of his,
He went and there abode,
Where as he lay,
So sick alway,
He myght not come abrode.
It happed than,
A marchant man
That he ought money to,
Of an Officere,
Than gan enquire,
What him was best to do.
And he answerde,
Be not aferde,
Take an accion therfore,
I you behest,
I shall hym reste,
And than care for no more:
I feare quod he,
It wyll not be,
For he wyll not come out.
The sergeaunt said,
Be not afrayd,
It shall be brought about.
In many a game,
Lyke to the same,
Haue I bene well in vre,
And for your sake,
Let me be bake,
But yf I do this cure.
Thus part they both,
And fourth then goth,
A pace this officere,
And for a day,
All his array,
He chaunged with a frere.

So was he dight,
That no man might,
Hym for a frere deny,
He dopped and dooked,
He spake and looked,
So religiously.
Yet in a glasse,
Or he would passe,
He toted and he peered,
His harte for pryde,
Lepte in his syde,
To see how well he freered.
Than forth a pace,
Unto the place,
He goeth withouten shame
To do this dede.
But now take hede,
For here begynneth the game.
He drew hym ny,
And softly,
Streight at the dore he knocked:
And a damsell,
That hard hym well,
There came and it vnlocked.
The frere sayd,
Good spede sayre mayd,
Here lodgeth such a man,
It is told me:
Well syr quod she,
And yf he do what than?
Quod he maystresse,
No harm doutlesse:
It longeth for our order,
To hurt no man,
But as we can,
Euery wight to forder.
With hym truly,
Fayne speake would I.
Sir quod she by my fay,
He is so like,
Ye be not like,
To speake with hym to day.
Quod he sayre may,
Yet I you pray,
This much at my desire,
Vouchesafe to do,
As go hym to,
And say an austen frere
Would with hym speke,
And matters breake,
For his auayle certayn.
Quod she I wyll,
Stond ye here styll,
Tyll I come downe agayn.
Vp is she go,
And told hym so,
As she was bode to fay,
He mistrustyng,
No maner thyng,
Sayd mayden go thy way,
And fetch him hyder,
That we togyder,
May talk. A downe she gothe,
Vp she hym brought,
No harme she thought,
But it made some folke wrothe.
This officere,
This fayned frere,
Whan he was come aloft,

He dopped than,
And grete this man,
Religiously and oft.
And he agayn,
Ryght glad and fayn,
Toke hym there by the hande,
The frere than sayd,
Ye be dismayd,
With trouble I understande.
In dede quod he,
It hath with me,
Bene better than it is.
Syr quod the frere,
Be of good chere,
Yet shall it after this.
But I would now,
Comen with you,
In counsaile yf you please,
Or ellys nat,
Of matters that,
Shall set your heart at ease.
Downe went the mayd,
The marchaunt sayd,
Now say on gentle frere,
Of thys tydyng,
That ye me bryng,
I long full fore to here.
Whan there was none,
But they alone,
The frere with euyll grace,
Sayd, I rest the,
Come on with me,
And out he toke his mace:
Thou shalt obay,
Come on thy way,
I have the in my clouche,
Thou goest not hence,
For all the pense,
The mayre hath in his pouche.
This marchaunt there,
For wrath and fere,
He waxyng welnygh wood,
Sayd horfon thefe,
With a mischefe,
Who hath taught the thy good.
And with his fist,
Vpon the lyst,
He gaue hym such a blow,
That backward downe,
Almost in fowne,
The frere is ouerthrow.
Yet was this man,
Well fearder than,
Lest he the frere had slayne,
Tyll with good rappes,
And heuy clappes,
He dawde hym vp agayne.
The frere toke harte,
And vp he starte,
And well he layde about,
And so there goth,
Betwene them both,
Many a lusty clout.
They rent and tere,
Eche others here,
And claue togyder fast,
Tyll with luggyng,
And with tuggyng,
They fell downe bothe at last.

Than

THE HISTORY OF THE

Than on the ground,
Togyder rounde,
With many a sadde stroke,
They roll and rumble,
They turne and tumble,
As pygges do in a poke.
So long aboue,
They heue and shoue,
Togyder that at last
The mayd and wyfe,
To breake the strife,
Heyd them upward fast.
And when they spye,
The captaynes lye,
Both waltring on the place,
The freres hood,
They pulled a good,
Adowne about his face.
While he was blynde,
The wenche behynde,
Lent him leyd on the flore,
Many a ioule,
About the noule,
With a great batydore.

The wyfe came yet,
And with her fete,
She holpe to kepe him downe.
And with her rocke,
Many a knocke,
She gaue him on the crowne.
They layd his mace,
About his face,
That he was wood for payne:
The fryre frappe,
Gate many a swappe,
Tyll he was full nigh slayne.
Vp they him lift,
And with yll thrift,
Hedlyng a logg the stayre,
Downe they hym threwe,
And sayde adewe,
Commende us to the mayre.
The frere arose,
But I suppose,
Amased was his hed,
He shoke his eares,
And from grete feares,
He thought hym well yfled.

Quod he now lost,
Is all this cost,
We be neuer the nere,
Ill mote he be,
That caused me,
To make my self a frere.
Now Masters all,
Here now I shall,
Ende there as I began,
In any wyse,
I would auyse,
And counsayle euery man,
His owne craft vse,
All newe refuse,
And lyghtly let them gone:
Play not the frere,
Now make good chere,
And welcome euerych one.

A ruful lamentation (written by master Thomas More in his youth) of the deth of quene Elisabeth mother to king Henry the eight, wife to king Henry the seuenth, and the eldest daughter to king Edward the fourth, which quene Elisabeth dyed in childbed in February in the yere of oure Lord 1503, and in the 18 yere of the raigne of king Henry the seuenth.

O YE that put your trust and confidence,
In wordly ioy and frayle prosperite,
That so lyue here as ye should neuer hence,
Remember death and loke here vpon me.
Ensauple I thinke there may no better be.
Your selfe wotte well that in this realme was I,
Your quene but late, and lo now here I ly.
Was I not borne of olde worthy linage?
Was not my mother queene, my father kyng?
Was I not a kinges fere in marriage?
Had I not plenty of euery pleasaunt thing?
Mercifull God this is a straunge reckenyng:
Rychesse, honour, welth, and auncestry,
Hath me forsaken and lo now here I ly.
If worship myght haue kept me, I had not gone.
If wyt myght haue me saued, I neded not fere.
If money myght haue holpe, I lackd none.
But O good God what vayleth all this gere.
When deth is come thy mighty messangere,
Obey we must there is no remedy,
Me hath he summoned, and lo now here I ly.
Yet was I late promised otherwyse,
This yere to liue in welth and delice.
Lo where to commeth thy blandishyng promyse,
O false astrolagy and deuynatrice,
Of goddes secretes makyng thy selfe so wyse.
How true is for this yere thy prophecy,
The yere yet lasteth, and lo nowe here I ly.
O brytill welth, as full of bitternesse,
Thy sngle pleasure doubled is with payne.
Account my sorow first and my distresse,
In sondry wyse, and reckon there agayne.
The joy that I haue had, and I dare sayne,
For all my honour, endured yet haue I,
More wo then welth, and lo now here I ly.
Where are our castels, now where are our towers,
Goodly Rychmonde sone art thou gone from me,
At Westminster that costly worke of yours,
Myne owne dere lorde now shall I neuer see.

Almighty God vouchesafe to graunt that ye,
For you and your children well may edefy.
My palyce byided is, and lo now here I ly.
Adew myne owne dere spouse my worthy lorde,
The faithfull loue, that dyd vs both combyne,
In mariage and peafable concorde,
Into your handes here I cleane refyne,
To be bestowed vpon your children and myne.
Erst wer you father, and now must ye supply,
The mothers part also, for lo now here I ly.
Farewell my daughter lady Margarete.
God wotte full oft it greued hath my mynde,
That ye should go where we should seldom mete.
Now am I gone, and haue leste you behynde.
O mortall folke that we be very blynde,
That we least feare, full oft it is most nye.
From you depart I fyrst, and lo now here I ly.
Farewell Madame my Lordes worthy mother,
Comfort your sonne, and be ye of good chere.
Take all a worth, for it will be no nother.
Farewell my daughter Katherine late the fere,
To prince Arthur myne owne chylde so dere,
It booteth not for me to wepe or cry,
Pray for my soule, for lo now here I ly.
Adew lord Henry my louing sonne adew.
Our lorde encrease your honour and estate,
Adew my daughter Mary bright of hew,
God make you virtuous wyfe and fortunate.
Adew swete hart my litle daughter Kate,
Thou shalt swete babe suche is thy desteny,
Thy mother neuer know for lo now here I ly.
Lady Cicely Anne and Katheryne,
Farewell my welbeloued sisters three,
O lady Briget other sister myne,
Lo here the ende of wordly vanitee.
Now well are ye that earthly folly flee,
And heuenly thynges loue and magnify,
Farewell and pray for me, for lo now here I ly.
Adew my lordes, adew my ladies all,
Adew my faithful seruantes euerych one,
Adew my commons whom I never shall
See in this world, wherefore to the alone,
Immortall God verily three and one,
I me commende. Thy infinite mercy,
Shew to thy seruant, for lo now here I ly.

Certain

E N G L I S H L A N G U A G E.

Certain meters in English written by master Thomas More in hys youth for the boke of fortune, and caused them to be printed in the beginnyng of that boke.

The wordes of Fortune to the people.

MINE high state power and auctoritie,
If ye ne know, enserche and ye shall spy,
That richesse, worship, welth, and dignitie,
Joy, rest, and peace, and all thyng fynally,
That any pleasure or profit may come by,
To mannes comfort, ayde and sustinance,
Is all at my deuyse and ordinaunce.

Without my fauour there is nothyng wonne.
Many a matter haue I brought at last,
To good conclusion, that fondly was begonne.
And many a purpose, bounden sure and fast
With wise prouision, I haue ouercast.
Without good happe, there may no wit suffice.
Better is to be fortunate than wyse.

And therefore hath there some men bene or this,
My deadly foes and written many a boke,
To my dispraise. And other cause there nys,
But for me list not frendly on them loke,
Thus lyke the fox they fare that once forfoke,
The pleasaunt grapes, and gan for to defy them,
Because he lept and yet could not come by them.

But let them write theyr labour is in vayne.
For well ye wote, myrth, honour, and richesse,
Much better is than penury and payne.
The nedy wretch that lingereth in distresse,
Without myne helpe is euer comfortlesse,
A very burden odious and loth,
To all the world, and eke to him selfe both.

But he that by my fauour may ascende,
To mighty power and excellent degree,
A common wele to gouerne and defende,
O in how blist condicion standeth he:
Him self in honour and felicity,
And over that, may forther and encrease,
A region hole in joyfull rest and peace.

Now in this poynt there is no more to say,
Eche man hath of him self the gouernaunce.
Let euery wight than folowe his owne way.
And he that out of pouertee and mischaunce,
List for to liue, and wyll him selfe enhaunce,
In wealth and richesse, come forth and wayte on me.
And he that wyll be a beggar, let him be,

THOMAS MORE to them that trust in Fortune.

THOU that are prowde of honour, shap or kynne,
That hepest vp this wretched worldes treasure,
Thy fingers shrined with gold, thy tawny skynne,
With fresh apparyle garnished out of measure,
And weneest to haue fortune at thy pleasure,
Cast vp thyne eye, and loke how slipper chaunce.
Illudeth her men with chaunge and varyaunce.

Sometyme she loketh as louely, fayre and bright,
As goodly Uenus mother of Cupyde,
She beckett and she smileth on euery wight.
But this chere fayned, may not long abide.
There cometh a cloude, and farewell all our pryde.
Like any serpent she beginneth to swell,
And looketh as fierce as any fury of hell.

Yet for all that we brotle men are fayne,
(So wretched is our nature and so blynde)
As soone as Fortune list to laugh agayne,
With fayre countenance and disceitfull mynde,
To crouche and knele and gape after the wynde,

Not one or twayne but thousandes in a rout,
Lyke swarmyng bees come flickeryng her aboute.

Then as a bayte she bryngeth forth her ware,
Siluer, gold, riche perle, and precious stone:
On whiche the mased people gase and stare,
And gape therefore, as dogges doe for the bone.
Fortune at them laugheth, and in her trone
Amyd her treasure and wauering richesse,
Prowdly she houeth as lady and empresse.

Fast by her syde doth very labour stand,
Pale fere also, and sorrow all bewept,
Disdayn and hatred on that other hand,
Eke restles watche fro slepe with trauayle kept,
His eyes drowsy and lookyng as he slept.
Before her standeth daunger and enuy.
Flattery, dysceit, mischiese and tiranny.

About her cometh all the world to begge.
He asketh lande, and he to pas would bryng,
This toye and that, and all not worth an egge:
He would in loue prosper aboute all thyng:
He kneleth downe and would be made a kyng:
He forceth not so he may money haue,
Though all the worlde accompte hym for a knaue.

Lo thus ye see diuers heddes, diuers wittes.
Fortune alone as diuers as they all,
Vnstable here and there among them flittes:
And at auenture downe her giftes fall,
Catch who so may she throweth great and small
Not to all men, as commeth sonne or dewe,
But for the most part, all among a fewe.

And yet her brotelle giftes, long may not last,
He that she gaue them, loketh prowde and hye.
She whirleth about and pluckth away as fast,
And geueth them to an other by and by.
And thus from man to man continually,
She vseth to geue and take, and slyly tosse,
One man to wyning of an others losse.

And when she robbeth one, down goth his pryde.
He wepeth and wayleth and curseth her full sore.
But he that receueth it, on that other syde.
Is glad, and blest her often tymes therefore.
But in a whyle when she loueth hym no more,
She glydeth from hym, and her giftes to,
And he her curseth, as other fooles do.

Alas the folysh people can not cease,
Ne voyd her trayne, tyll they the harme do fele.
About her alway, besely they preace.
But lord how he doth thynk hym self full wele.
That may set once his hande vpon her whele.
He holdeth fast: but vpward as he lieth,
She whippeth her whele about, and there he lyeth.

Thus fell Julius from his mighty power.
Thus fell Darius the worthy kyng of Perse.
Thus fell Alexander the great conquerour.
Thus many mo then I may well reherse.
Thus double fortune, when she lyst reuerse
Her slipper fauour fro them that in her trust,
She fleeth her wey and leyeth them in the dust.

She sodeinly enhaunceth them aloft.
And sodeynly mischeuth all the flocke,
The head that late lay easily and full soft,
In stede of pylows lyeth after on the blocke.
And yet alas the most cruell proude mocke:
The deyntie mowth that ladyes kissed haue,
She bryngeth in the case to kyssie a knaue.

In chaungyng of her course, the chaunge shewth this
Vp starth a knaue, and downe there falth a knight,
The beggar ryche, and the ryche man pore is.
Hatred is turned to loue, loue to despyght.
This is her sport, thus proueth she her myght.

Great

THE HISTORY OF THE

Great boote she maketh yf one be by her power,
Welthy and wretched both within an howre.

Pouertee that of her giftes wyl nothing take,
With mery chere, looketh vpon the prece,
And seeth how fortunes household goeth to wrake.
Fast by her standeth the wise Socrates
Aristippus, Pythagoras, and many a lese
Of olde philosophers. And eke agaynst the sonne
Bekyth hym poore Diogenes in his tonne.

With her is Byas, whose countrey lackt defence,
And whylom of their foes stode so in dout,
That eche man hastily gan to cary thence,
And asked hym why he nought caryed out.
I bere quod he all myne with me about:

Wisedom he ment, not fortunes brotle fees.
For nought he counted his that he might leese.

Heraclitus eke, lyst felowship to kepe
With glade pouertee, Democritus also:
Of which the fyrst can neuer cease but wepe,
To see how thick the blynded people go,
With labour great to purchase care and wo.
That other laugheth to see the foolys apes,
How earnestly they walk about theyr capes.

Of this poore sect, it is comen vsage,
Onely to take that nature may sustayne,
Banishing cleane al other surplufage,
They be content, and of nothyng complayne.
No nygarde eke is of his good so fayne.
But they more pleasure haue a thousande fold,
The secrete draughtes of nature to beholde.

Set fortunes seruauntes by them and ye wull,
That one is free, that other euer thrall,
That one content, that other neuer full.
That one in suretye, that other lyke to fall.
Who lyst to aduise them bothe, perceyue he shall,
As great difference between them as we see,
Betwixte wretchednes and felicitye.

Nowe haue I shewed you bothe: these whiche ye lyst,
Stately fortune, or humble pouertee:

That is to saye, nowe lyeth it in your fyft,
To take here bondage, or free libertee.
But in thys poynte, and ye do after me,
Draw you to fortune, and labour her to please,
If that ye thynke your selfe to well at ease.

And fyrst vpon the louely shall she smile,
And frendly on the cast her wandering eyes,
Embrace the in her armes, and for a whyle,
Put the and kepe the in a foolles paradise:
And fourth with all what so thou lyst deuise,
She wyll the graunt liberally parhappes:
But for all that beware of after clappes.

Recken you neuer of her fauoure sure:
Ye may in clouds as easily trace an hare,
Or in drye lande cause fishes to endure,
And make the burning fyre his heate to spare,
And all thys worlde in compace to forfare,
As her to make by craft or engine stable,
That of her nature is euer variable.

Serue her day and nyght as reuerently,
Vpon thy knees as any seruaunt may,
And in conclusion, that thou shalt winne thereby
Shall not be worth thy servyce I dare say.
And looke yet what she geueth the to day,
With labour wonne she shall happily to morow
Plucke it agayne out of thyne hand with forow.

Wherefore yf thou in suretye lyst to stande,
Take pouerties parte, and let proud fortune go,
Receyue nothyng that cometh from her hande.
Loue maner and vertue: they be onely tho.
Whiche double fortune may not take the fro.

Then mayst thou boldly desye her turnyng chaunce:
She can the neyther hynder nor auance.

But and thou wylt nedes medle with her treasure,
Trust not therein, and spend it liberally.
Beare the not proude, nor take not out of measure.
Bylde not thyne house on heyth vp in the skye
Nonne falleth farre, but he that climbeth hye,
Remember nature sent the hyther bare,
The gyftes of fortune count them borrowed ware.

THOMAS MORE to them that seke Fortune.

WHO so delyteth to prouen and assay,
Of waveryng fortune the vncertayne lot,
If that the aunswere please you not alway,
Blame ye not me: for I commaunde you not,
Fortune to trust, and eke full well ye wot,
I haue of her no brydle in my fist,
She renneth loose, and turneth where she lyst.

The rollyng dyse, in whom your lucke doth stande,
With whose vnhappy chaunce ye be so wroth,
Ye knowe your selfe came neuer in myne hande.
Lo in this ponde be fysh and frogges both.
Cast in your nette: but be you lief or lothe,
Hold you content as fortune lyst assyue:
For it is your owne fyshyng and not myne.

And though in one chaunce fortune you offend,
Grudge not there at, but beare a mery face.
In many an other she shall it amende.
There is no manne so farre out of her grace,
But he some tyme hath comfort and solace:
Ne none agayne so farre forth in her fauour,
That is full satisfyed with her behauiour.

Fortune is stately, solemne, prowde, and hye:
And rycheffe geueth, to haue seruyce therefore.
The nedy begger catcheth an halspeny:
Some manne a thousande pounce, some lesse some more.
But for all that she kepeth euer in store,
From euery manne some parcell of his wyll,
That he may pray therfore and serue her styll.

Some manne hath good, but chyldren hath he none.
Some manne hath both, but he can get none health,
Some hath al thre, but vp to honours trone,
Can he not crepe, by no maner of stelh.
To some she sendeth children, ryches, welth,
Honour, woorthyp, and reuerence all hys life:
But yet she pyncheth hym with a shrewde wyfe.

Then for asmuch as it is fortunes guyse,
To graunte no manne all thyng that he wyll axe,
But as her selfe lyst order and deuise,
Doth euery manne his parte diuide and tax,
I counsaile you eche one truste vp your packes,
And take no thyng at all, or be content,
With suche rewarde as fortune hath you sent.

All thynges in this boke that ye shall rede,
Doe as ye lyst, there shall no manne you bynde,
Them to beleue, as surely as your crede.
But notwithstanding certes in my mynde,
I durst well swere, as true ye shall them fynde,
In euery poynt eche answere by and by,
As are the iudgementes of astronomye.

The Descripcion of RICHARD the thirde.

RICHARDE the third sonne, of whom we nowe entreate, was in witte and courage egall with either of them, in bodye and prowesse farre vnder them bothe, little of stature, ill fetured of limmes, croke backed, his left shoulder much higher than his right, hard fauoured of visage, and such as is in states called warlye, in other menne otherwise.
he

he was malicious, wrathfull, enuious, and from afore his birth, euer frowarde. It is for trouth reported, that the duches his mother had so much a doe in her trauaile, that she coulde not bee deliuered of hym uncutte; and that hee came into the worlde with the feete forwarde, as menne bee borne outwarde, and (as the fame runneth) also not vntothed, whither menne of hatred reporte aboue the trouthe, or elles that nature chaunged her course in hys beginninge, whiche in the course of his lyfe many thinges vnnaturallie committed. None euill captaine was hee in the warre, as to whiche his disposition was more metely then for peace. Sundrye victories hadde hee, and sommetime ouerthrowes, but neuer in defaulte as for his owne persone, either of hardinesse or polityke order, free was hee called of dyspence, and somewhat aboue his power liberall, with large giftes hee get him vnstedfaste friendshippe, for whiche hee was fain to pil and spoyle in other places, and get him stedfast hatred. Hee was close and secrete, a deepe dissimuler, lowlye of counteynaunce, arrogant of heart, outwardly coumpinable where he inwardely hated, not letting to kisse whome hee thoughte to kyll: dispiteous and cruell, not for euill will alway, but after for ambicion, and either for the suretie or encrease of his estate. Frende and foe was muche what indifferent, where his aduantage grew, he spared no mans deathe, whose life withstode his purpose. He slewe with his owne handes king Henry the sixt, being prisoner in the Tower, as menne constantly saye, and that without commaundement or knowledge of the king, which woulde vndoubtedly yf he had intended that thinge, haue appointed that boocherly office to some other then his owne borne brother.

Somme wise menne also weene, that his drift couertly conuayde, lacked not in helping furth his brother of Clarence to his death: whiche he resisted openly, howbeit somewhat (as menne deme) more faintly then he that wer hartely minded to his welth. And they that thus deme, thinke that he long time in king Edwardes life, forethought to be king in that case the king his brother (whose life hee looked that euill dyete shoulde shorten) should happen to decease (as in dede he did) while his children wer yonge. And thei deme, that for thys intente he was gladde of his brothers death the duke of Clarence, whose life must nedes haue hindered hym so entendinge, whither the same duke of Clarence hadde kepte him true to his nephew the yonge king, or enterprised to be kynge himselfe. But of al this pointe, is there no certaintie, and whoso diuineth vpon coniectures, maye as wel shote to farre as to short. Howbeit this haue I by credible informacion learned, that the selfe nighte in whiche kynge Edward died, one Mylkebrooke longe ere mornynge, came in greate haste to the house of one Pottyer dwelling in Reddecrosse strete without Crepulgate: and when he was with hastye rappinge quickly letten in, hee shewed vnto Pottyer that kynge Edward was departed. By my trouthe manne quod Pottyer then wyll my mayster the duke of Gloucester bee kynge. What cause hee hadde foe to thynke harde it is to saye, whyther hee being toward him, anye thyng knewe that hee suche thyng purposed, or otherwyse had anye inkelynge thereof: for hee was not likelye to speake it of nought.

But nowe to returne to the course of this hystorie, were it that the duke of Gloucester hadde of old foreminde this conclusion, or was nowe at erste thereunto moued, and putte in hope by the occasion of the tender age of the younge princes, his nephues (as opportunitie and lykelyhoode of spede, putteth a manne in courage of that he neuer intended) certayn is it that hee contriued their destruccion, with the vsurpacion of the regal dignitie vpon hymselfe. And for as muche as hee well wiste and holpe to mayntayn, a long continued grudge and hearte brennyng betwene the quenes kinred and the kinges blood eyther partye enuying others authoritye, hee nowe thought that their deuision shoulde bee

(as it was in dede) a fortherlye begynnyng to the pursuite of his intente, and a sure ground for the foundation of al his building yf he might first vnder the pretext of reuengynge of olde displeasure, abuse the anger and ygnorance of the one partie, to the destruccion of the tother: and then wyne to his purpose as manye as he coulde: and those that coulde not be wonne, myght be loste ere they looked therefore. For of one thyng was he certayne, that if his entente were perceiued, he shold soone haue made peace betwene the bothe parties, with his owne bloude.

Kynge Edward in his life, albeit that this discencion betwene hys frendes somewhat yrked hym: yet in his good healt he somewhat the lesse regarded it, because hee thought whatsoeuer busines shoulde falle betwene them, hymselfe shoulde alwaye be hable to rule bothe the parties.

But in his last sicknesse, when hee receiued his naturall strengthe foe fore enfebled, that hee dyspayred all recouerye, then hee consyderyng the youthe of his chyldren, albeit hee nothyng lesse mistrusted than that that happened, yet well forseyng that manye harmes myghte growe by theyr debate, while the youth of hys chyldren shoulde lacke discrecion of themself and good counsaile of their frendes, of whiche either party shold counsaile for their owne commodity, and rather by pleasaunte aduise too wyne themselfe fauour, then by profitable aduertisemente to do the children good, he called some of them before him that were at variaunce, and in especyall the lorde marques Dorsette the quenes sonne by her fyrste housebande, and Richarde the lorde Hastynges, a noble man, than lorde chamberlayne, agayne whom the quene specially grudged, for the great fauour the kyng bare hym, and also for that shee thoughte hym secretly familiar with the kynge in wanton cuompanye. Her kinred also bare hym sore, as well for that the kynge hadde made hym captayne of Calyce (whiche office the lorde Ryuers, brother to the quene, claimed of the kynes former promyse) as for diuerse other great giftes which hee receyued, that they looked for. When these lordes with diuerse other of bothe the parties were comme in presence, the kynge lifting vpe himselfe and vnderfette with pillowes, as it is reported on this wyse sayd vnto them, My lordes, my dere kinsmenne and allies, in what plighte I lye you see, and I feelee. By whiche the lesse while I looke to lye with you, the more depelye am I moued to care in what case I leaue you, for such as I leaue you, suche bee my chyldren lyke to fynde you. Whiche if they shoulde (that Godde forbydde) fynde you at variaunce, myght happe to fall themselfe at warre ere their discrecion woulde serue to sette you at peace. Ye se their youthe, of whiche I reckon the onely suretie to reste in youre concord. For it sufficeth not that al you loue them, yf eche of you hate other. If they wer menne, your faithfulnessse happeleye woulde suffice. But childehood must be maintained by mens authoritye, and slipper youth vnderpropped with elder counsaile, which neither they can haue, but ye geue it, nor ye geue it, yf ye gree not. For wher eche laboureth to breake that the other maketh, and for hatred of eche of others parson, impugned eche others counsaile, there must it nedes bee long ere any good conclusion goe forward. And also while either partye laboureth to be chiefe, flattery shall haue more place then plaine and faithfull aduise, of whyche must nedes ensue the euill bringing vpe of the prynce, whose mynd in tender youth infect, shal redily fal to mischief and riot, and drawe down with this noble realme to ruine, but if grace turn him to wisdom: which if God send, then thei that by euill menes before pleased him best, shal after fall farthest out of fauour, so that euer at length euill driftes dreue to nought, and good plain wayes prosper. Great variaunce hath ther long bene betwene you, not alway for great causes. Sometime a thing right wel intended, our misconstruccion turneth vnto worfe or a smal displeasure done vs, either our owne affection or euil tongues agreueth. But this wote I well ye neuer had so great cause of hatred, as ye haue of loue. That we be al men, that we be christen men, this shall I leave for prechers to tel you, (and yet I wote nere whither any prechers wordes ought more to moue you, then his that is by and by gooying to the place that thei all preache of.) But this shall I desire you to remember, that the one parte of you is of my bloode, the other of myne alies, and eche of yow with other, cyther of kinred or affinitie, whiche spirituall kynred off affynity, if the sacramentes of Christes churche beare that weyghte with vs that woulde Goode thei did, shoulde no lesse moue vs to charitye, then the respecte of fleshlye confanguinitye. Oure Lorde forbidde, that you loue together the worse for the selfe cause that you ought to loue the better. And yet that happeneth. And no where fynde wee so deadlye debate as amonge them, whiche by nature and lawe mosse oughte to agree together. Suche a pestilente serpente is ambicion and desyre of vaine glorye and foueraintye, whiche amonge states where he once entreteth crepeth forth so farre, tyll with deuision and variaunce hee turneth all to mischiefe. Firste longing to be nexte the beste, afterwarde egall with the beste, and at laste chiefe and aboue the beste. Of which immoderate appetite of woorthip, and thereby of debate and dissencion what losse, what sorowe, what trouble hathe within these fewe yeares growen in this realme, I praye Godde as well forgeate as wee well remember.

Whiche thinges yf I could as well haue forefene, as I haue with my more payne then pleasure proued, by Goddes blessed Ladie (that was euer his othe) I woulde neuer haue won the courtseye of mennes knees, with the losse of soo many heades. But sithen thynges passed cannot be gaine called, muche oughte wee the more beware, by what occasion we haue taken soo greate hurte afore, that we esteemes fall not in that occasion agayne. Now be those griefes passed, and all is (Godde be thanked) quiete, and likeli righte wel to prosper in wealthfull peace vnder youre coseyns my children, if Godde send them life and you loue. Of whyche twoo thinges, the lesse losse wer they by whome thoughte Godde dydde hys pleasure, yet shoulde the realme alway finde kinges, and peradventure as good kinges. But yf you among youre selfe in a childe reygne fall at debate, many a good man shall perishe and happely he to, and ye to, ere this land finde peace again. Wherefore in these last wordes that euer I looke to speake with you: I exhort you and require you al, for the loue that you haue euer borne to me, for the loue that I haue euer borne to you, for the loue that our Lorde beareth to vs all, from this time forward, all grieues forgotten, eche of you loue other. Whiche I verelye truste you will, if ye any thing earthly regard, either Godde or your king, affinitie or kinred, this realme, your owne countrey, or your owne surety. And therewithal the king no longer enduring to fitte vp, laide him down on his right side, his face toward them: and none was there present that coulde refrain from weping. But the lordes recomforting him with as good wordes as they could, and answering for the time as thei thought to stand with his pleasure, there in his presence (as by their wordes appered) eche forgave other, and ioyned their hands together, when (as it after appeared by their dedes) their hearts wer far a sonder. As sone as the king was departed, the noble prince his sonne drew toward London, which at the time of his decease, kept his houshold at Ludlow in Wales. Which countrey being far of from the law and recourse to justice, was begon to be farre oute of good wyll and waxen wild, robbers and riuers walking at libertie uncorrected. And for this encheafon the prince was in the life of his father sente thither, to the end that the autoritie of his presence, should refraine euill disposed parsons fro the boldnes of their former outrages, to the gouernaunce and ordering of this yong prince at his fendyng thither, was there appointed Sir Antony Wodvile, lord Riuers and brother vnto the quene, a right honourable man, as valiaunte of hande as politike in counsaile. Adioyned wer there vnto him other of the same partie, and in effect euery one as he was nereft of kin vnto the quene, so was planted next about the prince. That drifte by the quene not vnwisely deuised, whereby her bloode mighte of youth be rooted in the prince's fauor, the duke of Gloucester turned vnto their destruccion, and vpon that grounde set the foundation of all his vnhappy building. For whom souer he perceiued, either at variance with them, or bearing himself their fauor, hee brake vnto them, some by mouth, som by writing and secret messengers, that it neyther was reason nor in any wise to be suffered, that the yong king their master and kinsmanne, shoulde bee in the handes and custodie of his mothers kinred, sequestred in maner from theyr compani, and attendance, of which eueri one ought him as faithful seruite as they, and manye of them far more honorable part of kin then his mothers side: whose blood (quod he) sauing the kinges pleasure, was ful vnmetely to be matched with his: whiche nowe to be as who say remoued from the kyng, and the lesse noble to be left aboute him, is (quod he) neither honorable to hys magestie, nor vnto vs, and also to his grace no surety to haue the mightest of his frendes from him, and vnto vs no little ieopardy, to suffer our welproued euil willers, to grow in ouergret authoritie with the prince in youth, namely which is lighte of beliefe and sone perswaded. Ye remember I trow king Edward himself, albeit he was a manne of age and of discrecion, yet was he in manye thynges ruled by the bendé, more then stode either with his honour, or our profite, or with the commoditie of any manne els, except onely the immoderate aduancement of them selfe. Whiche whither they forer thirsted after their owne weale, or our woe, it were harde I wene to gesse. And if some folkes frendship had not holden better place with the king, then any respect of kinred, thei might peradventure easily haue been trapped and brought to confusion somme of vs ere this. Why not as easily as they haue done some other alreadye, as neere of his royal bloode as we. But our Lord hath wrought his wil, and thanke be to his grace that peril is passe. Howe be it as great is growing, yf wee suffer this yonge kyng in oure enemyes hande, whiche without his wytyng, might abuse the name of his commaundement, to ani of our vndoing, which thyng God and good prouision forbyd. Of which good prouision none of us hath any thing the lesse nede, for the late made attouement, in whiche the kinges pleasure hadde more place then the parties willes. Nor none of us I belieue is so vnwyse, ouerlone to truste a newe frende made of an olde foe, or to think that an houerly kindnes, sodainly contract in one houre continued, yet scant a fortnight, shold be deper fetled in their stomackes: then a long accustomed malice many yeres rooted.

With these wordes and writynges and suche other, the duke of Gloucester sone set a fyre, them that were of themselves etheto kindle, and in especiall twayne, Edward duke of Buckingham, and Richarde lord Hastings and chaumberlayn, both men of honour and of great power. The tone by longe succeffion from his ancestrie, the tother by his office and the kinges fauor. These two not bearing eche to other so much loue, as hatred both vnto the quenes part: in this poynte accorded together wyth the duke of Gloucester, that they wolde vtterlye amoue fro the kinges companye, all his mothers frendes, vnder the name of their enemyes. Vpon this concluded, the duke of Gloucester vnderstandyng, that the lordes whiche at that tyme were aboute the kyng, entended to bryng him vppe to his coronacion, accompanied with suche power of theyr frendes, that it shoulde bee harde for hym to bryng his purpose to passe, without the gathering and great assemble of people and in maner of open warre, whereof the ende he wiste was doubtuous, and in which the kyng being on their side, his part should haue the face and name of a rebellion: he secretly therefore by diuers meanes, caused the queene to be perswaded and brought in the mynd, that it neither wer nede, and also shold be ieopardous, the kyng to come vp strong. For where as nowe euery lord, loued other, and none other thing studyed vppon, but aboute the coronacion and honoure of the king: if the lordes of her kinred shold assemble in the kynges name muche people, thei should geue the lords atwixte whome and them hadde bene sommetyme debate, to feare and suspecte, leste thei shoulde gather thys people, not for the kynges fauegarde whome no manne empugned, but for theyr destruccion, hauyng more regarde to their old variaunce, then their neweattonement. For whiche cause thei shoulde assemble on the other partie muche people agayne for their defence, whose power she wyfte wel farre stretched. And thus shoulde all the realme fall on a rore. And of al the hurte that therof shoulde ensue, which was likely not to be litle, and the most harme ther like to fal wher she lest would, all the worlde woulde put her and her kinred in the wyght, and say that thei had vnwyfelye and untrewelye also, broken the amitie and peace that the kyng her husband so prudentlye made, betwene hys kinne and hers in his death bed, and whiche the other party faithfully obserued.

The queene being in this wise perswaded, suche woordes sent vnto her sonne, and vnto her brother being aboute the kyng, and ouer that the duke of Gloucester hymselfe and other lords the chiefe of hys bende, wrote vnto the kyng so reuerentlye and to the queenes frendes, there soo louyngelye, that they nothyng earthelye mystruftyng, broughte the kyng vppe in grete haste, not in good speede, with a sober companye. Nowe was the king in his waye to London gone, from Northampton, when these dukes of Gloucester and Buckyngham came thither. Where remained behynd, the lorde Ryuers the kynges vncl, entending on the morowe to follow the kyng, and bee with hym at Stonye Stratford miles thence, earely or hee departed. So was there made that nyghte muche frendely chere betwene these dukes and the lord Riuers a grete while. But incontinente after that they were openlye with grete courtesye departed, and the lorde Riuers lodged, the dukes secretlye with a fewe of the moste priuie frendes, sette them downe in counsaile, wherein they spent a great parte of the nyght. And at their risinge in the dawning of the day, thei sent about priuile to their seruantes in their innes and lodgynges about, geuinge them commaundement to make them selfe shortlye readye, for their lordes wer to horsebackward. Vppon whiche messages, manye of their folke were attendaunt, when manye of the lorde Riuers seruantes were vnreadye. Nowe hadde these dukes taken also into their custodie the keyes of the inne, that none shoulde passe forth without theyr licence.

And ouer thys the hyghe waye toward Stonye Stratforde wher the kyng laye, they hadde beestowed certayne of theyr folke, that shoulde send back agayne, and compell to retourne, anye manne that were gotten oute of Northampton toward Stonye Strayforde: tyll they should geue other lycence. For as muche as the dukes themselfe entended for the shewe of theyre dylygence, to bee the fyrste that should that daye attende vppon the kynges highnesse out of that towne: thus bare they folke in hande. But when the lord Ryuers vnderstode the gates closed, and the wayes on euery side besette, neyther hys seruantes nor hymselfe suffered to go oute, perceiuyng well so grete a thyng without his knowledge not begun for noughte, comparyng this maner present with this last nightes chere, in so few houres so gret a chaunge maruelouslye misliked. How be it fith hee coule not get awaye, and keepe hymselfe close, hee woulde not, leste he shoulde seeme to hyde hymselfe for some secret feare of hys owne faulte, whereof he saw no such cause in hymself: he determined vppon the suretie of his own conscience, to go boldelye to them, and inquire what thys matter myghte meane. Whome as soone as they sawe, they beganne to quarrell with hym, and saye, that hee intended to sette distaunce betweene the kyng and them, and to bryng them to confucion, but it shoulde not lye in hys power. And when hee beganne (as he was a very well spoken manne) in goodly wise to excuse himself, they taryed not the ende of his aunswere, but shortlye tooke him and putte him in ward, and that done, forthwyth wente to horsebacke, and tooke the waye to Stonye Stratforde. Where they founde the kyng with his companie readye to leape on horsebacke, and departe forward to leaue that lodging for them, because it was to streight for bothe companies. And as sone as they came in his presence, they lighte adowne with all their companie aboute them. To whome the duke of Buckingham saide, goe afore gentlemenne and yeomen, kepe youre rowmes. And thus in goodly arraye, thei came to the kyng, and on their knees in very humble wise, salued his grace; whiche receyued them in very ioyous and amiable maner, nothinge eathlye knowinge nor mistrustinge as yet. But euen by and by in his presence, they piked a quarrell to the lorde Richarde Graye, the kynges other brother by his mother, sayinge that hee with the lorde marques his brother and the lorde Riuers his vncl, hadde coumpassed to rule the kyng and the realme, and to sette variaunce among the states, and to subdewe and destroye the noble blood of the realm. Toward the accomplishinge whereof, they sayde that the lorde Marques hadde entered into the Tower of London, and, thence taken out the kynges treasor, and sent menne to the sea. All whiche thinge these dukes wiste well were done for good purposes and necessari by the whole counsaile at London, sauing that somewhat thei mush sai. Vnto whiche wordes, the kyng aunswered, what my brother Marques hath done I cannot sai. But in good faith I dare well aunswere for myne vncl Riuers and my brothere here, that thei be innocent of any such matters. Ye my liege quod the duke of Buckingham thei haue kepte their dealing in these matters farre fro the knowledge of your good grace. And forthwith thei arrested the lord Richarde and Sir Thomas Vaughan knyghte, in the kynges presence, and broughte the kyng and all backe vnto Northampton, where they tooke againe further counsaile. And there they sent awaie from the kyng whom it pleased them, and sette newe seruantes aboute him, suche as lyked better them than him. At whiche dealinge hee wepte and was nothing contente, but it booted not. And at dyner the Duke of Gloucester sente a dishe from his owne table to the lord Riuers, prayinge him to be of good chere, all should be well inough. And he thanked the duke, and prayed the messenger to beare it to his nephewe the lord Richarde with the same message for his comfort, who he thought had more nede of comfort, as one to whom such aduersitie was straunge. But himself had been al his dayes in vre thirerewith, and therefore coule beare it the better. But for al this comfortable courtesie of the duke of Gloucester he sent the lord Riuers and the lorde Richarde with Sir Thomas Vaughan into the Northe countrey into diuers places to prison, and afterward al to Pomfrait, where they were in conclusion beheaded.

A letter written with a cole by Sir THOMAS MORE to hys daughter maistris MARGARET ROPER, within a whyte after he was prisoner in the Tower.

MYNE own good daughter, our lorde be thanked I am in good helthe of bodye, and in good quiet of minde: and of worldly thynges I no more desyer than I haue. I beseeche hym make you all mery in the hope of heauen. And such thynges as I somewhat longed to talke with you all, concerning the worlde to come, our Lorde put them into your myndes, as I truste he dothe and better to by his holy spirite: who blesse you and preferue you all. Written with a cole by your tender loving father, who in his pore prayers forgetteth none of you all, nor your babes, nor your nurses, nor your good husbendes, nor your good husbendes shrewde wyues, nor your fathers shrewde wyfe neither, nor our other frendes. And thus fare ye harteley well for lacke of paper.

THOMAS MORE, knight.

Two short ballettes which Sir THOMAS MORE made for his pastime while he was prisoner in the Tower of London.

LEWYS the lost lover.

EY flatering fortune, loke thou neuer so fayre
Or neuer so pleasantly begin to smile,
As though thou wouldst my ruine all repayre,
During my life thou shalt me not begile.
Trust shall I God, to entre in a while.
His haue or heauen sure and vniforme.
Euer after thy calme, loke I for a storme.

DAVY the dyer.

LONG was I lady Lucke your seruing man,
And now haue losse agayne all that I gat,
Wherefore whan I thinke on you now and than,
And in my mynde remember this and that,
Ye may not blame me though I beshrewe your cat,
But in fayth I blesse you agayne a thousand times,
For lending me now some layfure to make rymes.

At the same time with Sir Thomas More lived Skelton, the poet laureate of Henry VIII. from whose works it seems proper to insert a few stanzas, though he cannot be said to have attained great elegance of language.

The prologue to the Bouge of Courte.

IN Autumpne whan the sonne in vyrgyne
By radyante hete enryped hath our corne
Whan Luna full of mutabylyte
As Emperes the dyademe hath worne
Of our pole artyke, smyllynge halfe in scorne
At our foly, and our vnstedfastnesse
The time whan Mars to warre hym dyd dres,
I callynge to mynde the greate auctoryte
Of poetes olde, whiche full craftely
Vnder as couerte termes as coulde be
Can touche a trouth, and cloke subtylly
With freshe vtteraunce full sentencyously
Dyuerse in style some spared not vyce to wryte
Some of mortalitie nobly dyd endyte
Whereby I rede, theyr renome and theyr fame
Maye neuer dye, but cuermore endure
I was fore moued to a forse the same
But ignoraunce full soone did me dyscure
And shewed that in this arte I was not sure
For to illumine she sayd I was to dulle
Aduysynge me my penne awaye to pulle
And not to wryte, for he so wyll atteyne
Excedyng fether than his connyng is
His heed maye be harde, but feble is brayne
Yet haue I knowen suche er this
But of reproche surely he maye not mys
That clymmeth hyer than he may fotinge haue
What and he flyde downe, who shall him saue?

Thus vp and downe my mynde was drawn and cast,
That I ne wyfte what to do was beste
So fore enwered that I was at the laste
Enforced to slepe, and for to take some reste
And to lye downe as soone as I my dresse
At Harwyche porte slumbrynge as I laye
In myne hostes house called powers keye.

Of the wits that flourished in the reign of Henry VIII. none has been more frequently celebrated than the earl of Surry; and this history would therefore have been imperfect without some specimens of his works, which yet it is not easy to distinguish from those of Sir Thomas Wyatt and others, with which they are confounded in the edition that has fallen into my hands. The three first are, I believe, Surry's; the rest, being of the same age, are selected, some as examples of different measures, and one as the oldest composition which I have found in blank verse.

Description of Spring, wherein eche thing renewes, save only the lover.

THE soote season that bud, and bloome fourth bringes,
With grene hath cladde the hyll, and eke the vale,
The Nightingall with fethers newe she singes;
The turtle ro her mate hath told her tale:
Somer is come, for every spray now springes,
The hart hath hunge his old head on the pale,
The bucke in brake his winter coate he flynges;
The fishes flete with newe repayed scale:
The adder all her slough away she flynges,
The swift swallow pursueth the flies smalle,
The busy bee her honey how she mynges;
Winter is worne that was the floures bale.
And thus I see among these pleasant thynges
Eche care decayes, and yet my sorrow sprynges.

Description of the restless estate of a lover.

WHEN youth had led me halfe the race,
That Cupides scourge had made me runne;
I looked back to meet the place,
From whence my weary course begonne:
And then I saw howe my desyre
Misguiding me had led the waye,
Myne eyne to greedy of theyre hyre,
Had made me lose a better prey.
For when in sighes I spent the day,
And could not cloake my grief with game:
The boyling smoke dyd still bewray,
The present heat of secret flame:
And when salt teares do bayne my breast,
Where love his pleasant traynes hath sown,
Her beauty hath the fruytes opprest,
Ere that the buddes were spronge and blowne.
And when myne eyen dyd still pursue,
The flying chase of theyre request;
Theyre greedy looks dyd oft renew,
The hydden wounde within my breste.
When every loke these cheeks mighte stayne,
From dedly pale to glowing red;
By outward signes appeared playne,
To her for helpe my hart was fled.
But all to late Love learneth me,
To paynt all kind of colours new;
To blynd theyre eyes that else should see
My speckled chekes with Cupides hew.
And now the covert brest I clame,
That worshipt Cupide secretly;
And nourished his sacred flame,
From whence no blairing sparks do flye.

Description

E N G L I S H L A N G U A G E.

Description of the fickle Affections, Pangs, and Sleights of Love.

SUCH wayward wayes hath Love, that most part in discord
Our willes do stand, whereby our hartes but feldom do accord:
Decyte is his delighe, and to begyle and mocke
The simple hartes which he doth strike with froward diuers stroke.
He causeth th' one to rage with golden burning darte,
And doth alay with Leaden cold, again the others harte.
Whose gleames of burning fyre and easy sparks of flame
In balance of unequal weyght he pondereth by ame
From easye ford Where I myght wade and pass full well,
He me withdrawes and doth me drive, into a depe dark hell:
And me withholdes where I am calde and offred place,
And willes me that my mortal foe I do beseke of Grace;
He lettes me to pursue a conquest welnere wonne
To follow where my paynes were losse, ere that my suite begunne.
So by this means I know how soon a hart may turne
From warre to peace, from truce to stryfe, and so agayne returne.
I knowe how to content my self in others lust,
Of little stuffe unto my self to weave a webbe of trust:
And how to hyde my harmes with sole dyssembling chere, Whan in my face the painted thoughtes would outwardly appeare.
I know how that the blood forsakes the face for dred,
And how by shame it staynes agayne the chekes with flam-yng red:
I know under the Grene, the Serpent how he lurkes:
The hammer of the restless forge I wote eke how it workes.
I know and con by roate the tale that I woulde tell
But ofte the woordes come fourthe awrye of him that loveth well
I know in heate and colde the Lover how he shakes,
In synging how he doth complayne, in sleeping how he wakes
To languish without ache, sicklesse for to consume,
A thousand thynges for to devyse, resolvyng of his fume.
And though he lyst to see his Ladyes Grace full fore
Such pleasures as delyght his Eye, do not his helthe restore.
I know to seke the tracte of my desyred foe,
And fere to fynde that I do seek, but chiefly this I know,
That Lovers must transourme into the thyng beloved,
And live (alas! who would believe?) with sprite from Lyfe removed.
I knowe in harty fighes and laughers of the spleene,
At once to chaunge my state, my will, and eke my colour
clene.
I knowe how to deceyve my self wythe others helpe,
And how the Lyon chastised is, by beatyng of the whelpe.
In standyng nere the fyre, I know how that I frease;
Farre of I burne, in both I waste, and so my Lyfe I leese.
I know how Love doth rage upon a yeylding mynde,
How smalle a nete may take and make a harte of gentle kynde:
Or else with feldom swete to season hepes of gall,
Revived with a glympse of Grace old sorrows to let fall.
The hydden traynes I know, and secret snares of Love,
How soone a looke will prynte a thoughte that never may remove.
The flypper state I know, the fodein turnes from welthe
The doubtfull hope, the certaine woo, and sure despaired helthe.

A praise of his ladie.

GEVE place you ladies and be gone,
Boast not your selves at all,
For here at hand approacheth one,
Whose face will stayne you all.
The vertue of her lively lookes
Excels the precious stone,
I wishe to have none other bookes
To reade or look upon.
In eche of her two cristall eyes,
Smyleth a naked boy;
It would you all in heart suffice
To see that lampe of joye.
I think nature hath lost the moulde,
Where she her shape did take;
Or else I doubt if nature coulde
So fayre a creature make.
She may be well comparde
Unto the Phenix kinde,
Whose like was never seene nor heard,
That any man can fynde.
In lyfe she is Diana chaste
In trouth Penelopey,
In woord and eke in dede stedfast;
What will you more we say:
If all the world were fought so farre,
Who could find suche a wight,
Her beauty twinkleth lyke a starre
Within the frosty night.

The Lover refused of his love, embraceth vertue.

MY youthfull yeres are past,
My joyfull dayes are gone,
My lyfe it may not last,
My grave and I am one.
My myrth and joyes are fled,
And I a Man in wo,
Desirous to be ded,
My mischiefe to forgo.
I burne and am a colde,
I freeze amyddes the fyre,
I see she doth witholde
That is my honest desyre.
I see my helpe at hande,
I see my lyfe also,
I see where she doth stande
That is my deadly fo,
I see how she doth see,
And yet she wil be blynde,
I see in helpyng me,
She sekes and wil not fynde.
I see how she doth wrye,
When I begynne to mone,
I see when I come nye,
How fayne she would be gone.
I see what wil ye more,
She will me gladly kill,
And you shall see therefore
That she shall have her will.
I cannot live with stones,
It is too hard a foode,
I wil be dead at ones
To do my Lady good.

THE HISTORY OF THE

The death of ZOROAS, an Egiptian astronomer, in the first fight that Alexander had with the Persians.

NOW clattring armes, now raging broyls of warre,
 Gan passe the noys of dredfull trumpretts clang,
 Shrowded with shafts, the heaven with cloude of dartes,
 Covered the ayre. Against full fatted bulles,
 As forceth kyndled yre the lyons keene,
 Whose greedy gutts the gnawing hunger prickes;
 So Macedons against the Persians fare,
 Now corpses hyde the purpurde foyle with blood;
 Large slaughter on eche side, but Perfes more,
 Moylt fieldes bebled, theyr heartes and numbers bate,
 Fainted while they gave backe, and fall to flighte.
 The litning Macedon by swordes, by gleaves,
 By bandes and troupes of footemen, with his garde,
 Speedes to Dary, but hym his merest kyn,
 Oxate preserves with horsemen on a plumpe
 Before his carr, that none his charge should give.
 Here grunts, here groans, eche where strong youth is spent:
 Shaking her bloody hands, Bellone, among
 The Perfes soweth all kind of cruel death:
 With throte yrent he roares, he lyeth along
 His entrailes with a launce through gryded quyte,
 Hym smytes the club, hym woundes farre stryking bowe,
 And hym the sling, and him the shining sword;
 He dyeth, he is all dead, he pantes, he restes.
 Right over stoode in snowwhite armour brave,
 The Memphite Zoroas, a cunningy clarke,
 To whom the heaven lay open as his booke:
 And in celestiall bodies he could tell
 The moving meeting light, aspect, eclips,
 And influence, and constellations all;
 What earthly chaunces would betyde, what yere,
 Of plenty storde, what signe forewarned death,
 How winter gendreth snowe, what temperature
 In the prime tyde doth season well the foyle,
 Why summer burnes, why autumnne hath ripe grapes,
 Whither the circle quadrate may become,
 Whether our tunes heavens harmony can yelde
 Of four begyns among themselves how great
 Proportion is; what sway the erring lightes
 Doth send in course gayne that first movyng heaven;
 What, grees one from another distant be,
 What starr doth lett the hurtfull syre to rage,
 Or him more mylde what opposition makes,
 What fyre doth qualifye Mavorfes fyre,
 What house eche one dothe seeke, what plannett raignes
 Within this heaven sphere, nor that small thynges
 I speake, whole heaven he closeth in his brest.
 This sage then in the starres hath spied the fates
 Threatened him death without delay, and, fith,
 He saw he could not fatall order chaunge,
 Foreward he prest in battayle, that he might Mete with the rulers of the Macedons,
 Of his right hand desirous to be slain,
 The bouldest borne, and worthiest in the feilde;
 And as a wight, now wery of his life,
 And seeking death, in fyrst front of his rage
 Comes desperately to Alexander's face,
 At him with dartes one after other throwes,
 With recklesse wordes and clamour him provokes,
 And sayth, Nestanacks bastard shamefull stayne of mothers bed, why lokest thou thy strokes,
 Cowardes among, Turn thee to me, in case
 Manhood there be so much left in thy heart,
 Come fight with me, that on my helmet weare
 Appollo's laurell both for learninges laude,
 And eke for martial praise, that in my shielde
 The seven fold Sophie of Minerve contein,

A match more mete, Syr King, then any here:
 The noble prince amoved takes ruth upon
 The wilfull weight, and with soft words ayen,
 O monstrous man (quoth he) what fo thou art,
 I pry thee live, ne do not with thy death
 This lodge of Lore, the Muses Mansion marre:
 That treasure house this hand shall never spoyle,
 My sword shall never bruiſe that skilfull brayne,
 Long gather'd heapes of science sone to spill;
 O how fayre fruites may you to mortall men
 From Wisdoms garden give; how many maye
 By you the wiser and the better prove:
 What error, what mad moode, what frenzy thee
 Perswades to be downe, sent to depe Averne,
 Where no artes flourish, nor no knowledge vailes
 For all these sawes. When thus the sovereign said,
 Alighted Zoroas with sword unsheathed,
 The careless king there smoate above the greve,
 At th' opening of his quishes wounded him,
 So that the blood down traile on the ground:
 The Macedon perceiving hurt, gan gnashe,
 But yet his mynde he bente in any wise
 Hym to forbear, sett spurrs unto his stede,
 And turnde away, lest anger of his smarte
 Should cause revenger hand deale balefull blows.
 But of the Macedonian chieftaines knights,
 One Meleager could not beare this sight,
 But ran upon the said Egyptian rude,
 And cutt him in both knees: he fell to ground,
 Wherewith a whole rout came of fouldiours sterne,
 And all in pieces hewed the sely seg,
 But happely the soule fled to the starres,
 Where, under him, he hath full sight of all,
 Whereat he gazed here with reaching looke.
 The Persians waild such sapience to forgoe,
 The very sone the Macedonians wisht
 He would have lived, king Alexander selfe
 Demde him a man unmete to dye at all;
 Who wonne like praise for conquest of his Yre,
 As for stoute men in field that day subdued,
 Who princes taught how to discerne a man,
 That in his head so rare a jewel beares,
 But over all those same Camenes, those same,
 Divine Camenes, whose honour he procurde,
 As tender parent doth his daughters weale,
 Lamented, and for thankes, all that they can,
 Do cherish hym deceast, and sett him free,
 From dark oblivion of devouring death.

Barclay wrote about 1550; his chief work is the Ship of Fools, of which the following extract will shew his style.

Of Mockers and Scorners and false Accusers.
O HEARTLESS-fooles, haste here to our doctrine,
 Leave off the wayes of your enormitie,
 Enforce you to my preceptes to encline,
 For here shall I shew you good and veritie:
 Encline, and ye finde shall great prosperitie,
 Ensuing the doctrine of our fathers olde,
 And godly lawes in valour worth great golde.
 Who that will followe the graces manyfolde
 Which are in vertue, shall finde anauncement:
 Wherfore ye fooles that in your sinne are bolde,
 Enſue ye wisdom, and leave your lewde intent,
 Wisdom is the way of men most excellent:
 Therfore haue done, and shortly spede your pace,
 To quaint your self and company with grace.
 Learne what is vertue, therin is great solace,
 Learne what is truth, sadnes and prudence,

E N G L I S H L A N G U A G E.

Let grutche be gone, and grautie purchase,
Forfake your folly and inconuenience,
Cease to be fooles, and ay to sue offence,
Followe ye vertue, chiefe roote of godlynes,
For it and wisedome is ground of clenlynes.

Wisedome and vertue two thinges are doubtles,
Whiche man endueth with honour speciall,
But suche heartes as slepe in foolishnes
Knoweth nothing, and will nought know at all;
But in this little barge in principall

All foolish mockers I purpose to repreue,
Clawe he his backe that feeleth itche or greue,
Mockers and scorners that are hard of beleue,
With a rough combe here will I clawe and grate,
To proue if they will from their vice remeue,
And leaue their folly, which causeth great debate:
Suche caytiues spare neyther poore man nor estate,
And where their selfe is most worthy derision,
Other men to scorne is all their most condition.

Yet are mo fooles of this abusion,
Whiche of wise men despiseth the doctrine,
With mowes, mockes, scorne, and collusion,
Rewarding rebukes for their good discipline:
Shewe to suche wisedome, yet shall they not encline
Unto the same, but set nothing therby,
But mocke thy doctrine, still or openly.

So in the worlde it appeareth commonly,
That who that will a foole rebuke or blame,
A mocke or mowe shall he haue by and by:
Thus in derision haue fooles their speciall game.
Correct a wise man that woulde cshue ill name,
And fayne woulde learne, and his lewde life amende,
And to thy wordes he gladly shall intende.

If by misfortune a rightwise man offende,
He gladly suffereth a iuste correction,
And him that him teacheth taketh for his frende,
Him selfe putting mekely unto subiection,
Folowing his preceptes and good direction:
But yf that one foole rebuke or blame,
He shall his teacher hate, slander and diffame.

Howbeit his wordes oft turne to his own shame,
And his owne darts retourne to him agayne,
And so is he fore wounded with the same,
And in wo endeth, great misery and payne.
It also proued full often is certayne,
That they that on mockers alway their mindes cast,
Shall of all other be mocked at the last.

He that goeth right, stedfast, sure, and fast,
May him well mocke that goeth halting and lame,
And he that is white may well his scornescast,
Agaynst a man of Inde: but no man ought to blame
Anothers vice, while he vseth the same.
But who that of finne is cleane in deede and thought,
May him well scorne whose liuing is starke nought.
The scornescast of Naball full dere should haue been bought,
If Abigayl his wife discrete and sage,
Had not by kindnes right crafty meanes fought,
The wrath of Dauid to temper and asswage.
Hath not two beares in their fury and rage
Two and fortie children rent and torne,
For they the prophete Helyseus did scorne.

So might they curse the time that they were borne,
For their mocking of this prophete diuine:

So many other of this sort often mourne,
For their lewde mockes, and fall into ruine.
Thus is it folly for wise men to incline,
To this lewde flocke of fooles, for see thou shall
Them moste scorning that are most bad of all.

The Lenuoy of Barclay to the fooles.

Ye mocking fooles that in scorne set your ioy,
Proudly despising Gods punishment:
Take ye example by Cham the sonne of Noy,
Which laughed his father vnto derision,
Which him after cursed for his transgression,
And made him seruauant to all his lyne and stocke.
So shall ye caytifs at the conclusion,
Since ye are nought, and other scorne and mocke.

About the year 1553 wrote Dr. Wilson, a man celebrated for the politeness of his style, and the extent of his knowledge: what was the state of our language in his time, the following may be of use to show.

PRONUNCIATION is an apte ordering both of the voyce, countenance, and all the whole bodye, accordyng to the worthines of suche woordes and mater as by speache are declared. The vse hereof is suche for anye one that liketh to haue prayse for tellyng his tale in open assemblie, that hauing a good tongue, and a comely countenance, he shall be thought to passe all other that haue the like vtterance: thoughte they haue much better learning. The tongue geueth a certayne grace to euery matter, and beautifieth the cause in like maner, as a swete soundyng lute muche setteth forthe a meane deuised ballade. Or as the sounde of a good instrumente styrreth the hearers, and moueth muche delite, so a cleare soundyng voice comforteth muche our deintie eares, with muche swete melodie, and causeth vs to allowe the matter rather for the reporters sake, then the reporter for the matters sake. Demosthenes therefore, that famous oratour, beyng asked what was the chiefe point in al oratorie, gaue the chiefe and onely praise to Pronunciation; being demaunded, what was the seconde, and the thirde, he still made aunswere, Pronunciation, and would make none other aunswere, till they leste askyng, declaring hereby that arte without vtterance can dooe nothyng, vtterance without arte can dooe right muche. And no doubt that man is in outwarde apparaunce halfe a good clarke, that hath a cleane tongue, and a comely gesture of his body. Æschines lykwyse beyng bannished his cuntrye through Demosthenes, when he had redde to the Rhodians his own oration, and Demosthenes aunswere thereunto, by force whereof he was bannished, and all they marueiled muche at the excellencie of the same: then (quod Æschines) you would haue marueiled muche more if you had heard hymselfe speak it. Thus beyng cast in miserie and bannished for euer, he could not but geue such great reporte of his deadly and mortal enemy.

Thus haue I deduced the English language from the age of Alfred to that of Elizabeth; in some parts imperfectly for want of materials; but I hope, at least, in such a manner that its progreß may be easily traced, and the gradations observed, by which it advanced from its first rudeness to its present elegance.

GRAMMAR, which is the art of using words properly, comprises four parts; Orthography, Etymology, Syntax, and Profody.

In this division and order of the parts of grammar I follow the common grammarians, without inquiring whether a fitter distribution might not be found. Experience has long shewn this method to be so distinct as to obviate confusion, and so comprehensive as to prevent any inconvenient omissions. I likewise use the terms already received, and already understood, though perhaps others more proper might sometimes be invented. Sylburgius, and other innovators, whose new terms have sunk their learning into neglect, have left sufficient warning against the trifling ambition of teaching arts in a new language.

ORTHOGRAPHY is the art of combining letters into syllables, and syllables into words. It therefore teaches previously the form and sound of letters.

The letters of the English language are,

Saxon.	Roman.	Italic.	Old English.	Name.
A a	A a	A a	A a	a
B b	B b	B b	B b	be
C c	C c	C c	C c	see
D d	D d	D d	D d	dee
E e	E e	E e	E e	ee
F f	F f	F f	F f	eff
G g	G g	G g	G g	jee
H h	H h	H h	H h	aitch
I i	I i	I i	I i	i (or ja)
J j	J j	J j	J j	j consonant,
K k	K k	K k	K k	ka
L l	L l	L l	L l	el
M m	M m	M m	M m	em
N n	N n	N n	N n	en
O o	O o	O o	O o	o

X x	X x	X x	X x	ex
Y y	Y y	Y y	Y y	ey
Z z	Z z	Z z	Z z	zed, more commonly izzard, or izzard, that is, f bard.

To these may be added certain combinations of letters universally used in printing; as ct, ft, fl, ll, lb, lk, fl, fl, fi, ff, fi, fi, fl, and &c. or and per se, and. ct, ft, fl, ll, lb, lk, ff, fl, fi, fi, fl, fi, ff, fl, &c. ct, fl, ll, lb, lk, fl, fi, fi, &c.

Our letters are commonly reckoned twenty-four, because anciently i and j, as well as u and v, were expressed by the same character; but as those letters, which had always different powers, have now different forms, our alphabet may be properly said to consist of twenty-six letters.

None of the small consonants have a double form, except f, s; of which f is used in the beginning and middle, and s at the end.

Vowels are five, a, e, i, o, u.

Such is the number generally received; but for i it is the practice to write y in the end of words, as thy, holy; before i, as from die, dying; from beautify, beautifying; in the words says, days, eyes; and in words derived from the Greek, and written originally with υ, as system, sigma, sympathy, &c.

For u we often write w after a vowel, to make a diphthong; as raw, grew, view, wove, flowing, lowness.

The sounds of all the letters are various.

In treating on the letters, I shall not, like some other grammarians, inquire into the original of their form as an antiquarian: nor into their formation and prolation by the organs of speech, as a mechanick, anatomist, or physiologist; nor into the properties and gradation of sounds, or the elegance or harshness of particular combinations, as a writer of universal and transcendental grammar. I consider the English alphabet only as it is English; and even in this narrow disquisition I follow the example of former grammarians, perhaps with more reverence than judgment, because by writing in English I suppose my reader already acquainted with the English language; and consequently able to pronounce the letters, of which I teach the pronunciation; and because of sounds in general it may be observed, that words are unable to describe them. An account therefore of the primitive and simple letters is useless almost alike to those who know their sound, and those who know it not.

A has three sounds, the slender, open, and broad.

A slender is found in most words, as face, mane; and in words ending in ation, as creation, salvation, generation.

The a slender is the proper English a, called very justly by Erpenius, in his Arabic Grammar, a Anglicum cum e mistum, as having a middle sound between the open a and the e. The French have a similar sound in the word pair, and in their masculine.

A open is the a of the Italian, or nearly resembles it; as father, rather, congratulate, fancy, glass.

A broad resembles the a of the German; as all, wall, call.

A GRAMMAR OF THE

Many words pronounced with a broad were anciently written with au, as fault, mault; and we still say fault, vault. This was probably the Saxon sound, for it is yet retained in the northern dialects, and in the rustic pronunciation; as maun for man, baund for hand.

The short a approaches to the a open, as grass.

The long a, if prolonged by e at the end of the word, is always slender, as graze, fame.

A forms a diphthong only with i or y, and u or uv. Ai or ay, as in plain, vain, gay, clay, has only the sound of the long and slender a, and differs not in the pronunciation from plane, want.

Au or aw has the sound of the German a, as raw, naughty.

Æ is sometimes found in Latin words not completely naturalised, or assimilated, but is no English diphthong; and is more properly expressed by single e, as Cæsar, Æneas.

E is the letter which occurs most frequently in the English language.

E is long, as in scène; or short, as in cellar, separate, cèlebratè, mèn, thèn.

It is always short before a double consonant, or two consonants, as in vèx, pèrplexity, rèlent, mèdlar, rèptile, sèrpènt, cèllar, cèssation, blèssing, fèll, fèlling, dèbt.

E is always mute at the end of a word, except in monosyllables that have no other vowel, as the; or proper names, as Penelope, Phebe, Derbe; being used to modify the foregoing consonant, as since, once, bedge, oblige; or to lengthen the preceding vowel, as bàn, bàne; càn, càne; pìn, pìne; tùn, tùne; ròb, ròbe; pòp, pòpe; fìr, fìre; cùr, cùre; tùb, tùbe.

Almost all words which now terminate in consonants ended anciently in e, as year, yeare; wildness, wildnessè; which e probably had the force of the French e feminine, and constituted a syllable with its associate consonant; for, in old editions, words are sometimes divided thus, clea-re, fel-le, knowled-ge. This e was perhaps for a time vocal or silent in poetry as convenience required; but it has been long wholly mute. Camden in his Remains calls it the silent e.

It does not always lengthen the foregoing vowel, as glòve, live, give.

It has sometimes in the end of words a sound obscure, and scarcely perceptible, as open, shapen, shotten, thisle, participle, lucre.

This faintness of sound is found when e separates a mute from a liquid, as in rotten; or follows a mute and liquid, as in cattle.

E forms a diphthong with a, as near; with i, as deign, receive; and with u or uv, as new, flew.

Ea sounds like e long, as mean; or like ee, as dear, clear, near.

Ei is sounded like e long, as seize, perceiving.

Eu sounds as e long and soft.

E, a, u are combined in beauty and its derivatives, but have only the sound of u.

E may be said to form a diphthong by reduplication, as agree, sleeping.

Eo is found in yeomen, where it is sounded as e short; and in people, where it is pronounced like ee.

I.

I has a sound, long, as fine; and short, as fin.

That is eminently observable in i, which may be likewise remarked in other letters, that the short sound is not the long sound contracted, but a sound wholly different.

The long sound in monosyllables is always marked by the e final, as thin, thine.

I is often sounded before r as a short u; as shirt, first, shirt.

It forms a diphthong only with e, as field, shield, which is sounded as the double ee; except friend, which is sounded as frènd.

I is joined with eu in lieu, and ew in view; which triphthongs are sounded as the open u.

O.

O is long, as bône, obedient, corroding; or short, as blòck, knòck, òblique, lèll.

Women is pronounced wimèn.

The short o has sometimes the sound of a close u, as son, come.

O coalesces into a diphthong with a, as moan, groan, apòproach; oa has the sound of o long.

O is united to e in some words derived from Greek, as economy; but oe being not an English diphthong, they are better written as they are founded with only e, economy.

With i, as oil, soil, moil, noisome.

This coalition of letters seems to unite the sounds of the two letters as far as two sounds can be united without being destroyed, and therefore approaches more nearly than any combination in our tongue to the notion of a diphthong.

With o, as boot, boot, cooler, oo has the sound of the Italian u.

With u or uv, as our, power, flower; but in some words has only the sound of o long, as in four, bowel, few, grow. These different sounds are used to distinguish different significations; as bow, an instrument for shooting; bow, a depression of the head; few, the she of a boar; few, to scatter seed; bowel, an orbicular body; bowel, a wooden vessel.

Ou is sometimes pronounced like o soft, as court; sometimes like o short, as cough; sometimes like u close, as could; or u open, as rough, tough; which use only can teach.

Ou is frequently used in the last syllable of words which in Latin end in or, and are made English, as honour, labour, favour, from honor, labor, favor.

Some late innovators have ejected the u, without considering that the last syllable gives the sound neither of or nor ur, but a sound between them, if not compounded of both; besides that they are probably derived to us from the French nouns in eur, as bonheur, faveur.

U.

U is long in use, confusion; or short, as us, concession.

It coalesces with a, e, i, o; but has rather in these combinations the force of the uv, as quaff, quest, quit, quite, lanquish; sometimes in ui the i loses its sound, as in juice. It is sometimes mute before a, e, i, y, as guard, guist, guise, buy.

U is followed by e in virtue, but the e has no sound.

Ue is sometimes mute at the end of a word, in imitation of the French, as prorogue, synagogue, plague, vague, harangue.

Y.

Y is a vowel, which, as Quintilian observes of one of the Roman letters, we might want without inconvenience, but that we have it. It supplies the place of i at the end of words, as thy; before an i, as dying; and is commonly retained in derivative words where it was part of a diphthong in the primitive; as destroy, destroyer; betray, betrayed, betray-er; pray, prayer; say, sayer; day, days.

Y being the Saxon vowel y, which was commonly used where i is now put, occurs very frequently in all old books.

GENERAL RULES.

A vowel in the beginning or middle syllable, before two consonants, is commonly short, as opportunity.

In monosyllables a single vowel before a single consonant is short, as flag, frèg.

Many is pronounced as if it were written manny.

OF CONSONANTS.

B.

B has one unvaried sound, such as it obtains in other languages.

It is mute in debt, debtor, subtle, doubt, lamb, limb, dumb, thumb, climb, comb, womb.

It is used before l and r, as black, brown.

C has

ENGLISH TONGUE.

C.

C has before e and i the sound of s; as sincerely, centrick, century, circular, cistern, city, siccily: before a, o, and u, it sounds like k, as calm, concavity, copper, incorporate, curiosity, concupiscence.

C might be omitted in the language without loss, since one of its sounds might be supplied by s, and the other by k, but that it preserves to the eye the etymology of words, as face from facies, captive from captivus.

Ch has a sound which is analysed into th, as church, chin, crutch. It is the same sound which the Italians give to the c simple before i and e, as citta, cerro.

Ch is founded like k in words derived from the Greek, as chymist, scheme, cholera. Arch is commonly founded ark before a vowel, as archangel; and with the English sound of ch before a consonant, as archbishop.

Ch in some French words not yet assimilated, sounds like sh, as machine, chauffe.

C, having no determinate sound, according to English orthography, never ends a word; therefore we write sick, block, which were originally sicke, blocke, in such words. C is now mute.

It is used before t and r, as clock, crofs.

D is uniform in its sound, as death, diligent.

It is used before r, as draw, drofs; and w, as dwell.

F.

F, though having a name beginning with a vowel, is numbered by the grammarians among the semi-vowels, yet has this quality of a f, that it is commodiously founded before a liquid, as flask, fly, freckle. It has an unvariable sound, except that of is sometimes spoken nearly as ov.

G.

G has two sounds, one hard, as in gay, go, gun; the other soft, as in gem, giant.

At the end of a word it is always hard, ring, sung, song, frog.

Before e and i the sound is uncertain.

G before e is soft, as gem, generation, except in gear, geld, geese, get, gewgaw, and derivatives from words ending in g, as singing, stronger, and generally before er at the end of words, as finger.

G is mute before n, as gnash, sign, foreign.

G before i is hard, as give, except in giant, gigantic, gibbet, gibe, giblets, giles, gill, gillflower, gin, ginger, gingle, to which may be added Egypt and gypsy.

Gb, in the beginning of a word, has the sound of the hard g, as ghostly; in the middle, and sometimes at the end, it is quite silent, as though, right, sought, spoken tho', rite, soute.

It has often at the end the sound of f, as laugh, whence laughter retains the same sound in the middle; cough, trough, sough, tough, enough, slough.

It is not to be doubted, but that in the original pronunciation gb had the force of a consonant, deeply guttural, which is still continued among the Scotch.

G is used before b, l, and r.

H.

H is a note of aspiration, and shows that the following vowel must be pronounced with a strong emission of the breath, as hat, horse.

It seldom begins any but the first syllable, in which it is always founded with a full breath, except in heir, herb, hostler, honour, bumble, honest, humour, and their derivatives.

It sometimes begins middle or final syllables in words compounded, as blackhead; or derived from the Latin, as comprehend.

J.

J consonant sounds uniformly like the soft g, and is therefore a letter useless, except in etymology, as ejaculation, jester, jocund, juice.

K.

K has the sound of hard c, and is used before e and i, where, according to English analogy, c would be soft, as kept, king, skirt, skeptick, for so it should be written, not sceptick, because sc is founded like s, as in scene.

It is used before n, as knell, knot, but totally loses its sound in modern pronunciation.

K is never doubled; but c is used before it to shorten the vowel by a double consonant, as cockle, pickle.

L has in English the same liquid sound as in other languages.

The custom is to double the l at the end of monosyllables, as kill, will, full. These words were originally written kille, wille, fulle; and when the e first grew silent, and was afterwards omitted, the ll was retained, to give force, according to the analogy of our language, to the foregoing vowel.

L is sometimes mute, as in calf, half halves, calves, could, would, should, psalm, talk, salmon, falcon.

The Saxons, who delighted in guttural sounds, sometimes asperated the l at the beginning of words, as hlaf, a loaf, or bread; hlaford, a lord; but this pronunciation is now disused.

Le at the end of words is pronounced like a weak el, in which the e is almost mute, as table, shuttle.

M.

M has always the same sound, as murmur, monumental.

N.

N has always the same sound, as noble, manners.

N is sometimes mute after m, as damn, condemn, hymn.

P.

P has always the same sound, which the Welsh and Germans confound with B.

P is sometimes mute, as in psalm, and between m and r, as tempt.

Ph is used for f in words derived from the Greek, as philosopher, philanthrophy, Philip.

Q.

Q, as in other languages, is always followed by u, and has a sound which our Saxon ancestors well expressed by cw, cw, as quadrant, queen, equestrian, quilt, inquiry, quire, quotidian. Qu is never followed by u.

Qu is sometimes founded, in words derived from the French, like k, as conquer, liquor, risque, chequer.

R.

R has the same rough snarling sound as in other tongues.

The Saxons used often to put b before it, as before l at the beginning of words.

Rb is used in words derived from the Greek, as myrrb, myrrhine, catarrhus, rheum, rheumatick, rhyme.

Re, at the end of some words derived from the Latin or French, is pronounced like a weak er, as theatre, sepulchre.

S.

S has a hissing sound, as subilation, ifter.

A single s seldom ends any word, except the third person of verbs, as loves, grows; and the plurals of nouns, as treas, busks, distresses; the pronouns nouns this, his, ours, yours, us; the adverb thus; and words derived from Latin, as rebus, surplus; the close being always either in se, as house, horse, or in ti, as grass, dress, bliss, lest, anciently grasse, dresse.

A GRAMMAR OF THE

S single, at the end of words, has a grosser sound, like that of z, as trees, eyes, except this, thus, us, rebus, surplus.

It sounds like z before ion, if a vowel goes before, as intrusion; and like f, if it follows a consonant, as conversion.

It sounds like z before e mute, as refuse, and before y final, as resy; and in those words befom, desire, wisdom, prison, prisoner, present, present, damsel, casement.

It is the peculiar quality of f, that it may be founded before all consonants, except x and z, in which f is comprised, x being only ks, and z a hard or gross f. This f is therefore termed by grammarians suæ potestatis littera; the reason of which the learned Dr. Clarke erroneously supposed to be, that in some words it might be doubled at pleasure. Thus we find in several languages:

Scatter, scatter, idgeno, stracciolo, stravellare, straz, sgombrare, sgranare, stake, stamber, smell, snipe, space, splendour, spring, squeeze, store, step, strength, stramen, stripe, sweetura, swell.

S is mute in isle, island, demesne, viscount.

T has its customary sound, as take, temptation.

Ti before a vowel has the sound of fi, as salvation, except an f goes before, as question, excepting likewise derivatives from words ending in ty, as mighty, mightier.

Tb has two sounds; the one soft, as thus, together; the other hard, as thing, think. The sound is soft in these words, then, thence, and there, with their derivatives and compounds; and in that, these, thou, thee, thy, thine, their, they, this, these, them, though, thus, and in all words between two vowels, as father, together; and between r and a vowel, as burthen.

In other words it is hard, as thick, thunder, faith, faithful. Where it is softened at the end of a word, an e silent must be added, as breath, breathe; cloth, clothe.

V.

V has a sound of near affinity to that of f, vain, vanity.

From f in the Islandick alphabet, v is only distinguished by a diacritical point.

W.

Of w, which in diphthongs is often an undoubted vowel, some grammarians have doubted whether it ever be a consonant; and not rather as it is called a double u or ou, as water may be resolved into ouater; but letters of the same sound are always reckoned consonants in other alphabets: and it may be observed, that w follows a vowel without any hiatus or difficulty of utterance, as frosty winter.

Wb has a sound accounted peculiar to the English, which the Saxons better expressed by hw, as what, whence, whiting; in whore only, and sometimes in wholesome, wh is founded like a simple b.

X.

X begins no English word; it has the sound of ks, as axe, extraneous.

Y.

Y, when it follows a consonant, is a vowel; when it precedes either vowel or diphthong, is a consonant, ye, young. It is thought by some to be in all cases a vowel. But it may be observed of y as of w, that it follows a vowel without any hiatus, as resy youth.

The chief argument by which w and y appear to be always vowels is, that the sounds which they are supposed to have as consonants, cannot be uttered after a vowel, like that of all other consonants; thus we say, tu, ut; do, ed; but in wed, dew, the two sounds of w have no resemblance of each other.

Z.

Z begins no word originally English; it has the sound, as its name izzard or shard expresses, of an s uttered with closer compression of the palate by the tongue, as freeze, froze.

In orthography I have supposed orthospy, or just utterance of words, to be included; orthography being only the art of expressing certain sounds by proper characters. I have therefore observed in what words any of the letters are mute.

Most of the writers of English grammar have given long tables of words pronounced otherwise than they are written, and seem not sufficiently to have considered, that of English, as of all living tongues, there is a double pronunciation, one curfory and colloquial, the other regular and solemn. The curfory pronunciation is always vague and uncertain, being made different in different mouths by negligence, unskillfulness, or affectation. The solemn pronunciation, though by no means immutable and permanent, is yet always less remote from the orthography, and less liable to capricious innovation. They have however generally formed their tables according to the curfory speech of those with whom they happened to converse; and concluding that the whole nation combines to vitiate language in one manner, have often established the jargon of the lowest of the people as the model of speech.

For pronunciation the best general rule is, to consider those as the most elegant speakers who deviate least from the written words.

There have been many schemes offered for the emendation and settlement of our orthography, which, like that of other nations, being formed by chance, or according to the fancy of the earliest writers in rude ages, was at first very various and uncertain, and is yet sufficiently irregular. Of these reformers some have endeavoured to accommodate orthography better to the pronunciation, without considering that this is to measure by a shadow, to take that for a model or standard which is changing while they apply it. Others, less absurdly indeed, but with equal unlikelihood of success, have endeavoured to proportion the number of letters to that of sounds, that every sound may have its own character, and every character a single sound. Such would be the orthography of a new language to be formed by a synod of grammarians upon principles of science. But who can hope to prevail on nations to change their practice, and make all their old books useless? or what advantage would a new orthography procure equivalent to the confusion and perplexity of such an alteration?

Some of these schemes I shall however exhibit, which may be used according to the diversities of genius, as a guide to reformers, or terror to innovators.

One of the first who proposed a scheme of regular orthography, was Sir Thomas Smith, secretary of state to Queen Elizabeth, a man of real learning, and much practised in grammatical disquisitions. Had he written the following lines according to his scheme, they would have appeared thus:

At length Erasmus, that great injur'd name,
The glory of the priesthood, and the shame,
Stemm'd the wild torrent of a bar'rous age,
And drove those holy Vandals off the stage.

At lengð Erasmus, ðat grēt injur'd nām,
Æ glori of ðe præsthood and ðe zām,
Stemm'd ðe wild torrent of a barb'rous æg,
And drøv ðos hōli Vandals off ðe stæg.

After him another mode of writing was offered by Dr. Gill, the celebrated master of St. Paul's school in London; which I cannot represent exactly for want of types, but will approach as nearly as I can by means of characters now in use, so as to make it understood, exhibiting two stanzas of Spencer in the reformed orthography.

Spenser, book iii. canto 5.

Unthankful wretch, said he, is this the meed,
With which her sovereign mercy thou dost quite?
Thy life she saved by her gracious deed;
But thou dost ween with villanous despight,
To blot her honour, and her heav'nly light.
Die, rather die, than so dishonourably,
Deem of her high desert, or seem so light.
Fair death it is to shun more shame; then die.
Die, rather die, than ever love dishonourably.
But if to love dishonourably it be,
Shall I then hate her, that from death's door
Me brought? ah! far be such reproach from me.
What can I less do, than her love therefore,
Sich I her due reward cannot restore?
Die, rather die, and dying do her serve,
Dying her serve, and living her adore.
Thy life she gave, thy life she doth deserve;
Die, rather die, than ever from her service swerve.

Dr. Gill was followed by Charles Butler, a man who did not want an understanding which might have qualified him for better employment. He seems to have been more sanguine than his predecessors, for he printed his book according to his own scheme; which the following specimen will make easily understood.

But whensoever you have occasion to trouble their patience, or to come among them being troubled, it is better to stand upon your guard, than to trust to their gentleness. For the safeguard of your face, which they have most mind unto, provide a purcheod, made of coarse boulder, to be drawn and knit about your collar, which for more safety is to be lined against the eminent parts with woollen cloth. First cut a piece about an inch and a half broad, and half a yard long, to reach round by the temples and forehead, from one ear to the other; which being sowed in his place, join unto it two short pieces of the same breadth under the eyes, for the balls of the cheeks, and then set an other piece about the breadth of a shilling against the top of the nose. At other times, when they are not angered, a little piece half a quarter broad, to cover the eyes and parts about them, may serve though it be in the heat of the day.

But penſeſſer you hav' occaſion to trouble ðeir pacienc', or to coom among ðem being troubled, it is better to ſtand upon your gard, ðan to truſt to ðeir gentlenes. For ðe ſaf'gard of your fac', pio ðey hav' moſt mind' unto, provid' a purcheod, mad' of coorſe boulder, to bæ drawn and knit about your collar pio for mor' ſaf'ty is to bæ lined againſt ð' eminent parts wic woollen clot. Firſt cut a pec' about an ian and a half broad, and half a yard long, to reach round by ðe temples and for'head, from one ear to ðe oðer; pio *bæ*ing ſowed in his plac', join unto it two port pieces of the ſam breac't under ðe eys, for the balls of ðe cheeks, and then ſet an oðer pec' about ðe breac't of a pilling againſt the top of ðe noſe. At oðer tim's, pen ðey ar' not angered, a little piec' half a quarter broad, to cover ðe eys and parts about them, may ſerve ðowx it be in ðe heat of ðe day. Butler on the Nature and Properties of Bees, 1634.

In the time of Charles I. there was a very prevalent inclination to change the orthography; as appears, among other books, in such editions of the works of Milton as were published by himself. Of these reformers every man had his own scheme; but they agreed in one general design of accommodating the letters to the pronunciation, by ejecting such as they thought superfluous. Some of them would have written these lines thus:

— All the erth
Shall the be par:dis, far happier place
Than this of Eden, and far happier dais.

Bishop Wilkins afterwards, in his great work of the philosophical language, proposed, without expecting to be followed, a regular orthography; by which the Lord's prayer is to be written thus:

Yæ fæther hæith art in héven, halloed bi dhyi nám, dhyi cingdým cým, dhy sál ti lya in erth as it is in héven, &c.

We have since had no general reformers; but some ingenious men have endeavoured to deserve well of their country, by writing honor and labor for honour and labour, red for read in the preter-tense, fais for says, repte for repeat, expl ne for explain, or declame for declaim. Of these it may be said, that as they have done no good, they have done little harm; both because they have innovated little, and because few have followed them.

The English language has properly no dialects; the stile of writers has no professed diversity in the use of words, or of their flexions, and terminations, nor differs but by different degrees of skill or care. The oral diction is uniform in no spacious country, but has less variation in England than in most other nations of equal extent. The language of the northern counties retains many words now out of use, but which are commonly of the genuine Teutonic race, and is uttered with a pronunciation which now seems harsh and rough, but was probably used by our ancestors. The northern speech is therefore not barbarous but obsolete. The speech in the western provinces seems to differ from the general diction rather by a depraved pronunciation, than by any real difference which letters would express.

ETYMOLOGY.

ETYMOLOGY teaches the deduction of one word from another, and the various modifications by which the sense of the same word is diversified; as horse, horses; I love, I loved.

Of the ARTICLE.

The English have two articles, an or a, and the.

AN, A.

A has an indefinite signification, and means one, with some reference to more; as, This is a good book, that is, one among the books that are good. He was killed by a sword, that is, some sword. This is a better book for a man than a boy, that is, for one of those that are men than one of those that are boys. An army might enter without resistance, that is, any army.

In the senses in which we use a or an in the singular, we speak in the plural without an article; as, these are good books.

I have made an the original article, because it is only the Saxon an, or æn, one, applied to a new use, as the German ein, and the French un; the n being cut off before a consonant in the speed of utterance.

Grammarians of the last age direct, that an should be used before b; whence it appears that the English anciently aspirated less. An is still used before the silent b, as an herb, an honest man: but otherwise a; as,

A horse, a horse, my kingdom for a horse.

Shakespeare.

An or a can only be joined with a singular, the correspondent plural is the noun without an article, as I want a pen, I want pens: or with the pronominal adjective some, as I want some pens.

THE has a particular and definite signification.

The fruit

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world.

Milton.

That is, that particular fruit, and this world in which we live. So He giveth fodder for the cattle, and green herbs for the use of man; that is, for those things that are cattle, and his use that is man.

The is used in both numbers.

I am as free as Nature first made man,
Ere the base laws of servitude began,
When wild in woods the noble savage ran.

Dryd.

Many words are used without articles; as,

1. Proper names, as John, Alexander, Longinus, Aristarchus, Jerusalem, Athens, Rome, London. God is used as a proper name.
2. Abstract names, as blackness, witchcraft, virtue, vice, beauty, ugliness, love, hatred, anger, goodnature, kindness.
3. Words in which nothing but the mere being of any thing is implied: This is not beer, but water; This is not brass, but steel.

Of NOUNS SUBSTANTIVES.

The relations of English nouns to words going before or following are not expressed by cases, or changes of termination,

A GRAMMAR OF THE

tion, but as in most of the other European languages by prepositions, unless we may be said to have a genitive case.

	Singular.
Nom. Magister,	a Master, the Master.
Gen. Magistri, of	a Master, of the Master, or Masters, the Masters.
Dat. Magistro, to	a Master, to the Master.
Acc. Magistrum,	a Master, the Master.
Voc. Magister,	Master, O Master.
Abl. Magistro, from	a Master, from the Master.

	Plural.
Nom. Magistri,	Masters, the Masters.
Gen. Magistrorum, of	Masters, of the Masters.
Dat. Magistris, to	Masters, to the Masters.
Acc. Magistros,	Masters, the Masters.
Voc. Magistri,	Masters, O Masters.
Abl. Magistris, from	Masters, from the Masters.

Our nouns are therefore only declined thus :

Master, Gen. Masters.	Plur. Masters.
Scholar, Gen. Scholars.	Plur. Scholars.

These genitives are always written with a mark of elision, magister's, scholar's, according to an opinion long received, that the 's is a contraction of his, as the soldier's valour, for the soldier his valour: but this cannot be the true original, because 's is put to female nouns. Woman's beauty; the Virgin's delicacy; haughty Juno's unrelenting hate: and collective nouns, as Women's passions, the rabble's insolence; the multitude's folly; in all these cases it is apparent that his cannot be understood. We say likewise, the foundation's strength, the diamond's lustre, the winter's severity; but in these cases his may be understood, he and his having formerly been applied to neuters in the place now supplied by it and its.

The learned and sagacious Wallis, to whom every English grammarian owes a tribute of reverence, calls this modification of the noun an adjective possessive; I think with no more propriety than he might have applied the same to the genitive in equitum decus, Trojæ uris, or any other Latin genitive. Dr. Lowth, on the other part, supposes the possessive pronouns mine and thine to be genitive cases.

This termination of the noun seems to constitute a real genitive indicating possession. It is derived to us from those who declined smith, a smith; Gen. smithes, of a smith; Plur. smithes, or smithas, smiths; and so into two other of their seven declensions.

It is a further confirmation of this opinion, that in the old poets both the genitive and plural were longer by a syllable than the original word; knights, for knight's in Chaucer; leaves, for leaves, in Spenser.

When a word ends in s, the genitive may be the same with the nominative, as Venus temple.

The plural is formed by adding s, as table, tables; fly, flies; sister, sisters; wood, woods; or es where s could not otherwise be founded, as after ch, s, sh, x, z; after c sounded like s, and g like j; the mute e is vocal before s, as lance, lances; outrage, outrages.

The formation of the plural and genitive singular is the same.

A few words yet make the plural in n, as men, women, oxen, swine, and more anciently eyen and sheen. This formation is that which generally prevails in the Teutonic dialects.

Words that end in f commonly form their plural by ves, as loaf, loaves; calf, calves.

Except a few, muff, muffs; chief, chiefs. So hoof, hoofs, proof, relief, mischief, puff, cuff, dwarf, handkerchief, grief.

Irregular plurals are teeth from tooth, lice from louse, mice from mouse, geese from goose, feet from foot, dice from die, pence from penny, brethren from brother, children from child.

Plurals ending in s have for the most part no genitives; but we say, Womens excellencies, and Weigh the mens wits against the ladies hairs. Pope.

Dr. Wallis thinks the Lord's house may be said for the house of Lords; but such phrases are not now in use; and surely an English ear rebels against them, they would commonly produce a troublesome ambiguity, as the Lord's house, may be the house of Lords, or the house of a Lord. Besides that the mark of elision is improper, for in the Lord's house nothing is cut off.

Some English substantives, like those of many other languages, change their termination as they express different sexes, as prince, princess; actor, actress; lion, lioness; hero, heroine. To these mentioned by Dr. Lowth may be added arbitress, poetess, chauntress, duchess, tigress, governess, tutress, peeress, authoress, traytress, and perhaps others. Of these variable terminations we have only a sufficient number to make us feel our want; for when we say of a woman that she is a philosopher, an astronomer, a builder, a weaver, a dancer, we perceive an impropriety in the termination which we cannot avoid; but we can say that she is an architect, a botanist, a student, because these terminations have not annexed to them the notion of sex. In words which the necessities of life are often requiring, the sex is distinguished not by different terminations but by different names, as a bull, a cow; a horse, a mare; equus, equa; a cock, a hen; and sometimes by pronouns prefixed, as a he-goat, a she-goat.

Of ADJECTIVES.

Adjectives in the English language are wholly indeclinable; having neither case, gender, nor number, and being added to substantives in all relations without any change; as, a good woman, good women; of a good woman; a good man, good men, of good men.

The Comparison of Adjectives.

The comparative degree of adjectives is formed by adding er, the superlative by adding est, to the positive; as fair, fairer, fairest; lovely, lovelier, loveliest; sweet, sweeter, sweetest; low, lower, lowest; high, higher, highest.

Some words are irregularly compared; as good, better, best; bad, worse, worst; little, less, least; near, nearer, next; much, more, most; many (or moë), more (for moer), most (for moest); late, later, latest or last.

Some comparatives form a superlative by adding most, as nether, nethermost; outer, outermost; under, undermost; up, upper, uppermost; fore, former, foremost.

Most is sometimes added to a substantive, as topmost, southmost.

Many adjectives do not admit of comparison by terminations, and are only compared by more and most, as benevolent, more benevolent, most benevolent.

All adjectives may be compared by more and most, even when they have comparatives and superlatives regularly formed; as fair, fairer; or more fair: fairest, or most fair.

In adjectives that admit a regular comparison, the comparative more is oftener used than the superlative most, as more fair is oftener written for fairer, than most fair for fairest.

The comparison of adjectives is very uncertain; and being much regulated by commodiousness of utterance, or agreeableness of sound, is not easily reduced to rules.

Monosyllables are commonly compared.

Poly syllables, or words of more than two syllables, are seldom compared otherwise than by more and most, as deplorable, more deplorable, most deplorable.

Dissyllables are seldom compared if they terminate in some, as fulsome, toilsome; in ful, as careful, spleenful, dreadful; in ing, as trifling, charming; in ous, as porous; in less, as careless, harmless; in ed, as wretched: in id, as candid; in al, as mortal; in ent, as recent, fervent; in ain, as certain; in ive, as misgiving; in dy, as woody; in fy, as puffy; in ky, as rocky, except lucky; in my, as roomy; in ny, as skinny; in py, as ropy, except happy; in ry, as hoary.

Some comparatives and superlatives are yet found in good writers formed without regard to the foregoing rules: but in a language subjected so little and so lately to grammar, such anomalies must frequently occur.

So steady is compared by Milton.

She in shadiest covert hid,
Tun'd her nocturnal note.

Parad. Lost.

And virtuous.

What she wills to say or do,
Seems wisest, virtuouslest, discreetest, best.

Parad. Lost.

ENGLISH LANGUAGE.

So trifling, by Ray, who is indeed of no great authority.

It is not so decorous, in respect of God, that he should immediately do all the meanest and triflingest things himself, without making use of any inferior or subordinate minister.

Ray on the Creation.

Famous, by Milton.

I shall be named among the famousst
Of women, sung at solemn festivals.

Milton's Agonistes.

Inventive, by Ascham.

Those have the inventivest heads for all purposes, and roundest tongues in all matters.

Ascham's Schoolmaster.

Mortal, by Bacon.

The mortalest poisons practised by the West Indians, have some mixture of the blood, fat, or flesh of man.

Bacon.

Natural, by Wotton.

I will now deliver a few of the properest and naturallest considerations that belong to this piece.

Wotton's Architecture.

Wretched, by Jonson.

The wretcheder are the contemners of all helps; such as presuming on their own naturals, deride diligence, and mock at terms when they understand not things.

Ben Jonson.

Powerful, by Milton.

We have sustain'd one day in doubtful fight,
What heav'n's great King hath pow'rfullest to send Against us from about his throne.

Paradise Lost.

The termination in ish may be accounted in some sort a degree of comparison, by which the signification is diminished below the positive, as black, blackish, or tending to blackness; salt, saltish, or having a little taste of salt: they therefore admit no comparison. This termination is seldom added but to words expressing sensible qualities, nor often to words of above one syllable, and is scarcely used in the solemn or sublime style.

OF PRONOUNS.

Pronouns in the English language are, I, thou, he, with their plurals we, ye, they; it, who, which, what, whether, whosoever, whatsoever, my, mine, our, ours, thy, thine, your, yours, his, her, hers, their, theirs, this, that, other, another, the same, some.

The pronouns personal are irregularly inflected.

	Singular.	Plural.
Nom.	I	We
Accus. and other oblique cases.	Me	Us
Nom.	Thou	Ye
Oblique.	Thee	You

You is commonly used in modern writers for ye, particularly in the language of ceremony, where the second person plural is used for the second person singular, You are my friend.

	Singular.	Plural.
Nom.	He	They	} Applied to masculines.
Oblique.	Him	Them
Nom.	She	They	} Applied to feminines.
Oblique.	Her	Them
Nom.	It	They	} Applied to neutrals or things.
Oblique.	Its	Them

For it the practice of ancient writers was to use be, and for its, his.

The possessive pronouns, like other adjectives, are without cases or change of termination.

The possessive of the first person is my, mine, our, ours; of the second, thy, thine, you, yours; of the third, from be, his, from she, her, and hers, and in the plural their, theirs, for both sexes.

Our, yours, hers, theirs, are used when the substantive preceding is separated by a verb, as These are our books. These books are ours. Your children excel ours in stature, but ours surpass yours in learning.

Ours, yours, hers, theirs, notwithstanding their seeming plural termination, are applied equally to singular and plural substantives, as This book is ours. These books are ours.

Mine and thine were formerly used before a vowel, as mine amiable lady; which though now disused in prose, might be still properly continued in poetry, they are used as ours and yours, and are referred to a substantive preceding, as, thy house is larger than mine, but my garden is more spacious than thine.

Their and theirs are the possessives likewise of they, when they is the plural of it, and are therefore applied to things.

Pronouns relative are, who, which, what, whether, whosoever, whatsoever.

	Sing. and Plur.		Sing. and Plur.
Nom.	Who	Nom.	Which
Gen.	Whose	Gen.	Of which, or whose

Who is now used in relation to persons, and which in relation to things; but they were anciently confounded. At least it was common to say, the man which, though I remember no example of, the thing who.

Who is rather the poetical than regular genitive of which:

The fruit

Of that forbidden tree, whose mortal taste
Brought death into the world.

Milton.

Whether is only used in the nominative and accusative cases; and has no plural, being applied only to one of a number, commonly to one of two; as, Whether of these is left I know not. Whether shall I choose? It is now almost obsolete.

What, whether relative or interrogative, is without variation.

Whosoever, whatsoever, being compounded of who or what, and soever, follow the rule of their primitives.

	Singular.	Plural.
In all cases,	This	These
	That	Those
	Other	Others
	Whether

The plural others is not used but when it is referred to a substantive preceding, as I have sent other horses. I have not sent the same horses, but others.

Another, being only an other, has no plural.

Here, there, and where, joined with certain particles, have a relative and pronominal use. Hereof, herein, hereby, hereafter, herewith, thereof, therein, thereby, thereupon, therewith, whereof, wherein, whereby, whereupon, wherewith, which signify, of this, in this, &c., of that, in that, &c. of which, in which, &c.

Therefore and wherefore, which are properly, there for and where for, for that, for which, are now reckoned conjunctions, and continued in use. The rest seem to be passing by degrees into neglect, though proper, useful, and analogous. They are referred both to singular and plural antecedents.

There are two more words used only in conjunction with pronouns, own and self.

Own is added to possessives, both singular and plural, as my own hand, our own house. It is emphatical, and implies a silent contrariety or opposition; as I live in my own house, that is, not in a hired house. This I did with my own hand, that is, without help, or not by proxy.

Self is added to possessives, as myself, yourselves; and sometimes to personal pronouns, as himself, itself, themselves. It then, like own, expresses emphasis and opposition, as I did this myself, that is, not another; or it forms a reciprocal pronoun, as We hurt ourselves by vain rage.

Himself, itself, themselves, is supposed by Wallis to be put by corruption, for his self, it self, their selves; so that self is always a substantive. This seems justly observed, for we say, He came himself; Himself shall do this; where himself cannot be an accusative.

OF THE VERB.

English Verbs are active, as I love; or neuter, as I languish. The neutrals are formed like the actives.

Most

A GRAMMAR OF THE

Most verbs signifying action may likewise signify condition or habit, and become neuters, as I love, I am in love, I strike, I am now striking.

Verbs have only two tenses inflected in their terminations, the present and simple preterite; the other tenses are compounded of the auxiliary verbs have, shall, will, let, may, can, and the infinitive of the active or neuter verb.

The passive voice is formed by joining the participle preterite to the substantive verb, as I am loved.

To have. Indicative Mood.

Present Tense.

Sing. I have; thou hast; he hath or has.

Plur. We have; ye have; they have.

Has is a termination corrupted from hath, but now more frequently used both in prose and verse.

Simple Preterite.

Sing. I had; thou hadst; he had;

Plur. We had; ye had; they had.

Compound Preterite.

Sing. I have had; thou hast had; he has or hath had;

Plur. We have had; ye have had; they have had.

Preterpluperfect.

Sing. I had had; thou hadst had; he had had;

Plur. We had had; ye had had; they had had.

Future.

Sing. I shall have; thou shalt have; he shall have;

Plur. We shall have; ye shall have; they shall have.

Second Future.

Sing. I will have; thou wilt have; he will have;

Plur. We will have; ye will have; they will have.

By reading these future tenses may be observed the variations of shall and will.

Imperative Mood.

Sing. Have, or have thou; let him have;

Plur. Let us have; have, or have ye; let them have.

Conjunctive Mood.

Present.

Sing. I have; thou have; he have;

Plur. We have; ye have; they have.

Preterite simple as in the Indicative.

Preterite compound.

Sing. I have had; thou have had; he have had.

Plur. We have had; ye have had; they have had;

Future.

Sing. I shall have; as in the Indicative.

Second Future.

Sing. I shall have had; thou shalt have had; he shall have had;

Plur. We shall have had; ye shall have had; they shall have had.

Potential.

The potential form of speaking is expressed by may, can, in the present; and might, could, or should, in the preterite, joined with the infinitive mood of the verb.

Present.

Sing. I may have; thou mayst have; he may have;

Plur. We may have; ye may have; they may have.

Preterite.

Sing. I might have; thou mightst have; he might have;

Plur. We might have; ye might have; they might have.

Present.

Sing. I can have; thou canst have; he can have;

Plur. We can have; ye can have; they can have.

Preterite.

Sing. I could have; thou couldst have; he could have;

Plur. We could have; ye could have; they could have.

In like manner should is united to the verb.

There is likewise a double Preterite.

Sing. I should have had; thou shouldst have had; he should have had;

Plur. We should have had; ye should have had; they should have had.

In like manner we use, I might have had; I could have had, &c.

Infinitive Mood.

Present. To have. Preterite. To have had.

Participle present. Having. Participle preter. Had.

Verb Active. To Love.

Indicative. Present.

Sing. I love; thou lovest; he loveth, or loves;

Plur. We love; ye love; they love.

Preterite simple.

Sing. I loved; thou lovedst; he loved;

Plur. We loved; ye loved; they loved.

Preterperfect compound. I have loved, &c.

Preterpluperfect. I had loved, &c.

Future. I shall love, &c. I will love, &c.

Imperative.

Sing. Love, or love thou; let him love;

Plur. Let us love; love, or love ye; let them love.

Conjunctive. Present.

Sing. I love; thou love; he love;

Plur. We love; ye love; they love.

Preterite simple. As in the Indicative.

Preterite compound. I have loved, &c.

Future. I shall love, &c.

Second Future. I shall have loved, &c.

Potential.

Present. I may or can love, &c.

Preterite. I might, could, or should love, &c.

Double Pret. I might, could, or should have loved, &c.

Infinitive.

Present. To love. Preterite. To have loved.

Participle present. Loving. Participle past. Loved.

The passive is formed by the addition of the participle preterite, to the different tenses of the verb to be, which must therefore be here exhibited.

Indicative. Present.

Sing. I am; thou art; he is;

Plur. We are, or be; ye are, or be; they are, or be.

The plural be is now little in use.

Preterite.

Sing. I was; thou wast or wert; he was;

Plur. We were; ye were; they were.

Wert is properly of the conjunctive mood, and ought not to be used in the indicative.

Preterite compound. I have been, &c.

Preterpluperfect. I had been, &c.

Future. I shall or will be, &c.

Imperative.

Sing. Be thou; let him be;

Plur. Let us be; be ye; let them be.

Conjunctive. Present.

Sing. I be; thou beest; he be;

Plur. We be; ye be; they be.

Preterite.

Sing. I were; thou wert; he were;

Plur. We were; ye were; they were.

Preterite compound. I have been, &c.

Future. I shall have been, &c.

Infinitive.

Present. To be loved. Preterite. To have been loved.

Participle. Loved.

There is another form of English verbs, in which the infinitive mood is joined to the verb do in its various inflections, which are therefore to be learned in this place.

To Do.

Indicative. Present.

Sing. I do; thou dost; he doth;

Plur. We do; ye do; they do.

Preterite.

Sing. I did; thou didst; he did;

Plur. We did; ye did; they did.

Preterite, &c. I have done, &c. I had done, &c.

Future. I shall or will do, &c.

Imperative.

Sing. Do thou; let him do;

Plur. Let us do; do ye; let them do.

Conjunctive. Present.

Sing. I do; thou do; he do;

Plur. We do; ye do; they do.

The rest are as in the Indicative.

Infinitive. To do; to have done.

Participle pres. Doing. Participle preter. Done.

Do is sometimes used superfluously, as, I do love, I did love; simply for I love, or I loved; but this is considered as a vitious mode of speech.

It is sometimes used emphatically; as,

*I do love thee, and when I love thee not,
Chaos is come again.*

Shakespeare.

It is frequently joined with a negative; as, I like her, but I do not love her; I wished him success, but did not help him. This, by custom at least, appears more easy, than the other form of expressing the same sense by a negative adverb after the verb, I like her, but love her not.

The Imperative prohibitory is seldom applied in the second person, at least in prose, without the word do; as, Stop him, but do not hurt him; Praise beauty, but do do no dote on it.

Its chief use is in interrogative forms of speech, in which it is used through all the persons; as, Do I live? Dost thou strike me? Do they rebel? Did I complain? Didst thou love her? Did she die? So likewise in negative interrogations; Do I not yet grieve? Did she not die?

Do and did are thus used only for the present and simple preterite.

There is another manner of conjugating neuter verbs, which, when it is used, may not improperly denominate them neuter passives, as they are inflected according to the passive form by the help of the verb substantive to be. They answer nearly to the reciprocal verbs in French; as,

VOL. I. N° 1.

I am risen, surrexi, Latin; Je me suis levé, French.

I was walked out, exieram; Je m'étois promené.

In like manner we commonly express the present tense; as, I am going, eo. I am grieving, doleo. She is dying, illa moritur. The tempest is raging, furit procella. I am pursuing an enemy, hostem insequor. So the other tenses, as, We were walking, ivyxi, amur, ivyxi, amur, I have been walking, I had been walking, I shall or will be walking.

There is another manner of using the active participle, which gives it a passive signification; as, The grammar is now printing, grammatica jam nunc chartis imprimitur. The brass is forging, cera excuduntur. This is, in my opinion, a vitious expression, probably corrupted from a phrase more pure, but now somewhat obsolete: The book is a printing, The brass is a forging; a being properly at, and printing and forging verbal nouns signifying action, according to the analogy of this language.

The indicative and conjunctive moods are by modern writers frequently confounded, or rather the conjunctive is wholly neglected, when some convenience of verification does not invite its revival. It is used among the purer writers of former times after if, though, ere, before, till or until, whether, except, unless, whatsoever, whomsoever, and words of wishing; as Doubtless thou art our father, though Abraham be ignorant of us, and Israel acknowledge us not.

Of IRREGULAR VERBS.

The English verbs were divided by Ben Jonson into four conjugations, without any reason arising from the nature of the language, which has properly but one conjugation, such as has been exemplified; from which all deviations are to be considered as anomalies, which are indeed in our monosyllable Saxon verbs, and the verbs derived from them, very frequent; but almost all the verbs which have been adopted from other languages, follow the regular form.

Our verbs are observed by Mr. Wallis to be irregular only in the formation of the preterite, and its participle. Indeed, in the scantiness of our conjugations, there is scarcely any other place for irregularity.

The first irregularity, is a slight deviation from the regular form, by rapid utterance or poetical contraction: the last syllable ed is often joined with the former by suppression of e; as lov'd for loved; after c, ch, sh, f, k, x, and after the consonants, s, th, when more strongly pronounced, and sometimes after m, n, r, if preceded by a short vowel, t is used in pronunciation, but very seldom in writing, rather than d; as plac't, snatch't, fish't, wak't, dwel't, smel't; for plac'd, snatch'd, fish'd, wak'd, dwel'd, smel'd; or placed, snatched, fished, waked, dwelled, smelled.

Those words which terminate in l or ll, or p, make their preterite in t, even in solemn language; as crept, felt, dwelt; sometimes after x, ed is changed into t; as wext: this is not constant.

A long vowel is often changed into a short one; thus, kept, slept, wkept, crept, swept; from the verbs, to keep, to sleep, to weep, to creep, to sweep.

Where d or t go before, the additional letter d or t, in this contracted form, coalesce into one letter with the radical d or t: if t were the radical, they coalesce into t; but if d were the radical, then into d or t, as the one or the other letter may be more easily pronounced: as, read, led, spread, shed, shed, bid, bid, chid, fed, bled, bred, sped, strid, rid; from the verbs to read, to lead, to spread, to shed, to spread, to bid, to bide, to chide, to feed, to bleed, to breed, to speed, to stride, to slide, to ride. And thus, cast, hurt, cost, burst, eat, beat, sweat, fit, quit, smit, writ, bit, hit, met, shot; from the verbs, to cast, to hurt, to cost, to burst, to eat, to beat, to sweat, to fit, to quit, to smite, to write, to bite, to hit, to meet, to shoot. And in like manner, lent, sent, rent, girt; from the verbs, to lend, to send, to rend, to gird.

The participle preterite or passive is often formed in en, instead of ed; as been, taken, given, slain, known; from the verbs, to be, to take, to give, to slay, to know.

Many words have two or more participles, as not only written, bitten, eaten, beaten, hidden, chidden, shotten, chosen, broken; but likewise writ, bit, eat, beat, hid, chid, shot, chose, broke, are promiscuously used in the participle, from the verbs to write, to bite, to eat, to beat, to hide, to chide, to shoot, to choose, to break, and many such like.

A GRAMMAR OF THE

In the same manner foven, shewn, beven, mowen, loaden, laden, as well as fovd, shovd, bevd, movd, loadd, ladd, from the verbs to fove, to shew, to beve, to move, to load, or lade.

Concerning these double participles it is difficult to give any rule; but he shall seldom err who remembers, that when a verb has a participle distinct from its preterite, as wrote, wrote, written, that distinct participle is more proper and elegant, as The book is written, is better than The book is wrote. Wrote however may be used in poetry; at least if we allow any authority to poets, who, in the exultation of genius, think themselves perhaps intitled to trample on grammarians.

There are other anomalies in the preterite.

1. Win, spin, begin, swim, strike, stick, sing, sling, slung, ring, swing, spring, swing, drink, sink, shrink, stink, come, run, find, bind, grind, wind, both in the preterite, imperfect, and participle passive, give won, spun, begun, swum, struck, stuck, sung, rung, sung, rung, sprung, swung, drunk, sunk, shrunk, sunk, come, run, found, bound, ground, wound. And most of them are also formed in the preterite by d, as began, rang, sang, sprang, drank, came, ran, and some others; but most of these are now obsolete. Some in the participle passive likewise take en, as stricken, stricken, drunken, bounden.

2. Fight, teach, reach, seek, beseech, catch, buy, bring, think, work, make fought, taught, raught, sought, besought, caught, bought, brought, thought, wrought.

But a great many of these retain likewise the regular form, as taached, reached, beseeched, caught, worked.

3. Take, shake, forsake, wake, awake, stand, break, speak, bear, shear, swear, tear, weave, cleave, strive, thrive, drive, shine, rise, arise, smite, write, bide, abide, ride, choose, chuse, tread, get, beget, forget, seth, make in both preterite and participle took, forsook, woke, awoke, flood, broke, spoke, bore, shore, swore, tore, wore, wore, clove, strove, throve, drove, shone, rose, arose, smote, wrote, bode, abode, rode, chose, trade, got, begot, forgot, sod. But we say likewise, thrive, rise, smit, writ, abid, rid. In the preterite some are likewise formed by a, as brake, spake, bare, share, sware, tare, ware, clave, gat, begat, forgat, and perhaps some others, but more rarely. In the participle passive are many of them formed by en, as taken, shaken, forsaken, broken, spoken, born, shorn, sworn, torn, sworn, swollen, cloven, thriven, driven, risen, smitten, ridden, chosen, trodden, gotten, begotten, forgotten, foddren. And many do likewise retain the analogy in both, as waked, awaked, sheared, weaved, leaved, abided, setbed.

4. Give, bid, sit, make in the preterite gave, bade, sate; in the participle passive, given, bidden, suten; but in both did.

5. Draw, know, grow, throw, blow, crow like a cock, lay, slay, see, ly, make their preterite drew, knew, grew, threw, blew, crew, flew, flew, saw, lay; their participles passive by n, drawn, known, grown, thrown, blown, flown, slain, seen, lien, lain. Yet from see is made sled; from go, went, from the old wend, the participle is gone.

OF DERIVATION.

That the English language may be more easily understood, it is necessary to enquire how its derivative words are deduced from their primitives, and how the primitives are borrowed from other languages. In this inquiry I shall sometimes copy Dr. Wallis, and sometimes endeavour to supply his defects, and rectify his errors.

Nouns are derived from verbs.

The thing implied in the verb as done or produced, is commonly either the present of the verb; as, to love, love; to fright, a fright; to fight, a fight; or the preterite of the verb, as, to strike, I strike or strook, a stroke.

The action is the same with the participle present, as loving, fighting, fighting, striking.

The agent, or person acting, is denoted by the syllable er added to the verb, as lover, fighter, striker.

Substantives, adjectives; and sometimes other parts of speech, are changed into verbs: in which case the vowel is often lengthened, or the consonant softened; as a house, to house; brass, to braise; glass, to glaze; grails, to graze; price, to prize; breath, to breathe; a fish, to fish; oyl, to oyle; further, to further; forward, to forward; hinder, to binder.

Sometimes the termination en is added, especially to adjectives; as, haste, to hasten; length, to lengthen; strength, to strengthen; short, to shorten; fast, to fasten; white, to whiten; black, to blacken; hard, to harden, soft, to soften.

From substantives are formed adjectives of plenty, by adding the termination y; as a house, lousy; wealth, wealthy; health, healthy; might, mighty; worth, worthy; wit, witty; lust, lusty; water, watery; earth, earthy; wood, a wood, woody; air, airy; a heart, heartly; a hand, handy.

From substantives are formed adjectives of plenty, by adding the termination ful, denoting abundance, as, joy, joyful; fruit, fruitful; youth, youthful; care, careful; use, useful; delight, delightful; plenty, plentiful; help, helpful.

Sometimes, in almost the same sense, but with some kind of diminution thereof, the termination some is added, denoting something, or in some degree; as delight, delightsome; game, gamesome; irk, irksome; burden, burdensome; trouble, troublesome; light, lightsome; hand, handsome; alone, lonesome; toil, toilsome.

On the contrary, the termination less added to substantives, makes adjectives signifying want; as worthless, witless, heartless, joyless, careless, helpless. Thus comfort, comfortless; sap, sapless.

Privation or contrariety is very often denoted by the particle un prefixed to many adjectives, or in before words derived from the Latin; as, pleasant, unpleasant; wife, unwife; profitable, unprofitable; patient, impatient. Thus unworthy, unhealthy, unfruitful, unuseful, and many more.

The original English privative is un; but as we often borrow from the Latin, or its descendants, words already signifying privation, as ineffectual, impious, indiscreet, the inseparable particles un and in have fallen into confusion, from which it is not easy to disentangle them.

Un is prefixed to all words originally English; as untrue, untruth, untaught, unhandsome.

Un is prefixed to all participles made privative adjectives, as unfeeling, unassisting, unaiding, unaided, undelighted, unendeared.

Un ought never to be prefixed to a participle present, to mark a forbearance of action, as unfighing; but a privation of habit as unpitying.

Un is prefixed to most substantives which have an English termination, as unfertile, unperfectness, which, if they have borrowed terminations, take in or im, as infertility, imperfection; uncivil, incivility; inactive, inactivity.

In borrowing adjectives, if we receive them already compounded, it is usual to retain the particle prefixed, as indecent, indignant, improper; but if we borrow the adjective, and add the privative particle, we commonly prefix un, as unpolite, ungallant.

The prepositive particles dis and mis, derived from the dis and mes of the French, signify almost the same as un; yet dis rather imports contrariety than privation, since it answers to the Latin preposition de. Mis insinuates some error, and for the most part may be rendered by the Latin words male or perperam. To like, to dislike; honour, dishonour; to honour, to grace, to dishonour, to disgrace; to deign, to disdain; chance, hap, mischance, mishap; to take, to mistake; deed, misdeed; to use, to misuse; to employ, to misemploy; to apply, to misapply.

Words derived from Latin written with de or dis, retain the same signification as distinguish, distinguish, detract, detract, defame, defame; detain, detain.

The termination ly added to substantives, and sometimes to adjectives, forms adjectives that import some kind of similitude or agreement, being formed by contraction of like or like.

A giant, giantly, giantlike; earth, earthly; heaven, heavenly; world, worldly; God, godly; good, goodly.

The

E N G L I S H T O N G U E.

The same termination ly added to adjectives, forms adverbs of like signification; as beautiful, beautifully; sweet, sweetly; that is, in a beautiful manner; with some degree of sweetness.

The termination ish added to adjectives, imports diminution; and added to substantives, imports similitude or tendency to a character; as, green, greenish; white, whitish; soft softish; a thief, thievish, a wolf, wolfish; a child, childish.

We have forms of diminutives in substantives, though not frequent; as, a hill, a billock; a cock, a cockrel; a pike, pickrel; this is a French termination; a goose, a gosling; this is a German termination: a lamb, a lambkin; a chick, a chicken; a man, a manikin; a pipe, a pipkin; and thus Halkin, whence the patronimick Harwkins; Wilkin, Thomkin, and others.

Yet still there is another form of diminution among the English, by lessening the sound itself, especially of vowels; as there is a form of augmenting them by enlarging, or even lengthening it; and that sometimes not so much by change of the letters, as of their pronunciation; as sup, sip, jopp, fop, fippet, where, besides the extenuation of the vowel, there is added the French termination et; top, tip; spit, spout; babe, baby, booby, boozes; great pronounced long, especially if with a stronger sound, great; little pronounced long, lee-tle; ting, tang, tong, imports a succession of smaller and then greater sounds; and so in jingle, jangle, tingle, tangle, and many other made words.

Much however of this is arbitrary and fanciful, depending wholly on oral utterance, and therefore scarcely worthy the notice of Wallis.

Of concrete adjectives are made abstract substantives, by adding the termination ness, and a few in hood or bead, noting character or qualities ; as, white, whiteness ; hard, hardness ; great, greatness ; skilful, skilfulness, unskilfulness ; godbead ; manhood, maidenbead, widowhood, knighthood, priesthood, likehood, falsehood.

There are other abstracts, partly derived from adjectives, and partly from verbs, which are formed by the addition of the termination th, a small change being sometimes made; as, long, length; strong, strength; broad, breadth; wide, width; deep, depth; true, truth; warm, warmth; dear, dearth; flow, flowth; merry, mirth; heal, health; well, wealth; dry, drowth; young, youth; and so moon, month.

Like these are some words derived from verbs ; dy, death ; till, tith ; grow, growth ; mow, later mowth ; after mow'th ; commonly spoken and written later math, after math ; steal, stealth ; bear, birth ; rue, ruth ; and probably earth from to ear or plow ; fly, flight ; weigh, weight ; fray, fright ; to draw, draught.

These should rather be written flightb, frightb, only that custom will not suffer b to be twice repeated.

The fame form retain faith, spight, wreath, wrath, broth, froth, breath, loot, worth, light, wight, and the like, whose primitives are either entirely obsolete, or seldom occur. Perhaps they are derived from fey or foy, spy, wry, wreak, brew, mow, fry, bray, jay, work.

Some ending in ship imply an office, employment, or condition; as kingship, wardship, guardianship, partnership, stewardship, headship, lordship.

Thus worship, that is, worthskip; whence worshipful, and to worship.

Some few ending in dom, rick, wick, do especially denote dominion, at least state or condition; as kingdom, dukedom, earldom, princedom, popedom, christendom, freedom, wisdom, whoredom, bishoprick, bailewick.

Ment and age are plainly French terminations, and are of the same import with us as among them, scarcely ever occurring, except in words derived from the French, as commandment, usage.

There are in English often long trains of words allied by their meaning and derivation; as, to beat, a bat, baton, a battle, a beetle, a battle-door, to batter, batter, a kind of glutinous composition for food, made by beating different bodies into one mass. All these are of similar signification, and perhaps derived from the Latin batus. Thus tate, touch, tickle, tack, tackle; it imply a local conjunction, from the Latin tango, tetigi, tactum.

From two are formed twain, twice, twenty, twelve, twos, twine, twist, twirl, twig, twitch, twinge, between, betwixt, twilight, turn.

The following remarks, extracted from Wallis, are ingenious, but of more subtlety than solidity, and such as perhaps might in every language be enlarged without end.

Sn usually imply the note, and what relates to it. From the Latin nasus are derived the French nez; and the English nose; and nessé, a promontory, as projecting like a nose. But as if from the consonants ns taken from nasus, and transposed, that they may the better correspond, sn denote nusus; and thence are derived many words that relate to the note, as snout, sneeze, snore, snort, snear, snicker, snot, snivel, snize, snuff, snuffle, snuffle, snariz, snudge.

There is another sn, which may perhaps be derived from the Latin sinus, as snake, sneak, snail, snare; so likewise snap and snatch, snib, snub.

Bl imply a blast; as blow, blast, to blast, to light, and, metaphorically, to blast one's reputation; bleat, bleak, a bleak place, to look bleak or weather-beaten, bleak, blay, bleach, blaffer, blurt, blister, blat, bladder, blob, blifter, blabber-lip't, blabber-check't, blotted, blote-berrings, blaff, blazes, to blow, that is, blissom, blom; and perhaps, blood and blurb.

In the native words of our tongue is to be found a great agreement between the letters and the things signified; and therefore the sounds of letters smaller, sharper, louder, clofter, softer, stronger, clearer, more obfcure, and more fridulous, do very often intimate the like effects in the things signified.

Thus words that begin with str intimate the force and effect of the thing signified, as if probably derived from σπρην, or σπρηνος; as strong, strength, strew, strike, streak, stroke, strip, strive, strife, struggle, strout, strut, stretch, strait, strict, stright, that is, narrow, disstrain, strjs, disjels, string, strap, stream, streamer, strand, strip, stray, struggle, strange, stride, straddle.

St in like manner imply strength, but in a less degree, so that much only as is sufficient to preserve what has been already communicated, rather than acquire any new degree; as if it were derived from the Latin sto: for example, stand, stay, that is, to remain, or to prop; staff, stay, that is, to oppose; stop, stop, stop, to stop, that is, to stop; a stay, that is, an obstacle; sick, suck, sucker, stammer, sagger, sickle, sick, sick, a sharp pain, and any thing deposited at play; stock, stem, sting, to sting, sink, sit, sud, stanchion, stab, stubble, to stub up, stump, whence stumble, stake, to stake, step, to stamp with the feet, whence to stamp, that is, to make an impression and a stamp; slow, to slow, to below, steward, to steward, stead, steady, steadfast, stable, a stable, a stall, to stall, still, stall, still, stall, stallage, stage, still adj. and still adv. stake, stout, sturdy, stead, stall, station, stiff, stark-dead; to starve with hunger or cold; stone, steel, stern, staunch, to staunch blood, to stare, sleep, sleeple, stair, standard, a stated measure, stately. In all these, and perhaps some others, st denote something firm and fixed.

Thr imply a more violent degree of motion, as throw, thrust, throng, throb, through, threat, threaten, thrall, throws.

Wr implies some sort of obliquity or distortion, as wry, to wreath, wrest, wrestle, wring, wrong, winch, wrench, wrangle, wrinkle, wrath, wreak, wrack, wretch, wrist, wrap.

Sw imply a silent agitation, or a softer kind of lateral motion: as sway, swag, to sway, swagger, swerve, sweat, sweep, swill, swim, swing, swift, sweet, switch, swing.

Nor is there much difference of sm in smoothe, smug, smile, smirk, smite, which signifies the same as to strike, but is a softer word; small, snell, smack, smother, smart, a smart blow properly signifies such a kind of stroke as with an originally silent motion implied in sm, proceeds to a quick violence, denoted by ar suddenly ended, as is shewn by t.

Cl denote a kind of adhesion or tenacity, as in cleave, clay, cling, climb, clamber, clammy, clasp, to clasp, to clip, to clench, cloak, clog, close, to close, a clod, a clot, as a clot of blood, clouted cream, a clutter, a cluster.

Simply a kind of diffipation or expansion, especially a quick one, particularly if there be an r as if it were from spargo or separo: for example, spread, spring, spring, sprig, sprout, sprinkle, split, splinter, spill, spit, sputter, patter.

Sl denote a kind of silent fall, or a less observable motion; as in slime, slide, slip, slipper, sly, sleight, slit, slow, slack, slight, sling, slap.

And to likewise af, in crash, raf, guf, flaf, claf, lah, flaf, plaf, traf, indicate something acting more nimbly and sharply. But uf, in cruf, ruft, guft, fluf, bluf, bruf, buf, puft, implies something as acting more obtusely and dully. Yet in both there is indicated a swift and sudden motion, not instantaneous, but gradual, by the continued sound f.

Thus in fling, sling, ding, sewing, cling, sing, wing, fling, the tingling of the termination ng, and the sharpness of the vowel i, imply the continuation of a very slender motion or tremor, at length indeed vanishing, but not suddenly interrupted. But in tink, wink, fink, clink, think, that end in a mute consonant, there is also indicated a sudden ending.

If there be an l, as in jingle, tingle, tinkle, mingle, sprinkle, twinkle, there is implied a frequency, or iteration of small acts. And the same frequency of acts, but less subtle by reason of the clearer vowel a, is indicated in jangle, tangle, spangle, mangle, wrangle, brangle, dangle; as also in mumble, grumble, jumble, tumble, stumble, rattle, crumble, fumble. But at the same time the close u implies something obscure or obtruded:

A GRAMMAR OF THE

and a congeries of consonants *mb*l, denotes a confused kind of rolling or tumbling, as in ramble, scamble, seramble, wamble, amble; but in these there is something acute.

In nimble, the acuteness of the vowel denotes celerity. In sparkle, sp denotes dissipation, ar an acute crackling, k a sudden interruption, l a frequent iteration; and in like manner in sprinkle, unless in may imply the feebility of the dissipated guttules. Thick and thin differ, in that the former ends with an obtuse consonant, and the latter with an acute.

In like manner, in squeek, squeak, squeal, quack, quall, brawl, wraul, yaul, spaul, fero-k, shreek, shrill, sharp, shrivel, wrinkle, crack, crash, clash, gnash, plash, crust, buff, hiss, fist, whiff, soft, jarr, hurl, curl, whirl, buzz, busht, spindle, dwindle, twine, twist, and in many more, we may observe the agreement of such sort of sounds with the things signified: and this so frequently happens, that scarce any language which I know can be compared with ours. So that one monosyllable word, of which kind are almost all ours, emphatically expresses what in other languages can scarce be explained but by compounds, or decompositions, or sometimes a tedious circumlocution.

We have many words borrowed from the Latin; but the greatest part of them were communicated by the intervention of the French; as grace, face, elegant, elegance, resemble.

Some verbs, which seem borrowed from the Latin, are formed from the present tense, and some from the supines.

From the present are formed spend, expend, expendo; conduce; conduco; despise, despicio; approve, approbo; conceive, concipio.

From the fupines, fupplicate, fupplico; demonstrate, demonstro; dispose, dispono; expatiate, expatior; suppress, fupprimio; exempt, exiuno.

Nothing is more apparent, than that Wallis goes too far in quest of originals. Many of these which seem selected as immediate descendants from the Latin, are apparently French, as conceive, approve, expose, ex-empt.

Some words purely French, not derived from the Latin, we have transferred into our language; as, garden, garter, buckler, to advance, to cry, to plead, from the French, jardin, jartier, bouclier, avancer, crier, plaider; though indeed, even of these, part is of Latin original.

As to many words which we have in common with the Germans, it is doubtful whether the old Teutons borrowed them from the Latins, or the Latins from the Teutons, or both had them from some common original: as, vine, vinum; wind, ventus; went, veni; way, via; wall, vallum; swallow, volvo; wool, vellus; will, volo; worm, vermis; worth, virtus; weep, velpa; day, dies; draw, trahō; tame, domo, daya, yoke, jugum, Zeus, over, upper, super; am, fum, am; break, frango; fly, volo; below, flo. I make no doubt but the Teutonic is more ancient than the Latin: and it is no less certain, that the Latin, which borrowed a great number of words, not only from the Greek, especially the Æolic, but from other neighbouring languages, as the Oscan, and others, which have long become obsolete, received not a few from the Teutonic. It is certain, that the English, German, and other Teutonic languages, retained some derived from the Greek, which the Latin has not; as ax, ach, mit, ford, pfund, daughter, tochter, mickle, mingle, moon, fear, grave, graff, to grave, to ferape, whale, from αἶψα, μῆλιν, παχυνος, Σελήνη, μυρίαδος, μυρία, ποτα, φόβος, τῆτα, δωρ. Since they received these immediately from the Greek, without the intervention of the Latin language, why may not other words be derived immediately from the same fountain, though they be likewise found among the Latins?

Our ancestors were studious to form borrowed words, however long, into monosyllables; and not only cut off the formative terminations, but cropped the first syllable, especially in words beginning with a vowel; and rejected not only vowels in the middle, but likewise consonants of a weaker sound, retaining the strong, which seem the bones of words, or changing them for others of the same organ, in order that the sound might become the softer; but especially transposing their order, that they might the more readily be pronounced without the intermediate vowels. For example, in expendo, spend; exemplum, sample; exipio, scap; extraneus, strange; extractum, stretch'd; exercitio, to ferret; exscorio, to scour; excorio, to scourge; excortico, to scratch; and others beginning with ex: as also, emendo, to mend; episcopus, bishop;

in Danish, Bisp; epistola, epistle; hospitale, spittle; Hispania, Spain; historia, story.

Many of these etymologies are doubtful, and some evidently mistaken.

The following are somewhat harder, Alexander, Sander, Elisabetha, Betty; apis bee; aper bar; p passing into b, as in bishop; and by cutting off a from the beginning, which is restored in the middle: but for the old, bar or bare, we now say boar; as for lang, long; for bain, bane; for flane, stone; aprunna, brown, p being changed into b, and a transposed as in aper, and g changed into w, as in pignus, pawn; lege, law; ἄλσος, fox; cutting off the beginning, and changing p into f, as in pellis, a fell; pullus, a foal; pator, father; pavor, fear; polio, file; pleo, impleo, fill, full; piscis, fish; and transposing o into the middle, which was taken from the beginning; apex, a piece; peak, pike; zophorus, freeze; mustum, flum; defensio, fence; dispensator, spencer; asculot, escouter, Fr. scout; excalpo, scrape; restoring l instead of r, and hence scrap, scrawl, scrawl; exculpo, scoop; exterritus, start; extonitus, attonitus, ston'd; stomachus, masu; offendo, fined; obstipo, stop; audere, dare; cavere, ware; whence, a-ware, be-ware, wary, warn, warning, for the Latın v consonant formerly founded like our w, and the modern found of the v consonant was formerly that of the letter f, that is, the Æolick digamma, which had the found of φ, and the modern found of the letter f was that of the Greek φ or ph; ulcus, ulcer, sore, and hence sorry, sorrow, sorrowful; ingenium, engine, gin; scalenus, leaning, unless you would rather derive it from κλινω, whence inclino; infundibulum, funeral; gegates, jets; projectum, to jett forth, a jetty, cucullus, a cowl.

There are synonyms somewhat harder; from tempore, time; from nominē, name; domina, dame; as the French bonne, femme, nom, from hominē, femina, nomine. Thus pagina, page; uoluptas, pot, uicula, cup; cantharus, can; tentorium, tent; precor, pray; præda, prey; specio, spectulor, spy; plico, ply; implico, imply; replico, reply; complico, comply; fedes, episcopalis, see.

A vowel is also cut off in the middle, that the number of the syllables may be lessened; as, amita, auri; spiritus, spright; debitum, debt; dubito, doubt; comes, comitis, count; clericus, clerk; quietus, quit, quit; acquieto, to acquit; separo, to spare; stabilis, stable; stabulum, stable; pallatium, palace, place; rabula, rail; rawis, rawul, brawl, rabel, brable; questio, quest.

As also a consonant, or at least one of a softer sound, or even a whole syllable; rotundus, round; fragilis, frail; fecurus, far, regula, rule; tegula, tile; subtilis, subtle; nomen, noun; decanus, dean; computo, count; subitaneus, sudden, soon; superare, to soar; periculum, peril; mirabile, marvel; as magnus, main; dignor, deign; tingo, stain; tinctum, taint; pingo, paint; predari, reach.

The contractions may seem harder, where many of them meet, as xpauis; kyrk, church; presbyter, priest; facristanus, sexton; frango, fregi, break, breach; fagus, q̄iya, beech; f changed into b, and g into ch, which are letters near a-kin; frigeo, freeze; frigeo, froge, fē in fr, as above in biſhop, fiſh, so in ſcapa, ſkip, ſkip, and refrigeo, refreſh; but *viſceo, freſh; phlebotomus, ſteam; bovina, beef; vitulina, veal; ſcutifer, ſquire; poenitentia, penance; ſanctuarium, ſanctuary, ſentry; quæſitio, chaſe; perquiſitio, purchaſe; anguilla, eel; inſula, iſle, ile, iſland, inland, inſuleta, iſlet, ileet, cyght, and more contractedly ey, whence Owſway, Ruley, Ely; examinare, to ſcan, namely, by rejecting from the beginning and end e and o, according to the uſual manner, the remainder xamin, which the Saxons, who did not uſe x, write ſamen, or ſamen is contracted into ſcan; as from dominus, don; nomine, noun; aboniuo, ban; and indeed apum examen they turned into ſciane; for which we ſay ſwearme, by inserting r to denote the murmuring; *theſaurus, ſtore; ſedile, ſtool; uerō, uot; ſudo, ſweat; gaudium, gay; jocus, joy; fuccus, juice; catena, chain; caliga, calaga; chauſe, chauſie, Fr. hole; extinguo, ſlanck, ſquench, quench, ſtint; foras, forth; ſpecies, ſpice; recito, read; adiuvo, aid; ævū, ævum, ay, age, ever; floccus, lock; excerpto, ſcrape, ſcrabble, ſcrawl; extravagus, ſtray, ſtraggel; collectum, clot, clatch; colligo, coil; recolligo, recoil; fevero, ſwear; tridulus, ſhrill; procurator, proxy; pulſo, to puſh; calamus, a quill; impetere, to impeach; augeo, auxi, waix; and vaneſco, vanui, waue; ſyllabare, to ſpell; puteus, pit; granum, corn; comprimo, cramp, cramp, crumple, crinkle.

Some may seem harsher, yet may not be rejected, for it at least appears, that some of them are derived from proper names, and there are others whose etymology is acknowledged by every body; as, Alexander, Eliza, Scander, Sander, Sandy, Samy; Elizabetha, Elizabeth, Elizabath, Eliza, Bels; Margareta, Margaret, Marget, Meg, Peg; Maria, Mary, Mal, Pal, Malkin, Marwin, Marckes; Mattheus, Mattha, Matthew; Martha, Matt, Pat; Guilielmus, Wilhelmus, Girolamo, Guillaume, Willtam, Will, Bill, Wilkin, Wicken, Wicki, Weeks.

Thus cariophyllas, flos, gerofilo, Ital. girifée, giöfer, Fr. gillflower, which the vulgar call julyflower, as if derived from the month July; petroelinum, parisly; portulaca, purslain; cydonium, quince; cydoniatum, quiddney; persicum, peach; eruca, eruke; which they corrupt to ear eige, as if it took its name from the ear; annulus gennius, a gimnal or gimbal-ring; and thus the word gimbal and jumbal is transferred to other things.

things thus interwoven; quelques choses, kick/shaws. Since the origin of these, and many others, however forced, is evident, it ought to appear no wonder to any one if the ancients have thus disfigured many; especially as they so much affected monosyllables; and, to make them found the softer, took this liberty of maiming, taking away, changing, transposing, and softening them.

But while we derive these from the Latin, I do not mean to say, that many of them did not immediately come to us from the Saxon, Danish, Dutch, and Teutonic languages, and other dialects, and some taken more lately from the French or Italians, or Spaniards.

The same word, according to its different significations, often has a different origin; as, to bear a burden, from fero; but to bear, whence birth, born, bairn, comes from pario; and a bear, at least if it be of Latin original from fera. Thus perch, a fish, from pereca; but perch, a measure, from peritica, and likewise to perch. To spell is from syllaba; but spell, an enchantment, by which it is believed that the boundaries are so fixed in lands, that none can pass them against the master's will, from expello; and spell, a messenger, from epistola; whence gospel, good-spell, or god spell. Thus freeze, or freeze, from frigeo; but freeze, an architectonic word, from zophorus; but freeze, for clot, from frisa, or perhaps from frigeo, as being more fit than any other for keeping out the cold.

There are many words among us, even monosyllables, compounded of two or more words, at least serving instead of compounds, and comprising the signification of more words than one; as, from scrip and roll, comes scroll; from proud and dance, prance; from sp, of the verb stay, or stand and out, is made stout; from stout and hardy, sturdy; from sp of spit or spew, and out, comes spout; from the same sp, with the termination in, is spin; and adding out, spin out; and from the same sp, with it, is spit, which only differs from spout in that it is smaller, and with less noise and force; but spatter is, because of the obscure u, something between spit and spout; and by reason of adding r, it intimates a frequent iteration and noise, but obscurely confused: whereas spatter, on account of the sharper and clearer vowel a, intimates a more distinct noise, in which it chiefly differs from spatter. From the same sp, and the termination ark comes spark, signifying a single emission of fire with a noise; namely, sp, the emission, or the more acute noise, and k, the mute consonant, intimates its being suddenly terminated; but adding l, is made the frequentative sparkle. The same sp, by adding r, that is spr, implies a more lively impetus of diffusing or expanding itself; to which adding the termination ing, it becomes spring; its vigour spr imports, its sharpness the termination ing, and lastly in acute and tremulous, ends in the mute consonant g, denotes the sudden ending of any motion, that is meant in its primary signification, of a single, not a complicated exhalation. Hence we call spring whatever has an elastic force; as also a fountain of water, and thence the origin of any thing; and to spring, to germinate; and spring, one of the four seasons. From the same spr and out, is formed sprout, and with the termination ig, sprig; of which the following, for the most part, is the difference: sprout, of a grosser sound, imports a fatter or grosser bud; sprig, of a slenderer sound, denotes a smaller shoot. In like manner, from str of the verb strive, and out, comes strout, and strut. From the same str, and the termination uggle, is made struggle; and this gl imports, but without any great noise, by reason of the obscure sound of the vowel u. In like manner, from throw and roll is made trull; and almost in the same sense is trundle, from throw or thrust, and rundle. Thus graff or groug is compounded of grave and rough; and trudge from tread or trot and drudge.

In these observations it is easy to discover great sagacity and great extravagance, an ability to do much defeated by the desire of doing more than enough. It may be remarked,

1. That Wallis's derivations are often so made, that by the same licence any language may be deduced from any other.
2. That he makes no distinction between words immediately derived by us from the Latin, and those which, being copied from other languages, can therefore afford no example of the genius of the English language, or its laws of derivation.
3. That he derives from the Latin, often with great harshness and violence, words apparently Teutonic; and therefore, according to his own declaration, probably older than the tongue to which he refers them.
4. That some of his derivations are apparently erroneous.

SYNTAX.

The established practice of grammarians requires that I should here treat of the Syntax; but our language has so little inflection, or variety of terminations, that its construction neither requires nor admits many rules. Wallis therefore has totally neglected it; and Jonson, whose desire of following the writers upon the learned languages made him think a syntax indispensably necessary, has published such pretty observations as were better omitted.

The verb, as in other languages, agrees with the nominative in number and person; as, Thou sleepest from good; he runs to death.

Our adjectives and pronouns are invariable.

Of two substantives the noun possessive is the genitive; as, His father's glory, The sun's heat.

Verbs transitive require an oblique case; as, He loves me; Thou fear him.

All prepositions require an oblique case: He gave this to me; He took this from me; He says this of me; He came with me.

PROSODY.

It is common for those that deliver the grammar of modern languages, to omit their Prosody. So that of the Italians is neglected by Buomattai; that of the French by Desmarais; and that of the English by Wallis, Cooper, and even by Jonson, though a poet. But as the laws of metre are included in the idea of a grammar, I have thought it proper to insert them.

Prosody comprises orthoepy, or the rules of pronunciation; and orthometry, or the laws of versification.

PRONUNCIATION is just, when every letter has its proper sound, and when every syllable has its proper accent, or which in English versification is the same, its proper quantity.

The sounds of the letters have been already explained; and rules for the accent or quantity are not easily to be given, being subject to innumerable exceptions. Such however as I have read or formed, I shall here propose.

1. Of dissyllables formed by affixing a termination, the former syllable is commonly accented, as childish, kingdom, acted, dissolute, lower, scoffer, fairer, foremost, zealous, filence, godly, meekly, artist.

2. Dissyllables formed by prefixing a syllable to the radical word, have commonly the accent on the latter; as, to begot, to beset, to beset.

3. Of dissyllables, which are at once nouns and verbs, the verb has commonly the accent on the latter, and the noun on the former syllable; as, to descend, a descent; to cement, a cement; to contract, a contract.

This rule has many exceptions. Though verbs seldom have their accent on the former, yet nouns often have it on the latter syllable; as, delight, perfume.

4. All dissyllables ending in y, as cranny; in our, as labour, favour; in ow, as willow, swallow, except allow; in le, as battle, bible; in ish, as banish; in ck, as cambrick, chock; in ter, as butler; in age, as courage; in en, as fifteen; in et, as quiet, accent the former syllable.

5. Dissyllable nouns in er, as canker, butter; have the accent on the former syllable.

6. Dissyllable verbs terminating in a consonant and e final, as comprise, escape, or having a diphthong in the last syllable, as appease, reveal; or ending in two consonants, as attend, have the accent on the latter syllable.

7. Dissyllable nouns having a diphthong in the latter syllable, have commonly their accent on the latter syllable, as applause; except words in ain, certain, mountain.

8. Trissyllables formed by adding a termination, or prefixing a syllable, retain the accent of the radical word, as loveliness, tenderness, contemner, wagoner, physical, bespatter, commenting, commending, assurance.

9. Trissyllables ending in ous, as gracious, arduous; in al, as capital; in ion, as mention, accent the first.

10. Trissyllables ending in ce, ent, and ate, accent the first syllable, as continence, continence, armament, imminent, elegant, propagate, except they be derived from words having the accent on the last, as connivance, acquaintance; or the middle syllable hath a vowel before two consonants, as promulgate.

11. Trissyllables ending in y, as entity, specify, liberty, victory, subsidy, commonly accent the first syllable.

12. Tris-

A GRAMMAR OF THE

12. Trissyllables in re or le accent the first syllable, as légible, théâtre, except disciple, and some words which have a position, as exemple, épître.

13. Trissyllables in ude commonly accent the first syllable, as plénitude.

14. Trissyllables ending in ator or atour, as créateur, or having in the middle syllable a diphthong, as endeavour; or a vowel before two consonants, as domestic, accent the middle syllable.

15. Trissyllables that have their accent on the last syllable are commonly French, as acquiesce, repartée, magazine, or words formed by prefixing one or two syllables to an acute syllable, as immature, overcharge.

16. Polysyllables, or words of more than three syllables, follow the accent of the words from which they are derived, as arrogating, continency, incontinently, commendable, communicableness. We should therefore say disputable, indisputable, rather than disputable, indisputable; and advertisement rather than advertisement.

17. Words in ion have the accent upon the antepenult, as salvation, perturbation, concoction; words in atour or ator on the penult, as dedicator.

18. Words ending in le commonly have the accent on the first syllable, as amicable, unless the second syllable have a vowel before two consonants, as combustible.

19. Words ending in ous have the accent on the antepenult, as uxorious, voluptuous.

20. Words ending in ty have their accent on the antepenult, as puffblowness, activity.

These rules are not advanced as complete or infallible, but proposed as useful. Almost every rule of every language has its exception; and in English, as in other tongues, much must be learned by example and authority. Perhaps more and better rules may be given that have escaped my observation.

VERSIFICATION is the arrangement of a certain number of syllables according to certain laws.

The feet of our verses are either iambick, as alóft, créate; or trochaick, as bóly, lósly.

Our iambick measure comprises verses.

Of four syllables,

Most good, most fair,
Or things as rare,
To call you'st lost;
For all the cost
Words can bestow,
So poorly show
Upon your praise,
That all the ways
Sense hath, come short.
With ravish'd ears
The monarch hears.

Drayton.

Dryden.

Of six,

This while we are abroad,
Shall we not touch our lyre?
Shall we not sing an ode?
Shall that holy fire,
In us that strongly glow'd,
In this cold air expire?

Though in the utmost Peak
A while we do remain,
Amongst the mountains bleak,
Expos'd to fleet and rain,
No sport our hours shall break,
To exercise our vein.

Who though bright Phœbus' beams
Refresh the southern ground,
And though the princely Thames
With beauteous nymphs abound,
And by old Camber's streams
Be many wonders found.

Yet many rivers clear
Here glide in silver swathes,
And what of all most dear,
Buxton's delicious baths,
Strong ale and noble cheer,
To assuage breem winter's scathes,
In places far or near,
Or famous, or obscure,
Where wholsom is the air,
Or where the most impure,
All times, and every where,
The muse is still in ure.

Drayton.

Of eight, which is the usual measure for short poems.

And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown, and mossy cell,
Where I may sit, and nightly spell
Of ev'ry star the sky doth shew,
And ev'ry herb that tips the dew.

Milton.

Of ten, which is the common measure of heroick and tragick poetry.

Full in the midst of this created space,
Betwixt heav'n, earth, and skies there stands a place
Confining on all three; with triple bound;
Whence all things, though remote, are view'd around,
And thither bring their undulating sound.
The palace of loud Fame, her seat of pow'r,
Plac'd on the summit of a lofty tow'r;
A thousand winding entries long and wide
Receive of fresh reports a flowing tide.
A thousand crannies in the walls are made;
Nor gate nor bars exclude the busy trade.
'Tis built of brass, the better to diffuse
The spreading sounds, and multiply the news;
Where echo's in repeated echo's play:
A mart for ever full; and open night and day.
Nor silence is within, nor voice express,
But a deaf noise of sounds that never cease;
Confus'd, and chiding, like the hollow roar
Of tides, receding from th' insulted shore;
Or like the broken thunder, heard from far,
When Jove to distance drives the rolling war.
The courts are filled with a tumultuous din
Of crowds, or issuing forth, or entering in:
A thorough-fare of news; where some devise
Things never heard, some mingle truth with lies:
The troubled air with empty sounds they beat,
Intent to hear, and eager to repeat.

Dryden.

In all these measures the accents are to be placed on even syllables; and every line considered by itself is more harmonious, as this rule is more strictly observed. The variations necessary to pleasure belong to the art of poetry, not the rules of grammar.

Our trochaick measures are

Of three syllables,

Here we may Think and pray,
Before death
Stop our breath:
Other joys
Are but toys.

Walton's Angler.

Of five,

In the days of old,
Stories plainly told,
Lovers felt annoy.

Old Ballad.

Of seven,

Fairest piece of welform'd earth,
Urge not thus your haughty birth.

Waller.

In these measures the accent is to be placed on the odd syllables.

These are the measures which are now in use, and above the rest those of seven, eight, and ten syllables. Our ancient poets wrote verses sometimes of twelve syllables, as Drayton's Polyolbion.

Of

ENGLISH TONGUE.

Of all the Cambrian shires their heads that bare so high,
And farth't survey their foils with an ambitious eye,
Mervinia for her hills, as for their matchless crowds,
The nearest that are said to kiss the wand'ring clouds,
Especial audience craves, offended with the throng,
That she of all the rest neglected was so long;
Alledging for herself, when through the Saxon's pride,
The god-like race of Brute to Severn's setting tide
Were cruelly inforc'd, her mountains did relieve
Those whom devouring war else every where did grieve;
And when all Wales beside (by fortune or by might)
Unto her ancient foe resigned her ancient right,
A constant maiden still she only did remain,
The last her genuine laws which stoutly did retain,
And as each one is prais'd for her peculiar things;
So only she is rich, in mountains, meres, and springs,
And holds herself as great in her superfluous waite,
As others by their towns, and fruitful tillage grac'd.

And of fourteen, as Chapman's Homer.

And as the mind of such a man, that hath a long way gone,
And either knoweth not his way, or else would let alone
His purpos'd journey is distract.

The measures of twelve and fourteen syllables, were often mingled by our old poets, sometimes in alternate lines, and sometimes in alternate couplets.

The verse of twelve lines, called an Alexandrian, is now only used to diversify heroick lines.

Waller was smooth, but Dryden taught to join,
The varying verse, the full resounding line,
The long majestic march, and energy divine.

} Pope.

The pause in the Alexandrine must be at the sixth syllable.

The verse of fourteen syllables is now broken into a soft lyric measure of verses, consisting alternately of eight syllables and six.

She to receive thy radiant name,
Selects a whiter space.

Fenton,

When all shall praise, and ev'ry lay
Devote a wreath to thee,
That day, for come it will, that day,
Shall I lament to see.

Lewis to Pope.

Beneath this tomb an infant lies
To earth whose body lent,
Hereafter shall more glorious rise,
But not more innocent.

When the Archangel's trump shall blow,
And souls to bodies join,

What crowds shall wish their lives below
Had been as short as thine.

Wesley.

We have another measure very quick and lively, and therefore much used in songs, which may be called the anapestick, in which the accent rests upon every third syllable.

May I govern my passions with absolute sway,
And grow wiser and better as life wears away.

Dr. Pope.

In this measure a syllable is often retrenched from the first foot, as Diogenes furly and proud.

Dr. Pope.

When present we love, and when absent agréé,
I think not of Iris, nor Iris of me.

Dryden.

These measures are varied by many combinations, and sometimes by double endings, either with or without rhyme, as in the heroick measure.

'Tis the Divinity that stirs within us,
'Tis Heav'n itself that points out an hereafter,
And intimates eternity to man.

Addison.

So in that of eight syllables.

They neither added nor confounded,
They neither wanted nor abounded.

Prior.

In that of seven.

For resistance I could fear none,
But with twenty ships had done.
What thou, brave and happy Vernon,
Hast achiev'd with six alone.

Glover.

In that of six.

'Twas when the seas were roaring,
With hollow blasts of wind,
A damsel lay deploring,
All on a rock reclin'd.

Gay.

In the anapestick,

When terrible tempests assail us,
And mountainous billows affright,
Nor power nor wealth can avail us,
But skilful industry steers right.

Ballad.

To these measures, and their laws, may be reduced every species of English verse.

Our versification admits of few licences, except a synalæpha, or elision of e in the before a vowel, as th' eternal; and more rarely of o in to, as t' accept; and a synæresis, by which two short vowels coalesce into one syllable, as question, special; or a word is contracted by the expulsion of a short vowel before a liquid, as av'rice, temp'rance.

Thus have I collected rules and examples, by which the English language may be learned, if the reader be already acquainted with grammatical terms, or taught by a master to those that are more ignorant. To have written a grammar for such as are not yet initiated in the schools, would have been tedious, and perhaps at last ineffectual.

THERE is, perhaps, no instance of an individual that has sustained so much injury to his posthumous reputation from the ill-directed zeal of injudicious friendship, as Doctor SAMUEL JOHNSON. A life marked only by the common sterility of inactive literature, has been expanded into a source of voluminous anecdote—been tortured into becoming the vehicle of almost general history—and what is still worse, of no small portion of individual calumny. Under the Presentation of his Biography, the weak have shot their bolts of folly, and the malicious exhausted their resources of insidious traduction: Circumstances have been related which could not do him honour, and have given others pain. With a new and base species of intellectual anatomy, they have laid open his heart after his death, and have produced to the observation of mankind parts of its constituent materials not always creditable to the dead, but what is perhaps of still more consequence, in the highest degree, afflicting to the living. There are men, and those of the highest distinction and most approved ability, who have, doubtless, reposed often on the memory of past connection with Doctor JOHNSON—who have solaced present vexation with such a remembrance—who have cheered the hour of care and depression with the recollection of an intimacy of which they knew the value and never doubted the sincerity—of which they felt the loss but experienced also that gratification which resulted from the conviction that the affection, was once equal, and the esteem, reciprocal. These new historians, however, are too severely moral to permit men to derive their felicity from visionary sources—they have put a very abrupt period to several of these endearing illusions—they make Doctor JOHNSON speak from the grave to disavow esteems, which were once thought rooted, and by consequence to disclaim attachments that were once fondly believed to be immutable. —The writer of these few pages declines to comment upon such proceedings with the dilated vehemence which the subject would so well sustain; he depends upon honest sympathy, to which he trusts with so implicit a confidence, that he will not believe there can exist a cultivated mind that does not feel a ready and animated abhorrence of a conduct that tends at once to give instability, to every humane opinion, and to diffuse uncertainty and suspicion through every human attachment.

The authors of this recent invention of biography do not at all appear to have considered that if the style of criticism which they have adopted in the instance of Doctor JOHNSON were to prevail to any great degree, it would operate to the exclusion of men eminent for talents or literature from all the enjoyments of society. Labour demands relaxation, and genius pants for its native luxury in the embrace of indolence: but for these gratifications they must look in vain, when it is known that from the moment they have given any indication of intellectual superiority, they cease to have the capacity of friendship about them; and that instead of the companions of careless privacy, or the participators of thoughtless merriment, they must expect to be surrounded only by a set of people who are the spies upon their minutest actions, and the historians of their most indigested opinions. Under such circumstances a man's very virtues are at war with him, and turn traitors to his repose; his penates are no household gods to him, since they try in vain to obtain him a security from inauspicious intrusion, or to afford him any protection against the enmity of injudicious friendship. A person will stand for ever on tip-toe, and of course be for ever uneasy, who knows that wherever he is placed, whether on high change, or with his back to his own fire-side, he is equally under the eye of scrutiny, and exposed to the operation of a critical measurement.

This practice, however, is not less injurious to the moral and literary character of an author, than it is destructive of his comfort. The hastiness of occasional impatience,—the effusions of constitutional irritability,—the suggestions of temporary suspicion as to the motives or intentions of those with whom a person lives which fly before the least discussion or consideration, and which he blames himself for having given birth to,—the paradoxes of mere colloquial display—the whims of indulged speculation, and all the other almost involuntary periphrases of the mind which escape from it in the gentle exercises of relaxation, and which, like the similar effect of corporeal motion, a man wishes to wipe away almost the moment it appears, are to be fixed and localized by the operation of this modern invention, are to be incorporated into his system, and made a part of himself, with this additional disadvantage to him, that in the proportion as this new accession to his frame is less perfect, it is more vulnerable, and as it is more exposed it is equally fatal.

The above are the reasons co-operating indeed with the almost indispensable necessity for circumscription in a plan like this, that have added at least an objection of principle to the obligation resulting from the locality of this life, to induce me to reject the detail of little petty anecdote that characterize the histories alluded to. There is a degree of information as to a man's more latent habits, the turn and tenor of his feelings and sentiments in situations of secession from observation, that is not only entirely as interesting as any other possible part of his description, but essentially and perhaps above every other circumstance necessary to the comprehensive and philosophical understanding of his character. It is an act, however, of somewhat superfluous benevolence, because much is wanted therefore to give all, and to distress by unwholesome repletion merely because the pain of inanition requires to be removed. It is with the view of the human character as with all other prospects, too many circumstances confound; they destroy what critics call integrity or wholeness; they make particular features too large to admit the collective countenance into the eye at once.—A man's power of witticism is as well demonstrated by ten specimens as by a hundred; his pregnancy or facility in making them will be as satisfactorily received on the credit of a general assertion, as by any accumulation of sayings that friendship can retain. No man can have pretensions to the distinction of a colloquial wit without saying many things that are either huddled into premature oblivion by the illiberal suppression of envy, or lost to society by the fallibility of friendly recollection. At last, therefore, it will probably happen, that general assertion is the ground we must resort to in a great measure, as the basis of our opinion. It is enough to have instances sufficient to demonstrate the existence of the quality; and whether it is in wit, benevolence, power of combination, or any other operation of the mind or intellect, multiplied examples must after this point be unnecessary if not useless; and as they cannot increase the conviction may perhaps only terminate at last, in confounding the recollection.

As the transcription of an author's works, therefore, does not make a necessary part of his personal history, it may perhaps be practicable to convey a correct idea of Doctor Johnson's general character, without pursuing him through the uniform tract of his daily occurrences, without following him through a tedious relation of domestic incidents of little variety and less importance, and above all, without making him guilty of the posthumous treachery, of violating established friendships, and spreading wanton injuries among the illustrious individuals, from whose confidence and familiarity he once appeared to derive pride and happiness. The avoidance of such a practice is a species of negative merit I make a bold claim to, but is, perhaps, the only pretension to biographical ability that I could urge with any propriety, or maintain with any proof.

It will surprize some of our readers, but is nevertheless a fact which a very few months will incontestibly establish, that the still, quiet, eventless life of Dr. Johnson will have given rise to a larger number of volumes in size, as well as in quantity, than was found sufficient by a most correct, acute, and elegant writer* to embrace the whole history of the British people, with the philosophical developement of the causes of their progress, in manners, laws, commerce, literature, and politics, from the period of Julius Cæsar's landing on the Island to the æra of the Revolution in 1688.—Either the minuteness of communication in the one case must be extended to a length of superfluous and almost ridiculous expansion, or else our knowledge of our own history must be dark and imperfect to a degree of unpardonable contraction.—The reader will decide to which quarter he feels a stronger bias, in the application of the more unfavourable alternative.

SAMUEL JOHNSON was born in Sept. 1709, in the parish of St. Mary, Litchfield, Staffordshire, and christened on the 7th of the said month. His father's name was Michael, and by the register of his son's birth is styled Gentleman. With that noble contempt, however, of distinction, merely collateral and accidental, which is so apt to adhere about minds that feel any foundation for a just confidence in themselves, Doctor Johnson declines availing himself of the gentility of his father, and describes him in a passage in the lives of the poets, under the denomination that is now well known to be his real designation, “as an old bookseller.”

The following account of some of the earlier circumstances in the life of Mr. Johnson, are related by a writer as easy and elegant in the style of her communications, as injudicious in the principle of them, who possesses a sufficient portion of female virtue to entitle her to a lenient consideration of a few female frailties, and who is so singularly paradoxical in the frame and constitution of her mind, that her veracity may be implicitly trusted to for facts, when it is by no means certain that her ardent and high-flown professions of friendship can be always confided in for sincerity.

“SAMUEL JOHNSON was the son of Michael Johnson, a bookseller at Litchfield, in Staffordshire; a very pious and worthy man, but wrong-headed, positive, and afflicted with melancholy, as his son, from whom alone I had the information, once told me: his business, however, leading him to be much on horseback, contributed to the preservation of his bodily health, and mental sanity; which, when he staid long at home, would sometimes be about to give way; and Mr. Johnson said, that when his work-shop, a detached building, had fallen half down for want of money to repair it, his father was not less diligent to lock the door every night, though he saw that any body might walk in at the back part, and knew that there was no security obtained by barring the front door. “This [says his son] was madness, you may see, and would have been discoverable in other instances of the prevalence of imagination, but that poverty prevented it from playing such tricks as riches and leisure encourage.” Michael was a man of still larger size and greater strength than his son, who was reckoned very like him, but did not delight in talking much of his family—“one has

(says he) so little pleasure in reciting the anecdotes of beggary." One day, however, hearing me praise a favourite friend with partial tenderness as well as true esteem; "Why do you like that man's acquaintance so?" said he: "Because, replied I, he is open and confiding, and tells me stories of his uncles and cousins; I love the light parts of a solid character. "Nay, if you are for a family history says Mr. Johnson good-humouredly), I can fit you: I had an uncle, Cornelius Ford, who, upon a journey, stopped and read an inscription written on a stone he saw standing by the way-side, set up, as it proved, in honour of a man who had leaped a certain leap thereabouts, the extent of which was specified upon the stone: Why now, says my uncle, I could leap it in my boots; and he did leap it in his boots. I had likewise another uncle, Andrew, continued he, my father's brother, who kept the ring in Smithfield (where they wrestled and boxed) for a whole year, and never was thrown or conquered. Here now are uncles for you, Mistress, if that's the way to your heart." Mr. Johnson was very conversant in the art of attack and defence by boxing, which science he had learned from this uncle Andrew, I believe; and I have heard him descant upon the age when people were received, and when rejected, in the schools once held for that brutal amusement, much to the admiration of those who had no expectation of his skill in such matters, from the sight of a figure which precluded all possibility of personal prowess; though, because he saw Mr. Thrale one day leap over a cabriolet stool, to shew that he was not tired after a chace of fifty miles or more, he suddenly jumped over it too; but in a way so strange and so unweildy, that our terror lest he should break his bones, took from us the power of laughing.

"Michael Johnson was past fifty years old when he married his wife, who was upwards of forty; yet I think her son told me she remained three years childless before he was born into the world, who so greatly contributed to improve it. In three years more she brought another son, Nathaniel, who lived to be twenty-seven or twenty-eight years old, and of whose manly spirit I have heard his brother speak with pride and pleasure, mentioning one circumstance, particular enough, that when the company were one day lamenting the badness of the roads, he enquired where they could be, as he travelled the country more than most people, and had never seen a bad road in his life. The two brothers did not, however, much delight in each other's company, being always rivals for the mother's fondness; and many of the severe reflections on domestic life in Rasselas, took their source from its author's keen recollections of the time passed in his early years. Their father Michael died of an inflammatory fever, at the age of seventy-six, as Mr. Johnson told me: their mother at eighty-nine, of a gradual decay. She was slight in her person, he said, and rather below than above the common size. So excellent was her character, and so blameless her life, that when an oppressive neighbour once endeavoured to take from her a little field she possessed, he could persuade no attorney to undertake the cause against a woman so beloved in her narrow circle: and it is this incident he alludes to in the line of his Vanity of Human Wishes, calling her

The general favourite as the general friend.

Nor could any one pay more willing homage to such a character, though she had not been related to him, than did Dr. Johnson on every occasion that offered: his disquisition on Pope's epitaph placed over Mrs. Corbet, is a proof of that preference always given by him to a noiseless life over a bustling one; for however taste begins, we almost always see that it ends in simplicity; the glutton finishes by losing his relish for any thing highly sauced, and calls for his boiled chicken at the close of many years spent in the search of dainties; the connoisseurs are soon weary of Rubens, and the critics of Lucan; and the refinements of every kind heaped upon civil life, always sicken their possessors before the close of it.

"At the age of two years Mr. Johnson was brought up to London by his mother, to be touched by Queen Anne for the scrophulous evil, which terribly afflicted his childhood, and left such marks as greatly disfigured a countenance naturally harsh and rugged, beside doing irreparable damage to the auricular organs, which never could perform their functions since I knew him; and it was owing to that horrible disorder, too, that one eye was perfectly useless to him; that defect, however, was not observable, the eyes looked both alike. As Mr. Johnson had an astonishing memory, I asked him, if he could remember Queen Anne at all? "He had (he said) a confused, but somehow a sort of solemn recollection of a lady in diamonds, and a long black hood."

"The christening of his brother he remembered with all its circumstances, and said, his mother taught him to spell and pronounce the words little Natty, syllable by syllable, making him say it over in the evening to her husband and his guests. The trick which most parents play with their children, of shewing off their newly-acquired accomplishments, disgusted Mr. Johnson beyond expression; he had been treated so himself, he said, till he absolutely loathed his father's caresses, because he knew they were sure to precede some unpleasing display of his early abilities; and he used, when neighbours came o'visiting, to run up a tree that he might not be found and exhibited, such, as no doubt he was, a prodigy of early understanding. His epitaph upon the duck he killed by treading on it at five years old,

Here lies poor duck
That Samuel Johnson trod on;
If it had liv'd it had been good luck,
For it would have been an odd one;

is a striking example of early expansion of mind, and knowledge of language; yet he always seemed more mortified at the recollection of the bustle his parents made with his wit, than pleased with the thoughts of possessing it. "That (said he to me one day) is the great misery of late marriages; the unhappy produce of them becomes the plaything of dotage; an old man's child (continued he) leads much such a life, I think, as a little boy's dog, teized with aukward fondness, and forced, perhaps, to sit up and beg, as we call it, to divert a company, who at last go away complaining of their disagreeable entertainment." In consequence of these maxims, and full of indignation against such parents as delight to produce their young ones early into the talking world, I have known Mr. Johnson give a good deal of pain, by refusing to hear the verses the children could recite, or the songs they could sing; particularly one friend who told him that his two sons should repeat Gray's Elegy to him alternately, that he might judge who had the happiest cadence. "No, pray Sir (said he), let the dears both speak it at once; more noise will by that means be made, and the noise will be sooner over." He told me the story himself, but I have forgot who the father was.

"Mr. JOHNSON's mother was daughter to a gentleman in the country, such as there were many of in those days, who possessing, perhaps, one or two hundred pounds a year in land, lived on the profits, and fought not to increase their income: she was therefore inclined to think higher of herself than of her husband, whose conduct in money matters being but indifferent, she had a trick of teasing him about it, and was, by her son's account, very importunate with regard to her fears of spending more than they could afford, though she never arrived at knowing how much that was; a fault common, as he said, to most women who pride themselves on their economy. They did not however, as I could understand, live ill together on the whole: "my father (says he) could always take his horse and ride away for orders when things went badly." The lady's maiden name was Ford; and the parson who sits next to the punch-bowl in Hogarth's Modern Midnight Conversation was her brother's son. This Ford was a man who chose to be eminent only for vice, with talents that might have made him conspicuous in literature, and respectable in any profession he could have chosen: his cousin has mentioned him in the lives of Fenton and of Broome; and when he spoke of him to me, it was always with tenderness, praising his acquaintance with life and manners, and recollecting one piece of advice that no man surely ever followed more exactly: "Obtain (says Ford) some general principles of every science; he who can talk only on one subject, or act only in one department, is seldom wanted, and perhaps never wished for; while the man of general knowledge can often benefit, and always please." He used to relate, however, another story less to the credit of his cousin's penetration, how Ford on some occasion said to him, "You will make your way the more easily in the world, I see, as you are contented to dispute no man's claim to conversation excellence, they will, therefore, more willingly allow your pretensions as a writer." Can one, on such an occasion, forbear recollecting the predictions of Voltaire's father, when stroking the head of the young satirist, Ce petit bon homme (says he) n'a point trop d'esprit, mais il ne dira jamais mal de personne. Such are the prognostics formed by men of wit and sense, as these two certainly were, concerning the future character and conduct of those for whose welfare they were honestly and deeply concerned; and so late do those features of peculiarity come to their growth, which mark a character to all succeeding generations.

"Dr. JOHNSON first learned to read of his mother and her old maid Catharine, in whose lap he well remembered sitting, while she explained to him the story of St. George and the Dragon. I know not whether this is the proper place to add, that such was his tenderness, and such his gratitude, that he took a journey to Litchfield fifty-seven years afterwards to support and comfort her in her last illness; he had enquired for his nurse, and she was dead. The recollection of such reading as had delighted him in his infancy, made him always persist in fancying that it was the only reading which could please an infant; and he used to condemn me for putting Newbery's books into their hands as too trifling to engage their attention. "babies do not want (said he) to hear about babies; they like to be told of giants and castles, and of somewhat which can stretch and stimulate their minds." When in answer I would urge the numerous editions and quick sale of Tommy Prudent or Goody Two Shoes: "Remember always (said he) that the parents buy the books, and that the children never read them." Mrs. Barbauld however had his best praise, and deserved it; no man was more struck than Mr. Johnson with voluntary descent from possible splendour to painful duty.

"At eight years old he went to school, for his health would not permit him to be sent sooner; and at the age of ten years his mind was disturbed by scruples of infidelity, which preyed upon his spirits, and made him very uneasy; the more so, as he revealed his uneasiness to no one, being naturally (as he said) "of a fullen temper and reserved disposition." He searched, however, diligently but fruitlessly, for evidences of the truth of revelation; and at length recollecting a book he had once seen in his father's shop, intitled, De Veritate Religionis, &c. he began to think himself highly culpable for neglecting such a means of information, and took himself severely to task for this sin, adding many acts of voluntary, and to others unknown penance. The first opportunity which offered (of course) he seized the book with avidity; but on examination, not finding himself scholar enough to peruse its contents, set his heart at rest; and, not thinking to enquire whether there were any English books written on the subject, followed his usual amusements, and considered his conscience as lightened of a crime. He redoubled his diligence to learn the language that contained the information he most wished for; but from the pain which guilt had given him, he now began to deduce the soul's immortality, which was the point that belief first stopped at; and from that moment resolving to be a Christian, became one of the most zealous and pious ones our nation ever produced. When he had told me this odd anecdote of his childhood; "I cannot imagine (said he) what makes me talk of myself to you so, for I really never mentioned this foolish story to any body except Dr. Taylor, not even to my dear, dear Bathurst, whom I loved better than ever I loved any human creature; but poor Bathurst is dead!!!"

Mr. JOHNSON received the first rudiments of regular school education from a Mr. Hunter, at that time a popular teacher of Litchfield, and a man not without talents, so far at least as classical attainments extended, abundantly adequate to his situation. But he was in other respects a man so unconciliating and overbearing, that the esteem for his erudition was lost in the abhorrence of his inurbanity; and as Johnson used very emphatically to describe the durable impressions of his tyranny, "No man that had ever been educated at that school was known to tend his son there." There was a success about his instruction, however, sufficiently rare in the history of a country pedagogue, as he had the good fortune to prepare for their public figure in life, men the most eminent in the times they lived in: namely, Bishop Smalridge; the acute and able metaphysician, Mr. Woolaston; the learned and pious Bishop of Bristol, Dr. Newton; that able lawyer, Lord Chief Justice Willes; and the last great ornament of his learned labours, our Author himself.

At the age of eighteen Mr. Johnson quitted school, and was admitted on the 8th of October 1728, of Pembroke College, Oxford, under the tuition of Mr. Jordan, a man more distinguished, as Johnson constantly described him, for the parental zeal and the unaffected good nature shewn in the exercise of his office, than for any transcendancy of natural endowment, or proficiency in literature. Doctor Adams and Doctor Taylor were his cotemporaries and associates, and are now living to lament the loss of so early and valuable a friend.

Doctor JOHNSON did not stay to take a degree at the University, but left it after a residence of two years. There are no well attested instances of any extraordinary indication of his uncommon talents during this period, although he always remembered his alma mater with a fervour of attachment not likely in a proud mind to generate in indifference, or to remain during a life of difficulties, but under the warmest impressions of gratitude. He indeed was himself fond of relating a circumstance of a half-remembered declamation which he pronounced while a student of Pembroke, and which in consequence of imperfect recollection, being obliged to eke out with mere improvisation, he succeeded so well in as to excite the admiration of the whole society.

It would not be fair, however, to omit the mention of one testimony of early poetical genius, begun two years before he went to College, but not finished till many years after the usual period of academical education, not till he was sixty-eight. It is a translation of ANACREON'S DOVE.---If we contemplate this little effusion as an effort of juvenile talents, it is a promise of early excellence in poetry, certainly not surpassed in the real essentials of the art by his subsequent advances in it. If, as the tardier produce of his climacteric, it is a proof, amongst many others, that the opinion which prevails, that the poetic spirit sympathises with the corporeal decay, and declines into the vale of impotence in amicable association with the body, is a notion better calculated to encourage an indolent resignation of the intellectual powers, than firmly attested by fact, and more a calumny of speculation, than an approved decision of experience.

The following is a copy of it, and I have no hesitation in declaring, for so my judgment, such as it is, gives me an irresistible bias to pronounce, there is a certain unembarrassed freedom of poetical movement, a gaiety, a vividness, and an ease, that whatever may be the other excellencies of his more important and later offerings to the Muse, I have in vain endeavoured to see equalled.

LOVELY courier of the sky,
Whence and whither dost thou fly?
Scatt'ring, as thy pinions play,
Liquid fragrance all the way:
Is it business? is it love?
Tell me, tell me, gentle Dove.
"Soft Anacreon's vows I bear,
"Vows to Myrtle the fair;
"Grac'd with all that charms the heart,
"Blushing nature, smiling art.
"Venus courted by an ode,
"On the bard her Dove bestow'd.
"Vest'd with a master's right
"Now Anacreon rules my flight:
"His the letters that you see,
"Weighty charge consign'd to me:
"Think not yet my service hard,
"Joyless task without reward;
"Smiling at my master's gates,
"Freedom my return awaits;

"But the liberal grant in vain
"Tempts me to be wild again:
"Can a prudent Dove decline
"Blissful bondage such as mine?
"Over hills and fields to roam,
"Fortune's guest without a home;
"Under leaves to hide one's head,
"Slightly shelter'd, coarsely fed;
"Now my better lot bestows
"Sweet repast, and soft repose;
"Now the generous bowl I sip
"As it leaves Anacreon's lip;
"Void of care, and free from dread,
"From his fingers snatch his bread,
"Then with luscious plenty gay,
"Round his chamber dance and play;
"Or from wine as courage springs,
"O'er his face extend my wings;
"And when feast and frolic tire,
"Drop asleep upon his lyre.
"This is all, be quick and go,
"More than all thou canst not know;
"Let me now my pinions ply,
"I have chatter'd like a pye."

There is reason to believe Doctor Johnson left the University entirely from his incapacity to support the expence of it. That his finances were inconsiderable at this time is further evident, as his first employment after leaving the University, was that of an usher to the free school at Market Bosworth in Leicestershire, under the direction of Mr. Anthony Blackwall; probably at a yearly stipend of not more than from twenty to thirty pounds.

On the death of his principal, Mr. Johnson went to Birmingham, and resided in the house of one Warren, where he wrote essays in a newspaper, printed by his landlord; all of which are now lost. It was here also he translated "A Voyage to Abyssinia, by Father Jerome Lobo," and wrote those elegant lines, "On a Lady's presenting a Sprig of Myrtle to a Gentleman." He relates the circumstance that attended the formation of this little elegant poetic prîxoux as follows:—A young fellow had a sprig of myrtle given him by a girl he courted, and asked Mr. Johnson to write some verses, that he might present her in return. He promised, but forgot, and when he called for his lines at the time appointed, sit still a moment, said the Doctor, dear Mun, and I'll fetch them thee, so slipped aside for five minutes, and wrote the following extempore:

WHAT hopes, what terrors, does thy gift create,
Ambiguous emblem of uncertain fate:
The Myrtle, ensign of supreme command,
Consign'd by Venus to Melissa's hand;
Not less capricious than a reigning fair,
Now grants, and now rejects a lover's prayer.
In myrtle shades oft sings the happy swain,
In myrtle shades despairing ghosts complain:
The myrtle crowns the happy lovers' heads,
Th' unhappy lover's grave the myrtle spreads:
O then the meaning of thy gift impart,
And ease the throbbings of an anxious heart!
Soon must this bough, as you shall fix his doom,
Adorn Philander's head, or grace his tomb.

About the beginning of the year 1735, Mr. Johnson returned to his native town of Litchfield, and undertook the education of some young gentlemen there in the Belles Lettres,

T H E L I F E O F

Lettres, amongst whom was the late celebrated David Garrick, then about the age of eighteen. This employment, however, could not have lasted long, for in the year 1736, we find the following advertisement in the Gentleman's Magazine:—"At Edial, near Litchfield, in Staffordshire, young gentlemen are boarded and taught the Latin and Greek Languages, by SAMUEL JOHNSON."

Who would not regret the humiliation of genius, and mourn over the miserable expedients thrust upon its adoption by the hand of poverty, were it not for the recollection that it requires an influence strong and potent as its own inaction to rouse it into exertion, and that was it not for the pinch of some severe and biting calamity, the ill demon of indolence, which nature sends into the world, as the almost inseparable associate of a gifted intellect, would still oftener than it does, prevail over its powers, and triumph in its resignation to oblivion. No man had less of constitutional tendency to industry than Johnson, and with all his powers, had he been placed in circumstances of original affluence, that man would have been now included in the number of the unhonoured dead, who occupies the very first place in the literary ranks of Europe, and who, in the energetic eulogy of a panegyrist,* at least his own equal in genius, "has made our language live."

He did not remain long in the situation of school-master, probably because he did not meet with much success in it, for the year following we find him determined to bring his talents to a scene more propitious to the display of genius, and more pregnant with expedients for livelihood. He determined to visit the metropolis. He was accompanied in his journey by his pupil, now become his friend, David Garrick, and under the guidance of the same auspices, and stimulated by the same motives, these two distinguished individuals entered London together. The following letter from Gilbert Walmesley appears to have been the principal dependence of Mr. Johnson for his introduction into his new scene of life:

To the Reverend Mr. COLSON.

Litchfield, March 2, 1737.

"DEAR SIR,

"I had the favour of yours, and am extremely obliged to you; but I cannot say I had a greater affection for you upon it than I had before, being long since so much endeared to you, as well by an early friendship, as by your many excellent and valuable qualifications; and, had I a son of my own, it would be my ambition, instead of sending him to the University, to dispose of him as this young gentleman (meaning Garrick) is.

"He, and another neighbour of mine, one Mr. Samuel Johnson, set out this morning for London together. David Garrick is to be with you early the next week, and Mr. Johnson to try his fate with a tragedy, and to see to get himself employed in some translation, either from the Latin or the French. Johnson is a very good scholar and poet, and I have great hopes will turn out a fine tragedy writer. If it should any way lie in your way, doubt not but you would be ready to recommend and assist your countrymen.

"G. WALMSLEY."

It would be injustice to the memory of this friend of Mr. Johnson's early youth, to withhold a subsequent tribute of gratitude, addressed to him in the course of the Lives of the Poets. It would be injustice also to Mr. Johnson, as it demonstrates the warmth and duration of his attachments, and proves that there was a talent for a sort of magnificent pathos about him, that if oftener exercised, might have turned out equally honourable to himself and advantageous to the drama.

Speaking of his being indebted for some anecdotes of Smith's life to Mr. Walmesley, he adds,

"Of Gilbert Walmesley, thus presented to my mind, let me indulge myself in the remembrance. I knew him very early; he was one of the first friends that literature procured me, and I hope that, at least, my gratitude made me worthy of his notice.

"He was of an advanced age, and I was only not a boy; yet he never received my notions with contempt. He was a whig, with all the virulence and malevolence of his party; yet difference of opinion did not keep us apart. I honoured him, and he endured me.

"He had mingled with the gay world without exemption from its vices or its follies; but had never neglected the cultivation of his mind. His belief of revelation was unshaken; his learning preserved his principles; he grew first regular, and then pious.

"His studies had been so various, that I am not able to name a man of equal knowledge. His acquaintance with books was great, and what he did not immediately know, he could at least tell where to find. Such was his amplitude of learning, and such his copiousness of communication, that it may be doubted whether a day now passes, in which I have not some advantage from his friendship.

"At this man's table I enjoyed many cheerful and instructive hours, with companions, such as are not often found—with one who has lengthened, and one who has gladdened life; with Dr. James, whose skill in physic will be long remembered; and with David Garrick, whom I hoped to have gratified with this character of our common friend. But what are the hopes of man! I am disappointed by that stroke of death, which has eclipsed the gaiety of nations, and impoverished the publick stock of harmless pleasure."

When Mr. JOHNSON arrived in town, he took lodgings in a miserable street behind Exeter-change, up two pair of stairs, where he met in full sympathy of talents, pride, and poverty, that mixed, excentric and unfortunate character, Mr. Richard Savage. It will readily be believed, that the peculiarity of their mutual fortune could not but produce a very early and ardent friendship. Such a meeting indeed must have operated as a most powerful mitigation of the severities of the other parts of their fate. A man is gratified to perceive he is not the exclusive butt of fortune, and the opportunity given for the reciprocal display of talent before a companion able to comprehend its extent, and from sympathy ready to admit its value, must perhaps be of all other consolations to misery, the most efficacious and heart-felt. It brings vanity into the field to contend against the bitterness of disappointment, and the flattery of an admired friend, to oppose to the neglect of a despised world. They have been frequently known to walk in the squares of London till five o'clock in the morning, for want of money to carry them to a coffee-house. They had the good fortune also to agree in politics, so that when the circumstances of their own individual misfortunes failed to supply them with conversation, they conspired to lament the disasters of their country, and to execrate the blunders of the then administration, for Johnson had not then commenced his reverence for courts, nor had conceived his opinion, that infallibility was attached even to the representatives or instruments of royalty.

He appears to have regarded Savage with more than common affection. He accompanied him to Greenwich, to attend his departure to his place of retirement in Wales, and wept violently at taking leave. He afterwards distinguished him, and alluded to this circumstance in his poem of London, where, under the appellation of Thales, he speaks thus of Savage.

Though grief and fondness in my breast rebel,
When injur'd Thales bids the town farewell;
Yet still my calmer thoughts his choice commend,
I praise the hermit, but regret the friend;
Who now resolves, from Vice and London far,
To breathe in distant fields a purer air,
And fix'd on Cambria's solitary shore,
Give to St. David one true Briton more.

He was introduced by Savage to Mr. Cave, the proprietor of the Gentleman's Magazine; and Mr. Johnson has been heard to say, that the first performance that gained him any notice, was the following little poem, published in that miscellany, in the beginning of the year 1738:

Ad URBANUM.

S. J.

In May, the same year, he finished his poem of "London," imitated from the third satire of Juvenal. He offered this poem to most of the booksellers in London, for almost any thing they would give? At last, the course of application brought him to the shop of Mr. Robert Dodsley, brother of the present Mr. James Dodsley, in Pall-Mall. He gave him ten guineas for the copy: a circumstance which Mr. Johnson used often to speak of amongst his friends; adding jocularly, "Dodsley was the only bookseller in London that found out I had any genius."

The publication of this poem was a source of much accession of character to him, and amidst the general observation which it excited, had the good fortune to raise the curiosity of Mr. Pope, who having for some days in vain endeavoured to discover the author, relinquished his pursuit at last, with these words: "It cannot be long before my curiosity will be gratified—the writer of this poem will soon be deterred."

For the present, however, the poem of "London" operated much more to the gratification of Mr. Johnson's vanity, than to the satisfaction of any of his other appetites; and conspired, perhaps, with other more powerful causes, to induce him to wish for a more substantial and advantageous connection than a mere union with the Muse. About this time he married Mrs. Potter, of Manchester, a widow lady, and twenty years older than himself. She brought him, however, a portion of eight hundred pounds, with which sum, united to the mastership of a charity-school in Shropshire, worth about sixty pounds a year, which was then vacant, and the appointment to the succession of which, Johnson thought he had interest enough to obtain, he had speculated to sit down in quiet and retirement. This was an illusion, however, not fated to be realized, and which the experience of a few subsequent weeks totally dissipated. His father, much about this time failed in business, and Johnson, with that enthusiasm of filial piety which always distinguished him, readily parted with the greatest part of his new wealth, to relieve the exigencies of an aged parent, and to put his affairs into some situation of tolerable ease again.

In his other scheme respecting the school he was not more fortunate. The statutes of the school required the person who should be elected to the vacant mastership, to be Master of Arts, which Mr. Johnson was not. He had obtained the patronage of Earl Gower, the father of the present Marquis of Stafford, who wrote the following letter in his behalf to a friend of Dean Swift at that time in London.

"SIR,

"Mr SAMUEL JONSON, (author of London, a Satire, and some other poetical pieces) is a native of this county, and much respected by some worthy gentlemen in his neighbourhood, who are trustees of a charity school now vacant: the certain salary is sixty pounds a year, of which they are desirous to make him master; but, unfortunately, he is not capable of receiving their bounty, which would make him happy for life, by not being a Master of Arts; which, by the statutes of this school, the master of it must be.

"Now these gentlemen do me the honour to think that I have interest enough in you, to prevail upon you to write to Dean Swift, to persuade the University of Dublin to send a diploma to me, constituting this poor man Master of Arts in their University. They highly extol the man's learning and probity: and will not be persuaded, that the University will make any difficulty of conferring such a favour upon a stranger, if he is recommended by the Dean. They say he is not afraid of the strictest examination, though he is of so long a journey; and will venture it, if the Dean thinks it necessary; choosing rather to die upon the road, than be starved to death in translating for booksellers; which has been his only subsistence for some time past.

"I fear

"I fear there is more difficulty in this affair, than those good-natured gentlemen apprehend; especially as their election cannot be delayed longer than the 11th of next month. If you see this matter in the same light that it appears to me, I hope you will burn this, and pardon me for giving you so much trouble about an impracticable thing; but, if you think there is a probability of obtaining the favour asked, I am sure your humanity, and propensity to relieve merit in distress, will incline you to serve the poor man, without my adding any more to the trouble I have already given you, than assuring you that I am, with great truth,

Trentham, August 1, 1738.

This interference, however, proved unsuccessful, and Johnson, much to his mortification, was again thrown amongst all the shoals, storms and difficulties of a life of professional literature. He returned to London, and being in want of employment, he applied to Mr. Edward Cave, with whom he had had various engagements previous to his expedition into the country, and who retained him now to write the debates in parliament, for the Gentleman's Magazine. Johnson did not attend personally to take the debates, not having interest enough to obtain admission which at that period was extremely difficult to procure, almost every day being pregnant with discussions that menaced the dissolution of an administration that had stood for fourteen years. This defect was supplied by the agency of Mr. Worthington, a clergyman, a man of excellent memory, who furnished Johnson with the detail of the day's occurrences; and he afterwards gave the last finish to the manufacture, by moulding the several speeches into the form of argument, and investing them in all the graces of verbal decoration.

The fact is, these debates are executed in a uniform tone of mischievous elegance that destroys the discrimination of character, and subverts the reality of History. He continued in this employment for four years, namely from 1740 to 1744. The debates were entitled (as it was at that time held such a breach of privilege as never failed to call for the interference of the houses, to publish any account of parliamentary proceedings, under that ostensible character) The Speeches of the Senate of Lilliput. Doctor Johnson himself felt a consciousness of some impropriety attached to this mode of executing his employment, as he has been known repeatedly to declare, and that but a few days previous to his death, "That those debates were the only parts of his writings which then gave him any compunction; but at that time he had no conception he was imposing on the world, though they were frequently written from very slender materials, and often from none at all—the mere coinage of his own imagination." He likewise gave Dr. Smollet notice of this circumstance when he was writing his history of England; and some years since when a gentleman in high office was praising those speeches before him for so particular an appropriation of character, that he could name the speakers without a signature. "Very likely, Sir," said Johnson, ashamed of having deceived him; but I wrote them in the garret where I then lived." How a man could describe the peculiar manners of individuals he had never seen, or the characteristic traits of eloquence he had never heard, is not altogether so intelligible.

During the period of giving those debates, he employed himself in several biographical, and other productions, which appeared in the Gentleman's Magazine of those times; many of which are now to be seen under the title of, "Miscellaneous and Fugitive Pieces," collected and published in three volumes, by Mr. Thomas Davies. And his Poetry—now printing, in a small collection, by Mr. Kearsley, under the title of "The Poetical Works of Dr. Samuel Johnson."

His principal employers in these productions were Cave and Osborne: the former, one of his first friends and patrons; the latter, a rich man and a brute, as the following anecdote will prove.

Mr. JOHNSON being engaged by Osborne, to select a number of the most scarce and valuable tracts in the Earl of Oxford's Library, which he had purchased in consequence of his Lordship's death, and which were afterwards printed in eight quarto volumes, under the title of the Harleian Miscellany: this work went on (agreeable to Osborne's ideas, who measured most things by the facility with which they were done) rather slowly: accordingly he frequently spoke to Mr. Johnson of this circumstance; and, being a man of a coarse mind, sometimes by his expressions made him feel the situation of dependence. Mr. Johnson, however, seemed to take no notice of him, but went on according to that plan which he had prescribed to himself. Osborne, wishing to have the business finished, and perhaps irritated by what he thought an unnecessary delay, one day went into the room where Mr. Johnson was, and abused him in the most illiberal manner: he was an illiterate man, but by great application in his profession, had acquired some property, which had the usual effect, and made him insolent, even to his customers. This impropriety of conduct frequently brought him into scrapes and disgraceful situations.

The selection abovementioned had been at press a considerable time, and the public to whom it had been often announced, became impatient for its appearance.

Mr. JOHNSON heard him for some time unmoved; but, at last, losing all patience, he seized up a large folio, which he was at that time consulting, and aiming a blow at the Bookseller's head, succeeded so forcibly, as to send him sprawling to the floor: Osborne alarmed the family with his cries; but Mr. Johnson, clapping his foot on his breast, told him "he need not be in a hurry to rise; for if he did, he would have the further trouble of kicking him down stairs."

The resentments, on both sides, however, were not recorded in marble, as it appears soon after, that Mr. Johnson finished this selection.

The death of his early associate in difficulties, Mr. Richard Savage, in the year 1743, gave Johnson a fresh opportunity of introducing himself to the observation of the town.—He published the life of his friend a few months after his decease, and gave a specimen of philosophical biography, such as had never before been equalled, and hardly indeed attempted in this country—and yet it may be doubted whether this life, pregnant as it is with all the excellence of superior composition, has done more service or injury to the posthumous reputation of the unfortunate man who is the subject of it. His profligacies are more fully established in point of fact than they almost could have been by any other interposition, because they come attested to us now on the high authority of a man who could not be deceived, because he had ocular and personal preservation of the circumstances he describes, and who, as he was in this instance removed from all practicability of imposition himself, is equally superior to the suspicions of any such sinister practice upon others.—His conduct appears worse in point of principle, because it is now demonstrated to be such as the warmest affection could not palliate, nor the most powerful eloquence defend or obscure. Whatever else therefore may be said of this celebrated production, it will be hardly denied, that it is at least equivocal, when considered as a specimen of efficacious friendship.

Mr. JOHNSON's next production was his prologue on the opening of Drury-lane theatre in the year 1747, being the year of the commencement of Mr. Garrick's managerial authority.

Two years afterwards he presented to Mr. Garrick his tragedy of Irene, the performance alluded to in Mr. Walmley's letter to Mr. Colson, eight years previous to this first preparation for its public appearance in 1749.—Nothing was wanting to the support of this tragedy that the internal activity of the manager within the theatre, or the partiality of external expectation without, could supply.—It dragged on a difficult existence till the ninth night of its representation; and beyond that period, the manager himself, who sustained the principal part in the performance, did not think it expedient to extend it.

The same year Mr. Johnson published his poem imitated from the 10th satire of Juvenal, entitled, The Vanity of Human Wishes. About the same time he published the plan of his Dictionary of the English Language, in a letter to the late Earl of Chesterfield. This letter is dated in the year 1747, and the work itself was not published till 1755, so that the preparation for this great undertaking cost him eight years labour. Every one has heard of the original friendship, and the subsequent quarrel of Doctor Johnson and the Earl of Chesterfield; and the effects of their mutual resentment have been repeatedly related among the other specimens of their respective powers of wit.—Lord Chesterfield takes an opportunity to indulge his enmity, in the following allusion in one of his letters to his son:

"There is a man, whose moral character, deep learning, and superior parts, I acknowledge, admire, and respect: but whom it is so impossible for me to love, that I am almost in a fever whenever I am in his company. His figure, without being deformed, seems made to disgrace, or ridicule the common structure of the human body. His legs and arms are never in the position, which, according to the situation of his body, they ought to be in, but constantly employed in committing acts of hostility upon the Graces. He throws any where, but down his throat; whatever he means to drink; and only mangles what he means to carve. Inattentive to all the regards of social life, he mistakes, or misplaces every thing. He disputes with heat, and indiscriminately; mindless of the rank, character, and situation of those with whom he disputes. Absolutely ignorant of the several gradations of familiarity, or respect; he is exactly the same to his superiors, his equals and his inferiors; and therefore, by a necessary consequence, absurd to two of the three. Is it possible to love such a man? No: the utmost I can do for him, is to consider him as a respectable Hot-tentot."

Johnson took his revenge when the book appeared, by describing it as a production "that inculcated the morals of a prostitute with the manners of a dancing master." Passion, however, is not often favourable to the display of wit—Lord Chesterfield destroyed almost the whole effects of his satire by a weak exaggeration—by making the similitude too remote, he made the application more doubtful, and the severity of course less personal. Doctor Johnson seems to have derived his retort from any thing but the book which it purports to describe.—That a set of instructions, calculated exclusively for the direction of one sex, should be founded on feelings alone applicable to the other, and that a book, a greater part of which consists in recommending reserve in sensual gratification, excepting in instances, where the pride of difficult conquest, added to the other pleasures of the enjoyment, should be grounded on the principles of a profession the very nature and business of which is constant, habitual, unreserved, and indiscriminate indulgence, are hard things easily said, but require more difficulty when they are either to be proved or explained.

The price which the booksellers paid Mr. Johnson for his Dictionary was fifteen hundred pounds, a sum evidently not a reasonable compensation for the learned labours of eight years. He felt himself poor, and applied to his employers for a further sum of five hundred pounds. They refused, and menaced application to a Court of Justice. He treated their threat with contempt, and disclaimed all intention of proceeding with the Dictionary. They at last acquiesced in the demand, and the book proceeded. This occurrence has been much discussed, and different opinions have been entertained respecting it, but the fact seems to have been, that neither party were violently to blame about it.—The booksellers founded their refusal upon the letter of an original compact, and Doctor Johnson rested his claim upon the spirit of its obvious equity.

In the year 1750, Mr. Johnson began his Rambler, which came out every Tuesday and Saturday in that year, and continued to do so for two years successively. He had fewer co-adjutors in the composition of this work than was ever known in a periodical publication, having received no more assistance in the whole course of its long and gradual formation, than five essays; namely, two from Richardson, two from Miss Carter, and one from Miss Talbot. The book has undergone ten editions, and has been recently translated into the Russian language, by order of the Empress. When Johnson was told of this circumstance, he replied, "I should be afraid of being thought a vain man if I did not feel myself proud of such distinction." This year the University of Oxford thought proper to acknowledge his literary merits by a voluntary admission of him to the degree of Master of Arts, an honour which they finally confirmed a few years after, by creating him Doctor of Laws in full convocation.

On the 5th of April, 1750, the masque of Comus was performed at Drury-lane theatre, for the benefit of Mrs. Elizabeth Forster, Milton's grand-daughter. Johnson wrote a prologue, and Garrick performed one of his best parts, but the usual repulsion of charity thinned the house, and the whole produce, including various private contributions, amounted to no more than one hundred and thirty pounds.

In 1753 Mrs. Johnson died. The Doctor felt the loss severely, and wrote the following plain but affectionate epitaph to her memory, on her tomb in Bromley Church, Kent.

In 1756 we find the Doctor concerned in a periodical paper, published by T. Gardner, in the Strand, called, "The Universal Visiter," in conjunction with several other gentlemen of literary distinction of that day. The work did not continue a year. The contributors were Dr. Johnson, whose lucubrations are marked with two astericks; Christopher Smart, Richard Rolt, David Garrick, and Doctor Percy, each of whose papers are distinguished by having the initial letter of their surname prefixed to them.

In the year 1758 he wrote the Idler, in a series of papers published every Saturday. They were read with less avidity than the Rambler, and the town distinguished rightly in the different reception they gave them. This year he lost his mother, whose death he laments in the 41st Number of the Idler.

In the spring of 1759 he published his Rasselas, prince of Abyssinia; the occasion of this publication should not be withheld from the public—it was the want of twenty pounds, to enable him to go down to Litchfield, to pay the last duties to his mother who was dying. After having sketched the design of it, he shewed it a bookseller, and told him his exigencies; but the other refused advancing him any money till he had seen the whole of the copy. The Doctor sat down to comply with his request; but before he had finished it his mother died. He afterwards sold it to another bookseller. This year he was honoured with an annual pension of 300*l*. The circumstances attending this distinction are related in a printed account of Doctor Johnson's life as follows:—

"Soon after the accession of his present Majesty, Lord Bute, who was then First Lord of the Treasury, being determined to pension his countryman, Mr. John Home, author of the tragedy of Douglas, he thought it prudent to associate him with an Englishman of established literary reputation. Johnson was immediately thought of, but what from the natural ruggedness of his temper, and the bent of his political opinions, it was thought hazardous to make the application. His constant and intimate friend, Mr. Murphy, however, undertook it, who fought him out, and told him the subject of his message. He received it with evident marks of surprise, and after pausing a few minutes, replied, "No, Sir: they'll call me pensioner Johnson."—"Suppose they do," says Mr. Murphy, "as you will be conscious of not obtaining that title disgracefully, what's in a name?"—"Very true, Sir," says the other, "I'll consider of it; call upon me to-morrow, and I'll give you an answer." His friend pressed him not to let matters cool, and judiciously pointed out the hazard of procrastination; but he replied, "The question was momentous, and he would not be taken by surprise."

Next day he told Mr. Murphy he would accept it; and in a few days afterwards the Doctor waited upon Lord Bute to thank him, when a conversation took place equally creditable to both parties.—Upon Johnson's introduction afterwards at Court, after expressing his obligations to his Majesty, for this mark of royal favour, he added, "And I accept it the more readily, as I am conscious of not having obtained it by once dipping my pen in faction."—"True Doctor, said Lord Bute, "and what must give further satisfaction to a mind like yours, I hope you'll never be asked to dip your pen in faction." Here the conversation ended, and Johnson took his leave; but such was the awkward feel of this patronage to him, that from that hour he never once knocked at his Lordship's door.

"The learned leisure," which this pension enabled him to enjoy, being 300*l*. per year, directed the Doctor to studies more congenial to his mind than those generally suggested by booksellers. He therefore sat down to a new edition of Shakespeare, which he published by subscription in 1765, in eight volumes octavo. The general merit of this work repaid the public expectation so much, that it went through two editions in five years, and a certain literary character, Dr. Campbell, since dead, said of it, "That the preface and notes were worth the whole subscription-money."

The story respecting Mr. John Home has never been sufficiently attested to entitle it to much belief. Anecdotes of this kind should never be given to the public but when the evidence on which they rest is decisive and incontestible. Such communications are wrong, because in the first place they tend to impose punishment without a certainty of guilt; and in the second operate to shut the gates of bounty upon genius, as no man will be very forward in benevolence to literature who finds that he thereby exposes himself to the chance of having his motives publicly perverted, and runs the risk of incurring obloquy when he expected praise.

In 1765, he brought out his Shakespeare in eight volumes.

In the year 1770, in conjunction with Mr. Stevens, Doctor Johnson enlarged his Shakespeare to ten volumes octavo.

Dr. Johnson's political works, consisting of "Taxation no Tyranny—Falkland Island—The Patriot—and False Alarm," were published at different intervals, from about the year 1769, to 1775.

In the year 1773, he undertook an excursion which he had long meditated, a journey to the Hebrides. Mr. Boswell has given a description of some of the circumstances that led to this tour, so much in that style of simplicity, oddity, sense, and something like an occasional tendency to the contrary, that characterize his peculiar manner of writing, that I have selected it for the entertainment of my readers.

"Doctor JOHNSON had for many years given me hopes that we should go together and visit the Hebrides. Martin's Account of those islands had impressed us with a notion that we might there contemplate a system of life almost totally different from what we had been accustomed to see; and, to find simplicity and wildness, and all the circumstances of remote time or place, so near to our native great great island, was an object within the reach of reasonable curiosity. Dr. Johnson has said in his journey, "that he scarcely remembered how the wish to visit the Hebrides was excited;" but he told me, in summer 1763, that his father put Martin's Account into his hands when he was very young, and that he was much pleased with it. We reckoned there would be some inconveniencies and hardships, and perhaps a little danger; but these we were persuaded were magnified in the imagination of every body. When I was at Ferney, in 1764, I mentioned our design to Voltaire. He looked at me, as if I had talked of going to the North Pole, and said, "You do not insist on my accompanying you?"—"No, Sir."—"Then I am very willing you should go." I was not afraid that our curious expedition would be prevented by such apprehensions; but I doubted that it would not be possible to prevail on Dr. Johnson to relinquish, for some time the felicity of a London life, which, to a man who can enjoy it with full intellectual relish, is apt to make existence in any narrower sphere seem insipid or irksome. I doubted that he would not be willing to come down from his elevated state of philosophical dignity; from a superiority of wisdom amongst the wise, and of learning amongst the learned; and from flashing his wit upon minds bright enough to reflect it.

"He had disappointed my expectations so long, that I began to despair; but in spring, 1773, he talked of coming to Scotland that year with so much firmness, that I hoped he was at last in earnest. I knew that, if he were once launched from the metropolis, he would go forward very well; and I got our common friends there to assist in setting him afloat. To Mrs. Thrale in particular, whose enchantment over him seldom failed, I was much obliged. It was, "I'll give thee a wind."—"Thou art kind."—To attract him, we had invitations from the chiefs Macdonald and Macleod; and, for additional aid, I wrote to Lord Elibank, Dr. William Robertson, and Dr. Beattie.

"To Dr. Robertson, so far as my letter concerned the present subject, I wrote as follows:

"Our friend, Mr. Samuel Johnson, is in great health and spirits; and, I do think, has a serious resolution to visit Scotland this year. The more attraction, however, the better; and therefore, though I know he will be happy to meet you there, it will forward the scheme, if, in your answer to this, you express yourself concerning it with that power of which you are so happily possessed, and which may be so directed as to operate strongly upon him."

"His answer to that part of my letter was quite as I could have wished. It was written with the address and persuasion of the historian of America.

"WHEN I saw you last, you gave us some hopes that you might prevail with Mr. Johnson to make out that excursion to Scotland, with the expectation of which we have long flattered ourselves. If he could order matters so, as to pass some time in Edinburgh, about the close of the summer session, and then visit some of the Highland scenes, I am confident he would be pleased with the grand features of nature in many parts of this country: he will meet with many persons here who respect him, and some whom I am persuaded he will think not unworthy of his esteem. I wish he would make the experiment. He sometimes cracks his jokes upon us; but he will find that we can distinguish between the stabs of malevolence, and the rebukes of the righteous, which are like excellent oil*, and break not the head. Offer my best compliments to him, and assure him that I shall be happy to have the satisfaction of seeing him under my roof."

"To Dr. Beattie I wrote, "The chief intention of this letter is to inform you, that I now seriously believe Mr. Samuel Johnson will visit Scotland this year: but I wish that every power of attraction may be employed to secure our having so valuable an acquisition, and therefore I hope you will, without delay, write to me what I know you think, that I may read it to the mighty sage, with proper emphasis before I leave London, which I must do soon. He talks of you with the same warmth that he did last year. We are to see as much of Scotland as we can, in the months of August and September. We shall not be long of being at Marischal College†. He is particularly desirous of seeing some of the Western Islands."

"Dr. Beattie did better: ipse venit. He was, however, so polite as to waive his privilege of nil mihi scribas, and wrote as follows:

"YOUR very kind and agreeable favour of the 20th of April overtook me here yesterday, after having gone to Aberdeen, which place I left about a week ago. I am to set out this day for London, and hope to have the honour of paying my respects to Mr. Johnson and you, about a week or ten days hence. I shall then do what I can, to enforce the topick you mention; but at present I cannot enter upon it, as I am in a very great hurry; for I intend to begin my journey within an hour or two."

"He was as good as his word, and threw some pleasing motives into the northern scale. But, indeed, Mr. Johnson loved all that he heard from one whom he tells us, in his Lives of the Poets, Gray found "a poet, a philosopher, and a good man."

"My Lord Elibank did not answer my letter to his lordship for some time. The reason will appear, when we come to the isle of Sky. I shall then insert my letter, with letters from his lordship, both to myself and Mr. Johnson. I beg to be understood, that I insert my own letters, as I relate my own sayings, rather as keys to what is valuable belonging to others, than for their own sake.

"Luckily Mr. Justice (now Sir Robert) Chambers, who was about to sail for the East-Indies, was going to take leave of his relations at Newcastle, and he conducted Dr. Johnson to that town. Mr. Scott, of University College, Oxford, (now Dr. Scott, of the Commons) accompanied him from thence to Edinburgh. With such propitious convoys did he proceed to my native city. He afterwards adds,

"He was now in his sixty-fourth year: he was become a little dull of hearing. His sight had always been somewhat weak; yet, so much does mind govern, and even supply the deficiency of organs, that his perceptions were uncommonly quick and accurate. His head and sometimes also his body, shook with a kind of motion like the effect of a palsy: he was frequently disturbed by cramps, or convulsive contractions,

* Our friend Edmund Burke, who by this time had received some pretty sore rubs from Dr. Johnson, on account of the unhappy difference in their politics, upon my repeating this passage to him, exclaimed, "Oil of Vitriol!"

† This I find is a Scotticism. I should have said, "It will not be long before we shall be at Marischal College."

of the nature of that distemper called St. Vitus's dance. He wore a full suit of plain brown clothes, with twisted hair buttons of the same colour, a large bushy greyish wig, a plain shirt, black worsted stockings, and silver buckles. Upon this tour, when journeying, he wore boots, and a very wide-brown cloth great coat, with pockets which might have almost held the two volumes of his folio dictionary; and he carried in his hand a large English oak stick. Let me not be censured for mentioning such minute particulars. Every thing relative to so great a man is worth observing. I remember Dr. Adam Smith, in his rhetorical lectures at Glasgow, told us he was glad to know that Milton wore latches in his shoes, instead of buckles. When I mention the oak stick, it is but letting Hercules have his club; and, by-and-by, my readers will find this stick will bud, and produce a good joke."

Whatever animadversions the book from whence the above extracts are taken may be liable to, from the tendency it has in every part to excite uneasiness among families, by the unnecessary communications which it contains of the sentiments, which one set of individuals entertain of another, there is no denying it would have been abundantly pregnant at least with entertainment, had it not been for one little secret that Mr. Boswell, with by no means the usual dexterity of artifice, satyrically imputed to his countrymen, suffers to escape him almost in the very commencement of it. That Mr. Johnson was every morning favoured with a sight of Mr. Boswell's manuscript history of their proceedings of the preceding day—who after this can for a moment expect an impartial communication of Mr. Boswell's real sentiments. No man meant more sincerely than Mr. Boswell, but no man could execute an intention of sincerity with such a restraint upon him. We can have no other impression of the Journal, therefore, after such a discovery, than that of its being a constrained selection of morning compliments, a mere preparation of diurnal flattery, gratifying to the vanity of Doctor Johnson, but not descriptive of his real manners, nor at all decisive upon his general character.

In 1770, the Doctor again wielded his pen in the cause of benevolence, and wrote an occasional prologue to the Word to the Wife, acted for the widow of the author, the late Mr. Hugh Kelly. The four last lines in this prologue are equal to any thing in any part of Doctor Johnson's poetry.

Yet then shall calm reflection bless the night,
When liberal pity dignifi'd delight,
When pleasure fir'd her torch at virtue's flame,
And mirth was bounty with an humble name.

In the year 1778, he undertook to supply the booksellers with the Lives of the British Poets, and in 1780 the design was fully executed, and the books published at first in ten volumes, small octavo; they were accompanied by a revised edition of the works of all the several writers, whose lives were given in four volumes of large octavo. This was the last great effort of Dr. Johnson's pen—and with the account of his literary history must pretty nearly terminate the relation of every thing that can be important or interesting in a life like his. The following I have reason to believe is a correct statement of the few remaining incidents which the vigilance of friendship has collected, and which the fondness for his memory have given an interest to, hardly derived from their own magnitude or importance.

* Several of the members being fellows of the Royal Society, this night was afterwards changed to Thursday, for their convenience.

During the night of the summer of 1783, he was attacked with a paralytic stroke, at his house in Bolt-court, Fleet-street, which deprived him of the powers of speech. He awoke with the attack; and as sentiments of religion were ever the prevalent suggestions of mind in every situation not only of danger, but even of retirement, he attempted to repeat the Lord's prayer in English—but could not—he attempted it in Latin with the same effect—at last he succeeded in Greek. He immediately rung the bell, but on the approach of his servant, could not articulate a syllable. Feeling, however, that he retained the full use of his senses, he signified a desire for pen, ink, and paper, and wrote the following note to Mr. Allen, a printer, who lived next door to him; a very honest, worthy man, who had been his intimate and confidential friend for many years, and at whose death (which happened suddenly last summer) the Doctor said, "he never knew a man fitter to stand in the presence of his God."

" DEAR SIR,

" It hath pleased Almighty God this morning to deprive me of the powers of speech; and as I do not know but that it might be his further good pleasure to deprive me soon of my senses, I request you will, on the receipt of this note, come to me, and act for me, as the exigencies of my case may require.

I am sincerely your's,

S. JOHNSON."

" To Mr. Edmund Allen."

Mr. Allen immediately attended him, and sent for his usual physicians, Drs. Heberden and Brocklesby, who in the course of a few months recovered him so much, that he was able to take the air, and visit his friends as usual.

He continued every day growing better; and as he found his spirits much relieved by society, it was proposed by some friends, to establish a club in the neighbourhood. The Doctor seemed highly pleased with the proposal, and after naming some friends, whom he wished to have about him, they met early last winter, at the Essex-head, in Essex-street, for the first time, when the Doctor being unanimously called to the chair, he surprized them with a set of rules, drawn by himself, which being read, and approved of by the rest of the members, were regularly entered in a book provided for that purpose.

These rules, to use his own words, are "founded in frequency and parsimony;" and as the public may have some curiosity in seeing such a production from Dr. Johnson in his hour of social relaxation, the following is an authentic copy of them, together with the names of the gentlemen who composed the club, as they stood, "on the rota of monthly attendance."

General Rules of the Essex-Head Club, commenced the 10th of December, 1783.

" To day deep thoughts with me resolve to drench

" In mirth—which after no repenting draws.—MILTON.

I. THE Club shall consist of twenty-four members. The meetings shall be on the Monday, Wednesday*, and Saturday,

Saturday, of every week; but on the week before Easter-day there shall be no meeting.

II. Every member is at liberty to introduce a friend once in a week, but not oftner.

III. Two members shall oblige themselves to attend in their turn every night from eight to ten o'clock, or procure two to attend in their room.

IV. Every member present at the Club shall spend at least six-pence; and every man who stays away, shall forfeit three-pence.

V. The master of the house shall keep an account of the absent members, and deliver to the president of the night a list of the forfeits incurred.

VI. When any member returns after absence, he shall immediately lay down his forfeits; which if he omits to do, the president shall require them of him.

VII. There shall be no general reckoning, but every member shall adjust his own expences.

VIII. The night of indispensable attendance will come to every member once a month. Whoever shall for three months together omit to attend himself, or by substitution—nor shall make any apology on the fourth month, shall be considered as having abdicated the Club.

IX. When a vacancy is to be filled, the name of the candidate, and of the member recommending him, shall stand in the Club-room three nights: on the fourth he may be chosen by ballot, six members at least being present, and two-thirds of the ballots being in his favour, or the majority, should the numbers not be divisible by three.

X. The master of the house shall give notice, six days before, to each of those members whose turn of necessary attendance is come.

The notice may be in these words: ["Sir, On ——— the———of ——— will be your turn of presiding at the Effex-head; your company, is therefore, earnestly requested."] "requested."]

One penny shall be left by each member for the waiter.

Nightly Rules of the Effex-head Club.

I. The president will collect seven-pence from each member at his entrance, marking his attendance thus V; and three-pence for every preceding night which is not marked against his name in the book thus V.

II. The forfeits to be paid over to the landlord. The seven-pence to be considered as part of each member's distinct reckoning.

III. Two letters of notice are to be forwarded each night, by the Penny-post, to the presidents of that day seven-night, as by list of the members.

IV. When the forfeits are paid, they should be noted in the book thus W.

List of the members of the Effex-head Club, when first instituted, as they stood on the rota of monthly attendance.

In the summer of the same year he grew so much better, that supposing the air of Italy might be the best means of re-establishing his health, he hinted in conversation his desire to undertake that journey. His old and intimate friend, Sir Joshua Reynolds, anxious for the preservation of such a life, and yet thinking the Doctor's finances not equal to the project, mentioned the circumstance to the Lord Chancellor, adding, "that if his pension could be increased two hundred a-year more, it would be fully sufficient for the purpose." His Lordship heard the proposal cordially, and took the first opportunity to mention it to the K—g.

His M——y had been previously advertised of the Chancellor's intention, but when it was mentioned to him waved the conversation.

The Chancellor, on this implication of refusal, wrote to Dr. Johnson, informing him, that as the return of his health might not wait the forms of the addition to his pension, he might draw immediately upon him for 500*l.* which lay at his banker's for that purpose.

So liberal and unexpected an offer from a quarter where he had no right to expect it, called forth the Doctor's gratitude, and he immediately wrote the Lord Chancellor the following letter:

"MY LORD,

"AFTER a long and not inattentive observation on mankind, the generosity of your Lordship's offer raises in me no less wonder than gratitude. Bounty so liberally bestowed I should gladly receive if my condition made it necessary; for to such a mind who would not be proud to own his obligation? But it hath pleased God to restore me to such a measure of health, that if I should now appropriate so much of a fortune destined to do good, I could not escape from myself the charge of advancing a false claim. My journey to the continent, though I once thought it necessary, was never much encouraged by my physicians, and I was very desirous that your Lordship should be told of it by Sir Joshua Reynolds as an event very uncertain; for if I should grow much better I should not be willing, and if much worse, I should not be able to migrate.

"Your Lordship was first solicited without my knowledge; but when I was told that you was pleased to honour me with your patronage, I did not expect to hear of a refusal; yet as I have had no long time to brood hope, and have not rioted in imaginary opulence, this cold reception has been scarce a disappointment; and from your Lordship's kindness I have received a benefit which men like you are able to bestow. I shall now live mihi carior, with a higher opinion of my own merit.

"I am, my Lord,

"Your Lordship's most obliged,

"Most grateful,

"And most humble servant,

"S. J O H N S O N."

To the Right Honourable the Lord Chancellor.

September 1784.

The Doctor was at Litchfield when he wrote this letter, on his return from Derbyshire, in tolerable good health. However, on his arrival in town in October, his disorder disorder returned with so much violence as to make all expectation of change of abode quite chimerical. The dropsy returned in his legs, which swelled to such a magnitude, that his physicians relinquished all hopes of his recovery. They however continued to visit him, and prescribe such medicines as were best calculated to compose and quiet his pains. He was likewise occasionally visited by several of his friends, and, at intervals, possessed his usual spirits and flow of conversation.

T H E L I F E O F

His constant friend, as well as physician, Dr. Brocklesby, calling upon him one morning, after a night of much pain and restlessness, he suddenly repeated those lines from Macbeth:

" Oh! Doctor,
" Canst thou not minister to a mind diseas'd,
" Pluck from the memory a rooted sorrow,
" Raze out the written troubles of the brain,
" And with some sweet oblivious antidote
" Cleanse the full bosom of that perilous stuff
" Which weighs upon the heart?"

And when the Doctor replied in the following words of the same author:

" Therein the patient
" Must minister unto himself."

—He exclaimed, " well applied,—that's true,—that's more than poetically true."

On the Thursday before his death, finding himself grow worse, he insisted on knowing from Dr. B——, whether there were any hopes of his recovery? The Doctor at first declined an answer; but he repeating it with great eagerness, the other told him, " that from the complication of disorders he laboured under, and the advanced state of life he was in, there were but little hopes," he received his fate with firmness; thanked him, and said he would endeavour to compose himself for the approaching scene.

The next day, a friend of his, apprized of this alarming sentence, and anxious to have every possible expedient exerted for his recovery, brought Dr. Warren to him; but he would take no prescription; he said, " he felt it too late, the soul then wanted medicine and not the body." Upon the Doctor's taking his leave, he told him " he must not go till he had given him his fee, and then presenting him with a copy of his Lives of the Poets, begged his acceptance of it, assuring him " that was all the fee he had ever given his other two physicians."

For some weeks before he died, he received the sacrament two, or three times in each week; on the mornings of those days he begged that nobody might disturb him, not even his physicians, but in cases of absolute necessity. He spent a great part of the preceding nights in prayer, and in the act of communion he shewed a piety and fervency of devotion that communicated itself to all around him. An intimate friend of his coming into the room one day after this ceremony, the Doctor exclaimed (his face at the same time brightening with a ray of cheerful piety), " oh! my friend, I owe you many obligations through life; but they will all be more than amply repaid by your taking this most important advice, BE A GOOD CHRISTIAN."

The Saturday night preceding his death, he was obliged to be turned in the bed by two strong men employed for that purpose; and though he was very restless, yet when a friend asked him in the morning, whether the man he had recommended to sit up with him was wakeful and alert, the Doctor, recovering his pleasantry a little, replied, " not at all, sir, his vigilance was that of a dormouse, and his activity that of a turnspit on his first entrance into a wheel."

The next night he was at intervals delirious; and in one of those fits, seeing a friend at the bedside, he exclaimed, " What, will that fellow never have done talking poetry to me?" He recovered his senses before morning, but spoke little after this. His heart, however, was not unemployed, as by his fixed attention, and the motion of his lips, it was evident he was pouring out his soul in prayer. He languished in this manner till seven o'clock on Monday evening, the 13th of Dec. 1784, and then expired without a groan, in the 75th year of his age.

His body was opened on Wednesday the 15th of December, in the presence of Drs. Heberden and Brocklesby, where the causes which produced his last disorder were discoverable, but found impracticable to have been removed by medicine. His heart was uncommonly large, and what was very extraordinary, one of his kidneys was entirely consumed, though he never once complained of a nephritic complaint at any period of his life. It is, however, to be conjectured, that he had some presentiment of this circumstance, as a few months before his death he held an argument with his physicians, on the possibility of a man's living after the loss of one of his kidneys.

Sometime previous to his death he made a will subscribed only by two witnesses; but telling the circumstances to a friend, who knew he had a freehold, of about twelve pounds a-year in Litchfield, in right of his father, another was drawn; but it was only a few weeks before he died, that the blanks were filled up. On the same principle of delay, the revision of many manuscripts was postponed, some of which were burnt by the Doctor the week before he died, to avoid being left in a state of imperfection. Amongst the rest was one book, out of two, wherein he had recorded some hints for the history of his life, which he committed to the flames by mistake.

So anxious was he to discharge every tie of moral obligation with punctuality, that some time before his death he set down to recollect what little sums he might owe in the early part of his life to particular friends, which were never given with a view to be restored. Among this number he sent a guinea to the son of an eminent printer which he had borrowed of his father many years before, to pay his reckoning at a tavern.

He likewise recollected borrowing thirty pounds of Sir Joshua Reynolds at a great distance of time; " but this sum (said the Doctor to Sir Joshua, with a manliness of mind which answered for the feelings of his friend being similar to his own) " I intend to bestow on a charity which I know you'll approve of." His attention exerted itself in several little particulars, which would have escaped the vigilance of almost any other person under such circumstances, but which at once indicated the calmness of his mind, and the delicacy of his friendships—Amongst these may be mentioned his sealing up several bags of letters to be returned to the writers of them, lest the confidence they reposed in him should suffer by any subsequent conduct when he could no longer protect them.—An example of good faith in the termination of his earthly friendship, in which some of his acquaintances had not refinement enough to sympathize, nor, what is worse, grace to imitate.

S A M U E L J O H N S O N, LLD.

OF DR. JOHNSON's literary estimation, high and almost unparalleled as it is, we must trace the sources, full as much in the variety and diversity of his talents, as in the transcendency by which he can be proved to have been distinguished in any particular endowment. No man can be named who has filled the collective departments of literature, as scholar, critic, essayist, poet, and philologist, with more skill and versatility than himself; but that he so excelled in each of these particular and distinct provinces of art, as to bid defiance, perhaps, even to very modern competition, it will hardly be entirely safe to maintain. Variety however is the first strong character of genius, and as the possession of a certain degree of excellence in all the senses is the proof of perfection in the body, a man ought no more to regret that he is outdone in one department of science by a person incompetent to all the rest, than he should consider himself excelled in organization by one who can see farther without the faculty of hearing, or with a more exquisite sensibility of taste is without the advantage of feeling.

As a scholar, there is no vestige in any of Dr. Johnson's works, nor tradition transmitted by his familiar associates, of an uncommon profundity in any particular science. He had appropriated no part of his time to the attainment of mathematics—in natural philosophy he affected no more than the casual gleanings, which to a mind like his, always prepared for the reception of science, and unprecedently tenacious in the preservation of it, the common intercourse with learned society could not fail to produce.—Of the abstractions of metaphysical philosophy he does not appear to have been fond, and indeed no subject of literature seems with much violence to have attached his affection, such only excepted as tended to develop the mysterious operations of the mind of man, or the more awful indications of the intention of the Deity. A vast comprehension, therefore, of general information, hardly so exact, perhaps, as to amount to system, nor in the capricious distinctions of literature entitled to the name of science, was the character of his erudition.—The maxim that was very early taught him by a relation, “to learn a little of every thing,” seems to have pervaded the whole system of his future life; so that a mind perhaps more generally illumined than Doctor Johnson's at the time of his death, has not been often found amongst the ornaments of society.—He knew enough of almost every branch of learning to understand its principles, and the detail by the prosecution of which, lesser men contrive to make their heavy way to honours in literature that have been fastidiously denied to him, would have only been a clog and an incumbrance to the activity of such a genius.—He appears to have made his way through the various and involved paths of learning with the same intention and success that actuated Ulysses in his tour from Troy to Ithaca, to record the powers and extent, and to detect the peculiarities of the ποικίλον, the best theme and most beneficial subject of human observation.—It has been said, and with so much confidence, as to have it publicly mentioned by his friends as the weak part of his literary character, that he was no great proficient in Greek. It is difficult to controvert assertions so countenanced, and yet the whole tenor of his composition, the familiarity of his allusion to Grecian history and anecdote, and the promptitude of his quotations from Grecian writers conspire to make the report at least extremely improbable.—

Nothing can be more easily distinguishable by an eye of the least discrimination, than the voluntary ebullitions of memory issuing from a cultivated mind, on an occasion that suggests them, and the little prepared moreaus of classical ornament, the little patches of meretricious decoration, frequently used perhaps to conceal a blemish, rather than to set off a beauty, which have recently stolen into prevalent adoption, and which it would be literary blasphemy to impute to Dr. Johnson. The charge, therefore, of want of knowledge on this subject can mean only an insinuation of comparative inferiority, and can tend only to prove not an ignorance of the tongue, but the voluntary neglect perhaps of some of its verbal technicalities.

As a critic we contemplate that part of Doctor Johnson's character, in which perhaps he is to be viewed with the most unimpaired reverence. To an accurate and extensive information in all the peculiarities of the mere bearings and tendencies of words, he united a comprehensive and philosophical knowledge of the general structure of the mind, and the particular operation of particular passions, such as is but rarely met with. In the prosecution of the more professional and technical parts of the art, such as depend upon an acquaintance with local usage and transitory prejudices, he had the discretion never to indulge himself in the fastidious habit, of rejecting the unambitious assistance of plain common sense. And to give him more praise than mere literary excellence could alone entitle him to, he introduced a spirit of urbanity into the science, a disposition of politeness to the persons of his competitors, and of candour to the consideration of their labours, estimable at once from its value to the art itself, and pleasing from its novelty, in all modern practice. From the arrogant reliance of one of his contemporaries in the first dictates of an imperious mind, he had seen literature excite disgust, and ingenuity degenerate into chimaera. From the absorption of another in the humbler drudgeries of the profession, he had reason to apprehend that a new species of criticism was to be instituted, that was to exist independently of all exercise of the judgment, and that the art itself was to sink into a mere compilation of authorities, and an unenlightened succession of ostentatious quotation. By adding moderation and reflection to the ability of the one, and mind and philosophy to the attainments of the other, he accomplished all the desiderata of an annotator, and laid down at least such a system of the principles of elegant criticism, as can never be sufficiently praised nor too anxiously imitated.

This however is more true of his notes upon Shakespeare than in his animadversions upon the poets, in his account of their Lives. In the latter work he has trusted too much to general impressions, and has given too free an indulgence to the operation of all his prejudices.

As a poet, Dr. Johnson is not justly to be ranked even as a member of the higher class. His language, though select and powerful, does not bend to the delicacy nor acknowledge the authority of those lighter graces which the muses dictate and delight in. Fancy and creation in the degree of them that are necessary for eminent proficiency in poetry, do not appear to have been in the number of his gifts from nature. Knowledge made him timorous, and his weight of understanding impeded his capacity of soaring. Sense, observation, cultivated and magnificent ificent diction, a managed movement in the flow of his verse, strong satire and witty antithesis, will not be denied to him; but these alone will not make poetry.—There is a subtle spirit of which “nothing but itself can be the parallel,” and which perhaps it is almost as difficult to define as to create, that must be present for the formation of real poetry. This Dr. Johnson appears to have wanted, and when I describe his poetical productions, as being with a very few exceptions, nothing more than eloquence in rhyme, as correct verifications of splendid sense, I shall not have much dread of having incurred the disesteem of those who have either themselves delighted to travel in the fairy-land of the muses, or have taken pleasure in the histories of their arts, manners, or produce.

As an essayist, Doctor Johnson yields to Addison.—The wisdom of the former steps into our system invested in all the stiff formality of her primitive magnificence—that of the latter comes cheerfully into our familiar habits, and appears amongst us like Apollo in his exile from heaven, a conscious divinity in a garb of plainness. Johnson is fond of pomp, ceremony, and procession; he is the Doge of Venice, proceeding in accumulated finery to celebrate his nuptials with the Adriatick, while Addison with more power and less state comes amongst us like Peter the Great, and thinks nothing that belongs to life or manners too minute for observation, too trifling for use, or too insignificant for description. His humour also is more easy, more exuberant, and more natural. Not that Johnson is quite destitute of the quality, but what he has is of the grand and epic cast. It would have enabled him to have given a tolerably correct idea of the language, and character of the Knight of La Mancha himself, but would have deserted him totally in attempting to convey the most remote similitude of his incomparable Squire.

Johnson's stories and apologues have also less of the glow of real life than Addison's. They have the rigidity of theoretical fabrication; the incidents are not badly made, but it is evident they are made. With all these drawbacks to his disadvantage, however, it is not to be denied that we not infrequently discover in the lucubrations of Johnson, instances of strong original observation, of commanding powerful combination, and of noble and sublime morality, such as we in vain hope to find in the neater pages of Addison.

Of Dr. Johnson's Dictionary of the English Tongue, of which it would more immediately become me to speak, I find myself relieved from all necessity of a dilated mention, by the universality at once of its reception and its fashion. The book that is to be found in every library, and is the acknowledged umpire of every difficulty in the subject of which it treats, possesses better evidence of merit than any arts of partial declamation can possibly bestow upon it.

An authentic Copy of Dr. JOHNSON's WILL, extracted from the Prerogative Court of Canterbury.

IN the name of God. Amen. I SAMUEL JOHNSON, being in full possession of my faculties, but fearing this night may put an end to my life, do ordain this my last will and testament. I bequeath to God a soul polluted with many sins, but I hope purified by repentance, and I trust redeemed by Jesus Christ. I leave seven hundred and fifty pounds in the hands of Bennet Langton, Esq. three hundred pounds in the hands of Mr. Barclay and Mr. Perkins, brewers; one hundred and fifty pounds in the hands of Dr. Percy, Bishop of Dromore; one thousand pounds, three per cent. annuities in the public funds, and one hundred pounds now lying by me in ready money; all these before-mentioned sums and property I leave, I say, to Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Dr. William Scott of Doctors Commons, in trust, for the following uses; That is to say, to pay to the representatives of the late William Innys, bookseller, in St. Paul's Church Yard, the sum of two hundred pounds; to Mrs. White, my female servant, one hundred pounds stock in the three per cent. annuities aforesaid. The rest of the aforesaid sums of money and property, together with my books, plate, and household furniture, I leave to the before-mentioned Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Doctor William Scott, also in trust, to be applied after paying my debts, to the use of Francis Barber, my man servant, a negro, in such manner as they shall judge most fit and available to his benefit. And I appoint the aforesaid Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, and Dr. William Scott, sole executors of this my last will and testament, hereby revoking all former wills and testaments whatsoever. In witness whereof I hereunto subscribe my name, and affix my seal, this eighth day of December, 1784.

Signed, sealed, published, declared and delivered by the said testator, as his last will and testament, in the presence of us, the word two being first inserted in the opposite page.

GEORGE STRAHAN.
JOHN DES MOULINS.

By way of codicil to my last will and testament, I SAMUEL JOHNSON, give, devise, and bequeath, my messuage, or tenement, situate at Litchfield, in the county of Stafford, with the appurtenances, in the tenure or occupation of Mrs. Bond, of Litchfield aforesaid, or of Mr. Hinchman, her undertenant, to my executors in trust, to sell and dispose of the same; and the money arising from such sale I give and bequeath as follows, to Thomas and Benjamin, the sons of Fisher Johnson, late of Leicester, and Whiting, daughter of Thomas Johnson, late of Coventry, and the grand-daughter of the said Thomas Johnson, one full and equal fourth part each; but in case there shall be more grand-daughters than one of the said Thomas Johnson, living at the time of my decease, I give and bequeath the part or share of that one to, and equally between such grand-daughters. I give and bequeath to the Rev. Mr. Rogers of Berkley, near Froome, in the county of Somerset, the sum of one hundred pounds, requesting him to apply the same towards the maintenance of Elizabeth Merne, a lunatic. I also give and bequeath to my god-children, the son and daughter of Mauritiu Low, painter, each of them one hundred pounds of my stock in the three per cent. consolidated annuities, to be applied and disposed of by and at the discretion of my executors, in the education or settlement in the world of them my said legatees. Also I give and bequeath to Sir John Hawkins, one of my executors, the Annals Ecclesiastici of Baronius and Holingshed; and Stowe's Chronicles; and also an octavo Common Prayer Book. To Bennett Langton, Esq. I give and bequeath my Polyglot Bible. To Sir Joshua Reynolds, my great French Dictionary, by Martiniere, and my own copy of my folio English Dictionary of the last revision. To Dr. Wm. Scott, one of my executors, the Dictionnaire de Commerce, and Lectius's edition of the Greek Poets. To Mr. Windham, Poeta Greci Heroici per Henricum Stephanum. To the Rev. Mr. Strahan, Vicar of Idington, in the county of Middlesex, Mills's Greek Testament, Beza's Greek Testament, by Stephens, all my Latin Bibles, and my Greek Bible, by Wechelius. To Dr. Heberden, Dr. Brocklesby, Dr. Butler, Mr. Cruikshanks, the surgeon who attended me, Mr. Holder, my apothecary, Gerard Hamilton, Esq. Mrs. Gardiner, of Snowhill, Mrs. Francis Reynolds, Mr. Hoole, and the Rev. Mr. Hoole, his son, each a book at their election, to keep as a token of remembrance. I also give and bequeath to Mr. John des Moulins, two hundred pounds consolidated three per cent. annuities; and to Mr. Saffres, the Italian master, the sum of five pounds, to be laid out in books of piety for his own use. And whereas the said Bennet Langton hath agreed, in consideration of the sum of seven hundred and fifty pounds, mentioned in my will to be in hands, to grant and secure an annuity of seventy pounds, payable during the life of me and my servant, Francis Barber, and the life of the survivor of us, to Mr. George Stubbs in trust for us; my mind and will is, that in case of my decease before the said agreement shall be perfected, the said sum of seven hundred and fifty pounds, and the bond for securing the said sum, shall go to the said Francis Barber; and I hereby give and bequeath to him the same, in lieu of the bequest in his favour contained in my said will. And I hereby empower my said executors to deduct and retain all expences that shall or may be incurred in the execution of my said will, or of this codicil thereto, out of such estate and effects as I shall die possessed of. All the rest, residue, and remainder of my estate and effects I give and bequeath to my said Executors, in trust for the said Francis Barber, his Executors and administrators. Witness my hand and seal this ninth day of December, 1784.

SAMUEL JOHNSON (L. S.)

Signed, sealed, published, declared and delivered by the said Samuel Johnson, as, and for a Codicil to his last will and testament, in the presence of us, who, in his presence, and at his request, and also in the presence of each other, have hereto subscribed our names as witnesses.

A D I C T I O N A R Y

OF THE

A, The first letter of the European alphabets, has, in the English language, three different sounds, which may be termed the broad, open, and slender.

The broad sound resembling that of the German a is found, in many of our monosyllables, as all, wall, malt, salt, in which a is pronounced as au in cause, or aw in law. Many of these words were anciently written with au, as fault, waukt; which happens to be still retained in fault. This was probably the ancient sound of the Saxons, since it is almost uniformly preserved in the rustic pronunciation, and the Northern dialects, as wauun for man, baund for band.

A open, not unlike the a of the Italians, is found in father, rather, and more obscurely in fancy, fast, &c.

A slender or close, is the peculiar a of the English language, resembling the sound of the French e masculine, or diphthong ai in pair, or perhaps a middle sound between them, or between the a and e; to this the Arabic a is said nearly to approach. Of this sound we have examples in the words, place, face, waste, and all those that terminate in ation; as, relation, nation, generation.

A is short, as glaze, graze; or long, as glaze, graze: it is marked long, generally, by an e final, plane, or by an i added, as, plain. The short a is open, the long a close.

1. A. an article set before nouns of the singular number; a man, a tree; denoting the number one, as a man is coming, that is, no more than one; or an indefinite indication, as, a man may come this way; that is, any man. This article has no plural signification. Before a word beginning with a vowel, it is written an, as, an ox, an egg, of which a is the contraction.

2. A, taken materially, or for itself, is a noun; as, a great A, a little a.

3. A is placed before a participle, or participial noun; and is considered by Wallis as a contraction of at, when it is put before a word denoting some action not yet finished; as, I am a walking. It also seems to be anciently contracted from at, when placed before local surnames; as, Thomas a Becket. In other cases, it seems to signify to, like the French a.

A hunting Chloë went. Prior.
They go a begging to a bankrupt's door. Dryden.
May peace still slumber by these purling fountains!
Which we may every year

Find when we come a fishing here. Wotton.
Now the men fell a rubbing of armour, which a great while had lain oiled. Wotton.

He will knap the spears a pieces with his teeth.
Mores Antid. Arb.

Another falls a ringing a Pescennius Niger, and judiciously distinguishes the sound of it to be modern. Addison on medals.

4. A has a peculiar signification, denoting the proportion of one thing to another. Thus we say, The landlord hath a hundred a year; The ship's crew gained a thousand pounds a man.

The river Inn passes through a wide open country, during all its course through Bavaria; which is a voyage of two days, after the rate of twenty leagues a day. Addison on Italy.

5. A is used in burlesque poetry, to lengthen out a syllable, without adding to the sense.

For cloves and nutmegs to the line-a,
And even for oranges to China. Dryden.

6. A is sometimes, in familiar writings, put by a barbarous corruption for be; as, will a come, for will be come.

7. A, in composition, seems to have sometimes the power of the French a in these phrases, a droit, a gauche, &c. and sometimes to be contracted from at; as, a side, a slope, a foot, a sleep, a thirst, a ware.

I gin to be a weary of the fun;
And with the state of th' world were now undone. Shakespeare's Macbeth.

And now a breeze from shore began to blow,
The sailors ship their oars, and cease to row;
Then hoist their yards a-trip, and all their sails
Let fall, to-court the wind, and catch the gales.
Dryden's Ceyx and Alcyon

A little house with trees a row,
And like its master very low. Pope, Hor.

8. A is sometimes redundant; as, arise, arouse, awake; the same with rise, rouse, wake.

9. A, in abbreviations, stands for artium, or arts; as, A. B. bachelor of arts, artium baccalarius; A. M. master of arts, artium magister; or, anno; as, A. D. anno domini.

AB, at the beginning of the names of places, generally shows that they have some relation to an abbey, as Abingdon. Gibson.

ABACK, adv. [from back] Backwards. Obsoleto.

But when they came where thou thy skill didst show,
They drew aback, as half with shame confound.

Spens. Past.

ABACTOR, n. f. [Latin] One who drives away or steals cattle in herds, or great numbers at once, in distinction from those that steal only a sheep or two. Blount.

ABACUS, n. f. [Latin]

1. A counting-table, anciently used in calculations.

2. [In architecture] The uppermost member of a column, which serves as a sort of crowning both to the capital and column. Dict.

ABAST, adv. [of abastan, Sax. Behind] From the fore-part of the ship, towards the stern. Dict.

ABAISANCE, n. f. [from the French abaïser, to depress, to bring down.] An act of reverence, a bow. Obeysance is considered by Skinner as a corruption of abaissance, but is now universally used.

TO ABALIENATE, v. a. [from abalieno, Lat.] To make that another's which was our own before. A term of the civil law, not much used in common speech.

ABALIENATION, n. f. [Lat. abalienatio.] The act of giving up one's right to another person; or a making over an estate, goods, or chattels by sale, or due course of law. Dict.

TO ABAND, v. a. [A word contracted from abandon, but not now in use. See ABANDON.] To forsake.

VOL. I. N^o. 1. B They

They stronger are
Than they which fought at first their helping hand,
And Vortiger enforced the kingdom to aband.

Spenser's Fairy Queen, b. ii. cant. 10.

To ABA'NDON. v. a. [Fr. abandoner. Derived, according to Menage, from the Italian abandare, which signifies to forsake his colours; bandum [vexillum] deserere. Posquier thinks it a coalition of a ban dunner, to give up to a proscription; in which sense we, at this day, mention the ban of the empire. Ban, in our own dialect, signifies a curse; and to abandon, if considered as compounded between French and Saxon, is exactly equivalent to diris desovere.]

1. To give up, resign, or quit; often followed by the particle to.

If she be to abandon'd to her sorrow,

As it is spoke, she never will admit me,

Shaksp. Twelfth Night.

The passive gods behold the Greeks defile
Their temples, and abandon to the spoil
Their own abodes; we, feeble few, conspire
To save a sinking town, involv'd in fire.

Dryd. Æneid.

Who is he so abandoned to sottish credulity, as to think, that a clod of earth in a sack, may ever, by eternal shaking, receive the fabric of man's body?

Bentley's Sermons.

Must he, whose altars on the Phrygian shore,
With frequent rites, and pure, avow'd thy pow'r,
Be doom'd the worst of human ills to prove,
Unblest'd, abandon'd to the wrath of Jove?

Pope's Odyssey, b. i. l. 80.

2. To desert; to forsake: in an ill sense.

The princes using the passions of fearing evil, and desiring to escape, only to serve the rule of virtue, not to abandon one's self, leapt to a rib of the ship.

Sidney, b. ii.

Seeing the hurt stag alone,

Left and abandon'd of his velvet friends,

'Tis right, quoth he; thus misery doth part
The flux of company. Shaksp. As you like it.

What fate a wretched fugitive attends,
Scorn'd by my foes, abandon'd by my friends.

Dryd. Æn. 2.

But to the parting goddess thus she pray'd;
Propitious still be present to my aid,
Nor quite abandon your once favour'd maid.

Dryd. Fab.

3. To forsake, to leave.

He boldly spake, Sir knight, if knight thou be,
Abandon this forestalled place at erst,
For fear of further harm, I counsel thee.

Spenser's Fairy Queen, b. ii. cant. 4. stanza. 39.

To ABANDON OVER. v. a. [a form of writing not usual, perhaps not exact.] To give up to, to resign.

Look on me as a man abandon'd o'er

To an eternal lethargy of love;

To pull, and pinch, and wound me, cannot cure,
And but disturb the quiet of my death.

Dryd. Sp. Friar.

ABANDONED. particip. adj. Corrupted in the highest degree; as, an abandoned wretch. In this sense, it is a contraction of a longer form, abandoned [given up] to wickedness.

ABANDONING. [A verbal noun from abandon] Desertion, forsaking.

He hoped his past meritorious actions might outweigh his present abandoning the thought of future action. Clarend. b. viii.

ABANDONMENT. n. f. [abandonnement, Fr.]

1. The act of abandoning.

2. The state of being abandoned.

Diſt.

ABANNITION. n. f. [Lat. abannitia.] A banishment for one or two years, for manslaughter. Obsolete. Diſt.

To ABA'RE. v. a. [abajuan, Sax.] To make bare, uncover, or disclose. Diſt.

ABARTICULATION. n. f. [from ab, from, and articulus, a joint, Lat.] A good and apt construction of the bones, by which they move strongly and easily; or that species of articulation that has manifest motion. Diſt.

To ABA'SE. v. a. [Fr. abaïsser, from the Lat. basis, or bassus, a barbarous word, signifying low, base.]

1. To depress, to lower.

It is a point of cunning to wait upon him with whom you speak with your eye; yet with a demure abasing of it sometimes. Eaton.

2. To cast down, to depress, to bring low: in a figurative and personal sense, which is the common use.

Happy shepherd, to the gods be thankful, that to thy advancement their wisdoms have thee abased. Sidney, b. i.

Behold every one that is proud, and abase him.

Job, xl. 11.

With unresisted might the monarch reigns;

He levels mountains, and he raises plains;

And, not regarding difference of degree,

Abas'd your daughter and exalted me.

Dryd. Fables.

If the mind be curbed and humbled too much in children; if their spirits be abased and broken much by too strict an hand over them; they lose all their vigour and industry.

Locke on Education, § 46.

ABA'SED. adj. [with heralds] a term used of the wings of eagles, when the top looks downwards towards the point of the shield; or when the wings are shut; the natural way of bearing them being spread with the top pointing to the chief of the angle. Bailey. Chambers.

ABASEMENT. n. f. The state of being brought low; the act of bringing low; depression.

There is an abasement because of glory; and there is that lifteth up his head from a low estate.

Ecclesiasticus, xx. 11.

To ABA'SH. v. a. [See BASHEUL. Perhaps from abaïsser, French.]

1. To put into confusion; to make ashamed. It generally implies a sudden impression of shame. They heard, and were abash'd.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. i. l. 331.

This heard, th' imperious queen sat mute with fear;

Nor further durst incense the gloomy thunderer.

Silence was in the court at this rebuke:

Nor could the gods, abash'd, sustain their sovereign's look. Dryden's Fables.

2. The passive admits the particle at, sometimes of, before the casual noun.

In no wise speak against the truth, but be abash'd of the error of thy ignorance.

Ecclesiasticus, iv. 25.

I said unto her, from whence is this kid? Is it not stolen? But she replied upon me, it was given for a gift, more than the wages; however, I did not believe her, and I was abashed at her.

Tob. ii. 13. 14.

In the admiration only of weak minds
Led captive: cease to admire, and all her plumes
Fall flat, and sink into a trivial toy,
At every sudden flight quite abash'd.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. ii. l. 223.

The little Cupids hovering round,
(As pictures prove) with garlands crown'd,
Abash'd at what they saw and heard,
Flew off, nor ever more appear'd.

Swift's Miscellanies.

To ABA'TE. v. a. [from the French abbate, to beat down.]

1. To lessen, to diminish.

Who can tell whether the divine wisdom, to abate the glory of those kings, did not reserve this work to be done by a queen, that it might appear to be his own immediate work?

Sir John Davies on Ireland.

If you did know to whom I gave the ring,
And how unwillingly I left the ring,
You would abate the strength of your displeasure.

Shakspere.

Here we see the hopes of great benefit and light from expositors and commentators are in a great part abated; and those who have most need of their help, can receive but little from them.

Locke's Essay on St. Paul's Epistles.

2. To deject, or depress the mind.

This iron world

Brings down the stoutest hearts to lowest state:

For misery doth bravest minds abate.

Spenser's Hubberd's Tale.

Have the power still

To banish your defenders, till at length
Your ignorance deliver you,
As most abated captives to some nation
That won you without blows?

Shaksp. Coriolanus.

Time that changes all, yet changes us in vain,
The body, not the mind; nor can controul
Th' immortal vigour, or abate the foul.

Dryden's Æneid.

3. In commerce, to let down the price in selling, sometimes to beat down the price in buying.

To ABATE. v. n.

1. To grow less; as, his passion abates; the storm abates. It is used sometimes with the particle of before the thing lessened.

Our physicians have observed, that, in process of time, some diseases have abated of their virulence, and have, in a manner, worn out their malignity, so as to be no longer mortal.

Dryden's Hind and Panther.

2. [In common law.]

It is in law used both actively and neuterly; as, to abate a castle, to beat it down. To abate a writ, is, by some exception, to defeat or overthrow it. A stranger abateth, that is, entereth upon a house or land void by the death of him that last possessed it, before the heir take his possession, and so keepeth him out. Wherefore, as he that putteth out him in possession, is said to disseise: so he that steppeth in between the former possessor and his heir, is said to abate. In the neuter signification thus; The writ of the demandant shall abate, that is, shall be disabled, frustrated, or overthrown. The appeal abateth by covin, that is, that the accusation is defeated by deceit. Cow. l.

3. [In horfemanship.] A horse is said to abate or take down his curvets; when working upon curvets, he puts his two hind-legs to the ground both at once, and observes the same exactness in all the times. Diſt.

ABA'TEMENT. n. f. [abatement, Fr.]

1. The act of abating or lessening.

Xenophon tells us, that the city contained about ten thousand houses, and allowing one man to every house, who could have any share in the government (the rest, consisting of women, children, and servants), and making other obvious abatements, these tyrants, if they had been careful to adhere together, might have been a majority even of the people collective.

Swift on the Contents of Athens and Rome.

2. The state of being abated.

Coffee has, in common with all nuts, an oil strongly combined and entangled with earthy particles. The most noxious part of oil exhales in roasting to the abatement of near one quarter of its weight. Arbutnot on Aliments.

3. The sum or quantity taken away by the act of abating.

The law of works is that law, which requires perfect obedience, without remission or abatement; so that, by that law, a man cannot be just, or justified, without an exact performance of every tittle. Locke.

4. The cause of abating; extenuation.

As our advantages towards practising and promoting piety and virtue were greater than those of other men; so will our excuse be less, if we neglect to make use of them. We cannot plead an abatement of our guilt, that we were ignorant of our duty, under the prepossession of ill habits, and the bias of a wrong education.

Atterbury's Sermons.

5. [In law.] The act of the abator; as, the abatement of the heir into the land before he hath agreed with the lord. The affection or passion of the thing abated; as, abatement of the writ. Cowel.

6. [With heralds] an accidental mark, which being added to a coat of arms, the dignity of it is abated, by reason of some stain or dishonourable quality of the bearer. Diſt.

ABA'TER. n. f. The agent or cause by which an abatement is procured; that by which any thing is lessened.

Abaters

Abaters of acrimony or sharpness, are expressed oils of ripe vegetables, and all preparations of such; as of almonds, pistachoes, and other nuts.

ABATOR. n. f. [a law term.] One who intrudes into houses or land, void by the death of the former possessor, and yet not entered upon or taken up by his heir.

ABATUDE. n. f. [old records.] Any thing diminished.

ABATURE. n. f. [from abatre, French.] Those sprigs of grass which are thrown down by a stag in his passing by.

ABE. n. f. The yarn on a weaver's warp; a term among clothiers.

ABBA. n. f. [Heb. אבא.] A Syriac word, which signifies father.

ABBACY. n. f. [Lat. abbatia.] The rights or privileges of an abbot. See ABBEY.

According to Felinus, an abbacy is the dignity itself, since an abbot is a term or word of dignity, and not of office; and, therefore, even a secular person, who has the care of souls, is sometimes, in the canon law, also stiled an abbot.

ABBEY. n. f. [Lat. abbatissa, from whence the Saxon abudirre then probably abbateſſi, and by contraction abbess in Fr. and abbess, Eng.] The superiour or governess of a nunnery or monastery of women.

They fled

Into this abbey, whither we pursued them;
And here the abbess shuts the gate on us,
And will not suffer us to fetch him out.

Shakspeare, Com. of Errors.

I have a sister, abbess in Terceras,
Who lost her lover on her bridal-day.

Dryd. D. Sebaſt.

Constantia, as soon as the solemnities of her reception were over, retired with the abbess into her own apartment.

Addison.

ABBE, or ABBY. n. f. [Lat. abbatia; from whence probably first ABBACY; which see.] A monastery of religious persons, whether men or women; distinguished from religious houses of other denominations by larger privileges. See ABBOT.

With easy roads he came to Leicester;
Lodg'd in the abbey, where the reverend abbot,
With all his convent, honourably receiv'd him.

Shakspeare.

ABBEY-LUBBER. n. f. [See LUBBER.] A slothful loiterer in a religious house, under pretence of retirement and austerity.

This is no Father Dominic, no huge overgrown abbey-lubber; this is but a diminutive sucking friar.

Dryd. Sp. Fr.

ABBOT. n. f. [in the lower Latin abbas from אב father, which sense was still implied; so that the abbots were called patres, and abbesses matres monasterii. Thus Fortunatus to the abbot Paternus: Nominis officium jure, Paterne, geris.] The chief of a convent, or fellowship of canons. Of these, some in England were mitred, some not: those that were mitred, were exempted from the jurisdiction of the diocesan, having in themselves episcopal authority within their precincts, and being also lords of parliament. The other sort were subject to the diocesan in all spiritual government.

Cowley.

ABBOTSHIP. n. f. The state or privilege of an abbot.

Diſt.

TO ABBREVIATE. v. a. [Lat. abbreviare.]

1. To shorten by contraction of parts without loss of the main substance; to abridge.

It is one thing to abbreviate by contracting, another by cutting off.

Bacon. Essay 26.

The only invention of late years, which hath contributed towards politeness in discourse, is that of abbreviating or reducing words of many syllables into one, by lopping off the rest.

Swift.

2. To shorten, to cut short.

Set the length of their days before the flood; which were abbreviated after, and contracted into hundreds and threescores.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. vi. c. 6.

ABBREVIATION. n. f.

1. The act of abbreviating.

2. The means used to abbreviate, as characters signifying the whole words; words contracted.

Such is the propriety and energy in them all, that they never can be changed, but to disadvantage, except in the circumstance of using abbreviations.

Swift.

ABBREVIATOR. n. f. [abbreviator, Fr.] One who abbreviates, or abridges.

ABBREVIATURE. n. f. [abbreviatura, Lat.]

1. A mark used for the sake of shortening.

2. A compendium or abridgment.

He is a good man, who grieves rather for him that injures him, than for his own suffering; who prays for him, that wrongs him, forgiving all his faults; who sooner shews mercy than anger; who offers violence to his appetite, in all things endeavouring to subdue the flesh to the spirit.

This is an excellent abbreviature of the whole duty of a Christian.

Taylor's Guide to Devotion.

ABBREUVOIR. [in French, a watering-place. Ital. abbeverato, dal verbo bevere. Lat. bibere.]

Abbeverari i cavalli. This word is derived by Menage, not much acquainted with the Teutonic dialects, from abbebare for abibere; but more probably it comes from the same root with brew. See BREW.] Among masons, the joint or juncture of two stones, or the interface between two stones to be filled up with mortar.

Diſt.

ABBY. See ABBEY.

A, B, C.

1. The alphabet; as, he has not learned his a, b, c.

2. The little book by which the elements of reading are taught.

Then comes question like an a, b, c, book.

Shakspeare.

TO ABDICATE. v. a. [Lat. abdicare.] To give up right; to resign; to lay down an office.

Old Saturn, here, with upcast eyes,
Beheld his abdicated skies.

Addison.

ABDICATION. n. f. [abdicatio, Lat.] The act of abdicating; resignation; quitting an office by one's own proper act before the usual or stated expiration.

Neither doth it appear how a prince's abdication can make any other sort of vacancy in the throne, than would be caused by his death; since he cannot abdicate for his children, otherwise than by his own consent in form to a bill from the two houses.

Swift on the Sentiments of a Church of England man.

ABDICATIVE. adj. That which causes or implies an abdication.

Diſt.

ABDICATIVE. adj. [from abdo, to hide.] That which has the power or quality of hiding.

Diſt.

ABDOMEN. n. f. [Lat. from abdo, to hide.] A cavity commonly called the lower venter or belly: It contains the stomach, guts, liver, spleen, bladder, and is within lined with a membrane called the peritonæum. The lower part is called the hypogastrium; the foremost part is divided into the epigastrium, the right and left hypochondria, and the navel; 'tis bounded above by the cartilago ensiformis and the diaphragm, sideways by the short or lower ribs, and behind by the vertebrae of the loins, the bones of the coxendix, that of the pubes and os sacrum. It is covered with several muscles, from whose alternate relaxations and contractions in respiration, digestion is forwarded, and the due motion of all the parts therein contained promoted, both for secretion and expulsion.

Quincy.

The abdomen consists of parts containing and contained.

Wifeman's Surgery.

ABDOMINAL. } adj. Relating to the abdomen.

ABDOMINOUS. }

TO ABDUCE. v. a. [Lat. abducere.] To draw to a different part; to withdraw one part from another.

A word chiefly used in physic or science.

If we abduce the eye unto either corner, the object will not duplicate; for, in that position, the axis of the cones remain in the same plain, as is demonstrated in the optics delivered by Galen.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. iii. c. 20.

ABDUCT. v. a. [from abducere.] To draw to a different part; to withdraw one part from another.

A word chiefly used in physic or science.

If we abduce the eye unto either corner, the object will not duplicate; for, in that position, the axis of the cones remain in the same plain, as is demonstrated in the optics delivered by Galen.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. iii. c. 20.

ABDUCT. v. a. [from abducere.] To draw to a different part; to withdraw one part from another.

which serve to open or pull back divers parts of the body; their opposites being called adduct.

Diſt.

ABDUCTION. n. f. [abductio, Lat.]

1. The art of drawing apart, or withdrawing one part from another.

2. A particular form of argument.

ABDUCTOR. n. f. [abductor, Lat.] The name given by anatomists to the muscles, which serve to draw back the several members.

He supposed the constrictors of the eyelids must be strengthened in the supercilious; the abductors in drunkards, and contemplative men, who have the same steady and grave motion of the eye.

Arbutnot and Pope's Martinus Scriblerus.

ABECEDARIAN. n. f. [from the names of a, b, c, the three first letters of the alphabet.] He that teaches or learns the alphabet, or first rudiments of literature.

This word is used by Wood in his Athenæ Oxonienses, where mentioning Farnaby the critic, he relates, that, in some part of his life, he was reduced to follow the trade of an abecedarian by his misfortunes.

ABECEDARY. adj. [See ABECEDARIAN.]

1. Belonging to the alphabet.

2. Inscribed with the alphabet.

This is pretended from the sympathy of two needles touched with the loadstone, and placed in the center of two abecedary circles, or rings of letters, described round about them, one friend keeping one, and another the other, and agreeing upon an hour wherein they will communicate.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. ii. c. 3.

ABED. adv. [from a, for at, and Bed. In bed.] It was a shame for them to mar their complexions, yea and conditions too, with long lying abed: when she was of their age, she would have made a handkerchief by that time o'day.

Sidney, b. ii.

She has not been abed, but in her chapel.

All night devoutly watch'd. Dryd. Spa. Friar.

ABERRANCE. n. f. [from aberro, Lat. to ABERRANCY.]

wander from the right way; a deviating from the right way; an error; a mistake; a false opinion.

They do not only swarm with errors, but vices depending thereon. Thus they commonly affect no man any farther than he deserts his reason, or complies with their aberrances.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. i. c. 3.

Could a man be composed to such an advantage of constitution, that it should not at all adulterate the images of his mind; yet this second nature would alter the crisis of his understanding, and render it as obnoxious to aberrances, as now.

Glanville's Scepſis Scientifica, c. 16.

ABERRANT. adj. [from aberrans, Lat.] Deviating, wandering from the right or known way.

ABERRATION. n. f. [from aberratio, Lat.] The act of deviating from the common or from the right track.

If it be a mistake, there is no heresy in such an harmless aberration; the probability of it will render it a lapse of easy pardon.

Glanville's Scepſis Scientifica, c. 11.

ABERRING. part. [from the verb aberr, of aberro, Lat.] Wandering, going astray.

Of the verb aberr I have found no example.

Divers were out in their account, aberring several ways from the true and just compute, and calling that one year, which perhaps might be another.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. iv. c. 12.

TO ABERVNCATE. v. a. [averuncare, Lat.] To pull up by the roots; to extirpate utterly.

Diſt.

TO ABET. v. a. [from betan, Sax. signifying to enkindle or animate.] To push forward another to support him in his designs by connivance, encouragement, or help.

It was once indifferent, but is almost always taken by modern writers, in an ill sense; as may be seen in ABETTER.

To abet signifieth, in our common law, as much as to encourage or set on.

Cowley.

Then shall I soon, quoth he, return again,
Abet that virgin's cause disconsolate,
And shortly back return.

Fairy Queen, b. i.

B 2 A

A B H

A widow who by solemn vows,
Contracted to me, for my spouse,
Combin'd with him to break her word,
And has abetted all. Hudibras, p. iii. cant. 3.
Men lay so great weight upon right opinions;
and eagerness of abetting them, that they account that the unum necessarium. Decay of Piety.
They abetted both parties in the civil war, and always furnished supplies to the weaker side, lest there should be an end put to these fatal divisions.
Addison, Freeholder, N° 28.

ABETMENT. n. f. The act of abetting. Dict.
ABETTER, or ABETTOR. n. f. He that abets;
the supporter or encourager of another.
Whilst calumny has two such potent abettors, we are not to wonder at its growth: as long as men are malicious and designing, they will be abetting. Governor of the Tongue.
You shall be still plain Torrifmond with me,
Th' abettor, partner (if you like the name),
The husband of a tyrant, but no king;
Till you deserve that title by your justice.

Dryden's Spanish Friar.
These considerations, though they may have no influence on the multitude, ought to sink into the minds of those who are their abettors, and who, if they escape punishment here, must know, that these several mischiefs will be one day laid to their charge.
Addison, Freeholder, N° 50.

ABEYANCE. n. f. [from the French aboyer, allatave, to bark at.] This word, in Littleton, cap. Discontinuance, is thus used. The right of free-simple lieth in abeyance, when it is all only in the remembrance, intentment, and consideration of the law. The frank tenement of the glebe of the parsonage, is in no man during the time that the parsonage is void, but is in abeyance.
Cowell.

ABGREGATION. n. f. [abgregatio, Lat.] A separation from the flock. Dict.
To ABHOR. v. a. [abhorreo, Lat.] To hate with acrimony; to detest to extremity; to loath;
to abominate.

Whilst I was big in clamour, came a man,
Who having seen me in my woful state,
Shunn'd my abhor'd society.
Shakespeare's King Lear.
Justly thou abhor'st,
That son, who on the quiet state of men
Such trouble brought, affecting to subdue
Rational liberty. Milt. Para. Lost, b. xii. l. 79
The self-same thing they will abhor
One way, and long another for.

Hudibras, p. i. cant. 1.
A church of England man abhors the humour of the age, in delighting to sling scandals upon the clergy in general; which, besides the disgrace to the reformation, and to religion itself, cast an ignominy upon the kingdom. Swift, Ch. of Eng.

ABHORRENCE. } n. f. [from abhor.]
ABHORRENCY. }
3. The act of abhorring, detestation.
It draws upon him the hatred and abhorrence of all men here; and subjects him to the wrath of God hereafter. South's Sermons.

2. The disposition to abhor, hatred.
Even a just and necessary defence does, by giving men acquaintance with war, take off somewhat from the abhorrence of it, and infensibly dispose them to hostilities. Decay of Piety.
The first tendency to any injustice that appears, must be suppressed with a show of wonder and abhorrency in the parents and governors.

Locke on Education, § 110.
ABHORRENT. adj. [from abhor.]
1. Struck with abhorrence; loathing.
For if the worlds
In worlds inclos'd could on his senses burst,
He would abhorrent turn. Thomson's Sum. l. 310.
2. Contrary to, foreign, inconsistent with. It is used with the particles from or to, but more properly with from.
This I conceive to be an hypothesis, well worthy a rational belief; and yet is so abhorrent from the vulgar, that they would as soon believe Anaxagoras, that snow is black, as him that should affirm it is not white. Glewoil. Scipis Scient. c. 12.

Why then these foreign thoughts of state employments,
Abhorrent to your function and your breeding?
Poor droning truants of unpractis'd cells,
Bred in the fellowship of bearded boys,
What wonder is it if you know not men?
Dryden.

ABHORRER. n. f. [from abhor.] The person that abhors; a hater, detester.

The lower clergy were rail'd at, for disputing the power of the bishops, by the known abhor-rers of episcopacy, and abused for doing nothing in the convocations, by these very men who wanted to bind up their hands. Swift, Ex. N° 21.

ABHORRING. The object of abhorrence.
This seems not to be the proper use of the participial noun.

They shall go forth, and look upon the carcases of the men that have transgressed against Me:
for their worm shall not die, neither shall their fire be quenched, and they shall be an abhorring unto all flesh. Isaiah, lxi. 44.

To ABIDE. v. n. I abode or abid. [from brian, or abridian, Sax.]

1. To dwell in a place, not remove, to stay.
Thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, if I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever.
Now therefore I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad, a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren.
Gen. xliv. 32, 33.

2. To dwell.
The Marquis Dorset, as I hear, is fled
To Richmond, in the parts where he abides.
Shakespeare's Richard III.

Those who apply themselves to learning, are forced to acknowledge one God, incorruptible and unbegotten; who is the only true being, and abides for ever above the highest heavens, from whence He beholds all the things that are done in heaven and earth.
Stillingfl. Defence of Disc. on Rom. Idolat.

3. To remain; not cease or fail; to be immoveable.

They that trust in the Lord shall be as mount Zion, which cannot be removed, but abideth for ever. Psalms, cxxv. 1.

4. To continue in the same state.
The fear of the Lord tendeth to life; and he that hath it shall abide satisfied. Prov. xix. 23.

There can be no study without time; and the mind must abide and dwell upon things, or be always a stranger to the inside of them. South.

5. To endure without offence, anger, or contradiction.

Who can abide, that against their own doctors, six whole books should by their fatherhoods be imperiously obtruded upon God and his church? Hall.
6. It is used with the particle with before a person, and at or in before a place.

It is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man: Abide with me.
Gen. xxix. 19.

For thy servant vowed a vow, while I abode at Geshur in Syria, saying, if the Lord shall bring me again indeed to Jerusalem, then I will serve the Lord. 2 Sam. xv. 8.

7. It is used with by before a thing; as, to abide by his testimony; to abide by his own skill; that is, to rely upon them; to abide by an opinion; to maintain it; to abide by a man, is also, to defend or support him. But these forms are something low.

Of the particle abid, I have found only the example in Woodward, and should rather determine that abide in the active sense has no passive participle, or compounded preterite.

To ABIDE, v. a.

1. To wait for, expect, attend, wait upon, await; used of things prepared for persons, as well as of persons expecting things.

Home is he brought, and laid in sumptuous bed,
Where many skilful leeches him abide,
To salve his hurts. Fairy Tale, l. i. cant. 5, stanza 17.

A B J

While lions war, and battle for their dens,
Poor harmless lambs abide their enmity.

Shakespeare, Hen. VI. p. 3.
Bonds and afflictions abide me. As You Like It, xx. 23.
2. To bear or support the consequences of a thing.

Ah me! they little know
How dearly I abide that boast so vain.

Milton's Paradi. Lost.
3. To bear or support, without being conquered or destroyed.

But the Lord he is the true God, he is the living God, and an everlasting king: At his wrath the earth shall tremble, and the nations shall not be able to abide his indignation. Jer. x. 10.

It must be allowed a fair presumption in favour of the truth of my doctrines, that they have abida very rigorous test now for above thirty years, and the more strictly they are look'd into, the more they are confirmed. Woodward, Letter i.

4. To bear without aversion; in which sense it is commonly used with a negative.

Thou can't not abide Tiridates; this is but love of thyself. Sidney, b. ii.

Thy vile race,
Though thou didst learn, had that in't, which good natures

Could not abide to be with; therefore wast thou Deservedly confin'd unto this rock. Shakespeare, Tem.

5. To bear or suffer.
Girt with circumfluous tides
He still calamitous constraint abides.

Pope's Odyssey, b. iv. l. 750.
ABIDDER. n. f. [from abide] The person that abides or dwells in a place; perhaps that lives or endures. A word little in use.

ABIDING. n. f. [from abide] Continuance;
stay; fixed state.

We are strangers before Thee and sojourners, as were all our fathers; our days on the earth are as a shadow, and there is none abiding.

1 Chron. xxix. 15.
The air in that region is so violently removed,
and carried about with such swiftness, as nothing in that place can consist or have abiding.

Rawleigh's History of the World.
A/BJECT. adj. [abjectus, Lat. thrown away as of no value.]

1. Mean; worthless; base; groveling; spoken of persons, or their qualities.

Rebellion
Came like itself in base and abject routs,
Led on by bloody youth goaded with rage,
And countenanc'd by boys and beggary.

Shakespeare's Henry IV.
I was at first as other beasts that graze
The trodden herb, of abject thoughts and low.

Milt. Paradise Lost, b. ix. l. 571.
Honest men, who tell their sovereigns what they expect from them, and what obedience they shall be always ready to pay them, are not upon an equal foot with base and abject flatterers.

Addison's Whig Examiner.
2. Being of no hope or regard; used of condition.

The rarer thy example stands,
By how much from the top of wond'rous glory,
Strongest of mortal men,
To lowest pitch of abject fortune thou art fall'n.

Milton's Samson Agonistes.
We see man and woman in the highest innocence and perfection, and in the most abject state of guilt and infirmity. Addison, Spec. N° 279.

3. Mean and despicable; used of actions.

The rapine is so abject and profane,
They not from trifles, nor from gods refrain.

Dryden's Juvenal, Sat. 8.

To what base ends, and by what abject ways
Are mortals urg'd through sacred lust of praise?

Pope's Essay on Criticism.
A/BJECT. n. f. A man without hope; a man whose miseries are irretrievable; one of the lowest condition.

Yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against me. Psalms xxxv. 15.

To ABJECT. v. a. [abjicio, Lat. To throw away. A word rarely used.

ABJECT-

A B J

ABJECTNESS. n. f. [from abject.] The state of an abject.

Our Saviour would love at no less rate than death; and, from the supereminent height of glory, stooped and abased himself to the sufferance of the extremest of indignities, and sunk himself to the bottom of abjectness, to exalt our condition to the contrary extreme. Boyle's Works.

ABJECTION. n. f. [from abject.] Meanness of mind; want of spirit; fervility; baseness.

That this should be termed baseness, abjection of mind, or fervility, is it credible?

Hooker, b. v. § 47.

The just medium lies betwixt pride and the abjection, the two extremes, L'Estrange.

ABJECTLY. adv. [from abject.] In an abject manner, meanly, basely, fervilely, contemptibly.

ABJECTNESS. n. f. [from abject.] Abjection, fervility, meanness.

Servility and abjectness of humour is implicitly involved in the charge of lying.

Government of the Tongue, § 8.

By humility I mean not the abjectness of a base mind: but a prudent care not to over-value ourselves upon any account.

Grew's Cosmologia Sacra, b. ii. c. 7.

ABILITY. n. f. [Habileté, Fr.]

1. The power to do any thing, whether depending upon skill, or riches, or strength, or any other quality.

Of singing thou hast got the reputation,
Good Thyris, mine I yield to thy ability;
My heart doth seek another estimation.

Sidney, b. i.

If aught in my ability may serve
To lighten what thou suffer'st, and appease
Thy mind with what amends is in my power.

Milton's Sampson Agonistes, l. 744.

They gave after their ability unto the treasure.

Exra ii. 69.

If any man minister, let him do it as of the ability which God giveth: that God in all things may be glorified through Jesus Christ. 1 Pet. iv. 11.

Wherever we find our abilities too weak for the performance, he assures us of the assistance of his Holy Spirit.

Rogers's Sermons.

2. Capacity of mind; force of understanding; mental power.

Children in whom there was no blemish, but well-favoured, and skilful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science, and such as had ability in them to stand in the king's palace. Dan. i. 4.

3. When it has the plural number, abilities, it frequently signifies the faculties or powers of the mind, and sometimes the force of understanding given by nature, as distinguished from acquired qualifications.

Whether it may be thought necessary, that in certain tracts of country, like what we call parishes, there should be one man, at least, of abilities to read and write? Swift.

ABINTESTATE. adj. [of ab, from, and intestate, Lat.] A term of law, implying him that inherits from a man, who, though he had the power to make a will, yet did not make it.

To ABJUGATE. v. a. [abjugo, Lat.] To unyoke, to uncouple. Dict.

To ABJURE. v. a. [abjuro, Lat.]

1. To cast off upon oath, to swear not to do or not to have something.

Either to die the death, or to abjure

For ever the society of man.

Shakespeare's Midsum. Night's Dream.

No man, therefore, that hath not abjured his reason, and sworn allegiance to a preconceived fantastical hypothesis, can undertake the defence of such a supposition. Hall.

2. To retract, recant, or abnegate a position upon oath.

ABJURATION. n. f. [from abjure.] The act of abjuring. The oath taken for that end.

Until Henry VIII. his time, if a man, having committed felony, could go into a church or churchyard, before he were apprehended, he might not be taken from thence to the usual trial of law, but confessing his fault to the justices, or to the coroner, gave his oath to forsake the realm for ever, which was called abjuration.

There are some abjurations still in force among us here in England; as, by the statute of the 25th of king Charles II. all persons that are admitted into any office, civil or military, must take the test; which is an abjuration of some doctrines of the Church of Rome.

There is likewise another oath of abjuration, which laymen and clergymen are both obliged to take; and that is to abjure the Pretender.

Ayliffe's Parergon, Juris Canonici.

To ABLACTION. v. a. [ablacio, Lat.] To wean from the breast.

ABLACTION. n. f. One of the methods of grafting; and, according to the signification of the word, as it were a weaning of a cyon by degrees from its mother stock, not cutting it off wholly from the stock, till it is firmly united to that on which it is grafted.

ABLAQUEATION. n. f. [ablaqueatio, Lat.] The art or practice of opening the ground about the roots of trees, to let the air and water operate upon them.

Trench the ground and make it ready for the spring: Prepare also soil, and use it where you have occasion: Dig borders. Uncover as yet roots of trees, where ablaqueation is requisite.

Evelyn's Kalendar.

The tenure in chief is the very root that doth maintain this silver stem, that by many rich and fruitful branches spreadeth itself: so if it be suffered to starve, by want of ablaqueation, and other good husbandry, this yearly fruit will much decrease.

Bacon's Office of Alienations.

ABLATION. n. f. [ablatio, Lat.] The act of taking away.

ABLATIVE. n. a. [ablativus, Lat.]

1. That which takes away.
2. The sixth case of the Latin nouns; the case which, among other significations, includes the person from whom something is taken away. A term of grammar.

ABLE. adj. [habile, Fr. habilis, Lat.] Skilful, ready.

1. Having strong faculties, or great strength or knowledge, riches, or any other power of mind, body, or fortune.

Henry VII. was not afraid of an able man, as Lewis the Eleventh was. But contrariwise, he was served by the ablest men that were to be found; without which his affairs could not have prospered as they did. Bacon's Henry VII.

Such gambol faculties he hath, that threw a weak mind and an able body, for the which the prince admits him. Shakespeare's Henry IV. p. ii.

2. Having power sufficient; enabled.
All mankind acknowledge themselves able and sufficient to do many things, which actually they never do. South's Sermon.

Every man shall give as he is able, according to the blessing of the Lord thy God, which he hath given thee. Daut. xvi. 17.

3. Before a verb, with the particle to, it signifies generally having the power.

Wrath is cruel, and anger is outrageous; but who is able to stand before envy. Prov. xxvii. 4.

4. With for it is not often, nor very properly used.

There have been some inventions also, which have been able for the utterance of articulate sounds, as the speaking of certain words.

Wilkins's Mathematical Magic.

To ABLE. v. a. To make able; to enable, which is the word commonly used. See ENABLE.

Plate sin with gold.

And the strong lance of justice hurtless breaks:
Arm it with rags, a pigmy's straw doth pierce it.
None does offend, none, I say none; I'll able 'em;
Take that of me my friend. Shakespeare's King Lear.

ABLE-BODIED. adj. Strong of body.

It lies in the power of every fine woman, to secure at least half a dozen able-bodied men to his majesty's service. Addison's Freeholder, N° 4.

To ABLEGATE. v. a. [ablego, Lat.] To send abroad upon some employment; to send out of the way. Dict.

A B N

ABLEGATION. n. f. [from ablegate.] The act of sending abroad. Dict.

ABLENESS. n. f. [from able.] Ability of body or mind, vigour, force.

That nation doth so excel, both for comeliness and ableness, that from neighbour countries they ordinarily come, some to strive, some to learn, some to behold. Sidney, b. ii.

ABLEPSY. n. f. [Ἀβληψία, Gr.] Want of sight, blindness; unadvisedness. Dict.

ABLIQUITION. n. f. [abliquitio, Lat.] Prodigal expence on meat and drink. Dict.

To ABLIGATE. v. a. [abligo, Lat.] To tie up from.

To ABLOCATE. v. a. [abloco, Lat.] To let out to hire.

Perhaps properly by him who has hired it from another. Calvin's Lexicon Juridicum.

ABLOCATION. n. f. [from ablocate.] A letting out to hire.

To ABLUDE. v. n. [abludo, Lat.] To be unlike. Dict.

ABLUENT. adj. [abluens, Lat.] from abluo, to wash away.]

1. That which washes clean.
2. That which has the power of cleansing. Dict.

ABLUTION. n. f. [ablutio, Lat.]

1. The act of cleansing, or washing clean.

There is a natural analogy between the ablution of the body and the purification of the soul; between eating the holy bread and drinking the sacred chalice, and a participation of the body and blood of Christ. Taylor's Worshy Communicant.

2. The Water used in washing.

Wash'd by the briny wave, the pious train
Are cleans'd, and cast th' ablutions in the main.

Pope's Iliad.

3. The rinsing of chemical preparations in water, to dissolve and wash away any acrimonious particles.
4. The cup given, without consecration, to the laity in the popish churches.

To ABNEGATE. v. a. [from abnego Lat.] To deny.

ABNEGATION. n. f. [abnegatio, Lat.] denial, from abnego, to deny.] Denial, renunciation.

The abnegation or renouncing of all his own holds and interests, and trusts of all that man is most apt to depend upon, that he may the more expeditiously follow Christ. Hammond.

ABNODATION. n. f. [abnodatio, Lat.] The act of cutting away knots from trees; a term of gardening. Dict.

ABNORMAL. adj. [abnormis, Lat.] out of rule.] Irregular, misshapen. Dict.

ABOARD. adv. [a sea-term, but adopted into common language; derived immediately from the French à bord, as, aller à bord, envoyer à bord. Bord is itself a word of very doubtful original, and perhaps, in its different acceptations, deducible from different roots. Boyd, in the ancient Saxon, signified a house; in which sense, to go aboard, is to take up residence in a ship.]

1. In a ship.

He loudly call'd to such as were aboard,
The little bark unto the shore to draw,
And him to ferry over that deep ford.

Fairy Queen, b. ii. cant. 6.

He might land them, if it pleased him, or otherwise keep them aboard. Sir W. Raleigh's Essay.

2. Into a ship.

When morning rose, I sent my mates to bring:
Supplies of water from a neighbouring spring;
Whilst I the motions of the winds explor'd;
Then summon'd in my crew, and went aboard.

Addison's Ovid's Metamorphoses, b. iii.

ABOIDE. n. f. [from abide.]

1. Habitation, dwelling, place of residence.

But I know thy abode and thy going out, and thy coming in. 2 Kings, xix. 27.

Others may use the ocean as their road,

Only the English make it their abode;
Whose ready sails with every wind can fly,
And make a covenant with th' inconstant sky.

Waller.

2. Stay,

2. Stay, continuance in a place.
Sweet friends, your patience for my long abode;
Not I, but my affairs, have made you wait.

Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.
Making a short abode in Sicily the second time, landing in Italy, and making the war, may be reasonably judged the business but of ten months.

Dryden's Dedication to Æneid.
The woodcocks early visit, and abode
Of long continuance in our temperate clime,
Foretell a liberal harvest. Phillips.

3. To make abode. To dwell, to reside, to inhabit.
Deep in a cave the Sibyl makes abode;
Thence full of fate returns, and of the God.
Dryden's Æneid 6.

To ABO'DE. v. a. [See BODE.] To foretold or foretold; to be a prognostic, to be ominous.
It is taken, with its derivatives, in the sense either of good or ill.

Every man,
After the hideous storm that follow'd, was
A thing inspir'd; and, not consulting, broke
Into a general prophecy, that this tempest,
Dashing the garment of this peace, abode
The sudden breach of it. Shakespeare's Henry VIII.
ABO'DEMENT. n. f. [from To abode.] A secret anticipation of something future; an impression upon the mind of some event to come; prognostication; omen.

I like not this.
For many men that stumble at the threshold,
Are well foretold that danger lurks within.—
—Tush! man, abodements must not now affright
us. Shakespeare's Henry VI. p. iii.

My lord bishop asked him, Whether he had never any secret abodement in his mind? No, replied the duke; but I think some adventure may kill me as well as another man. Wotton.

To ABO'LISH. v. a. [abolere, Latin.]
1. To annul; to make void. Applied to laws or institutions.

For us to abolish what he hath established, were an imputation most intolerable. Hooker, b. iii. § 10.

On the parliament's part it was proposed, that all the bishops, deans, and chapters, might be immediately taken away and abolished. Clar. b. viii.
2. To put an end to, to destroy.

The long continued wars, between the English and the Scots, had then raised invincible jealous-ies and hate, which long continued peace hath since abolished. Sir John Hayward.

That shall Perocles well requite, I wot,
And, with thy blood abolish to reproachful blot.
Fairy Queen.

More destroy'd than they,
We should be quite abolish'd, and expire. Milt.
Or wilt thou thyself
Abolish thy creation, and unmake
For him, what for thy glory thou hast made?
Milton, b. iii. l. 163.

Nor could Vulcanian flame
The fœnch abolish, or the favour tame.
Dryden's Virgil, Geo. iii.

Fermented spirits contract, harden, and consolidate many fibres together, abolishing many canals; especially where the fibres are the tenderest, as in the brain. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

ABO'LISHABLE. adj. [from abolish.] That which may be abolished.

ABO'LISHER. n. f. [from abolish.] He that abolishes.

ABO'LISHMENT. n. f. [from abolish.] The act of abolishing.

The plain and direct way had been to prove, that all such ceremonies, as they require to be abolished, are retained by us with the hurt of the church, or with less benefit than the abolishment of them would bring. Hooker, b. iv.

He should think the abolishment of episcopacy among us, would prove a mighty scandal and corruption to our faith, and manifestly dangerous to our monarchy. Swift's Church of Englandman.

ABOLITION. n. f. [from abolish.] The act of abolishing. This is now more frequently used than abolishment.

From the total abolition of the popular power, may be dated the ruin of Rome: for had the reducing hereof to its ancient condition, proposed by Agrippa, been accepted instead of Mæcena's model, that state might have continued unto this day. Grew's Cosmologia Sacra, b. iii. c. 4.

An apoplexy is a sudden abolition of all the senses, and of all voluntary motion, by the stoppage of the flux and reflux of the animal spirits through the nerves destined for those motions.

Arbuthnot on Diet.
ABO'MINABLE. adj. [abominabilis, Lat.]

1. Hateful, detestable; to be loathed.

This infernal pit
Abominable, accurs'd, the house of woe. Milt.
The queen and ministry might easily redress this abominable grievance, by endeavouring to choose men of virtuous principles.

Swift's Project for the advancement of Religion.
2. Unclean.

The foul that shall touch any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, even that foul shall be cut off from his people. Leviticus, vii. 21.

3. In low and ludicrous language, it is a word of loose and indeterminate censure.

They say you are a melancholy fellow.—I am so; I do love it better than laughing.—Those that are in extremity of either, are abominable fellows, and betray themselves to every modern censure, worse than drunkards.

Shakespeare's As you like it.
ABO'MINABLENESS. n. f. [from abominable.]

The quality of being abominable; hateful-ness, odiousness.

Till we have proved, in its proper place, the eternal and essential difference between virtue and vice, we must forbear to urge atheists with the corruption and abominableness of their principles.

Bentley's Sermons.
ABO'MINABLY. adv. [from abominable.] A word of low or familiar language, signifying excessively, extremely, exceedingly; in an ill sense.

It is not often seriously used.

I have observed great abuses and disorders in your family; your servants are mutinous and quarrelsome, and cheat you most abominably.

Arbuthnot.
To ABO'MINATE. v. a. [abominor, Lat.] To abhor, detest, hate utterly.

Pride goes, hated, curied, and abominated by
all. Hammond.

We are not guilty of your injuries,
No way consent to them; but do abhor,
Abominate, and loath this cruelty.

Southern's Oronoko.
He professed both to abominate and despise all mystery, refinement, and intrigue, either in a prince or minister. Swift.

ABOMINATION. n. f.

1. Hatred, detestation.

To assist king Charles by English or Dutch forces, would render him odious to his new subjects, who have nothing in so great abomination as those whom they hold for heretics. Swift.

2. The object of hatred.

Every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians. Genesis, xlv. 34.

3. Pollution, defilement.

And there shall in no wife enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination, or maketh a lie. Rev. xxi. 27.

4. Wickedness; hateful or shameful vice.

Th' adulterous Antony, most large
In his abominations, turns you off,
And gives his potent regiment to a trull,
That noses it against us

Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra.
5. The cause of pollution.

And the high places that were before Jerusalem, which were on the right hand of the mount of corruption, which Solomon the king of Israel had builded for Ahtoreth the abomination of the Zidonians, and for Chemosh the abomination of the Moabites, and for Milcom the abomination of the children of Ammon, did the king defile.

2 Kings, xxiii. 13.
ABORIGINES, n. f. [Lat.] The earliest inhabitants of a country; those of whom no original is to be traced; as, the Welsh in Britain.

To ABORT. v. n. [abortio, Lat.] To bring forth before the time; to miscarry. Diæ.

ABORTION. n. f. [abortio, Lat.]

1. The act of bringing forth untimely.

These then need cause no abortion. Sandys.

2. The produce of an untimely birth.

His wife miscarried; but, as the abortion proved only a female foetus, he comforted himself.

Arbuthnot and Pope's Martinus Scriblerus.
Behold my arm thus blasted, dry and wither'd,
Shrunk like a foul abortion, and decay'd,
Like some untimely product of the seasons. Rowe.

ABORTIVE. n. f. That which is born before the due time. Perhaps anciently any thing irregularly produced.

No common wind, no custom'd event,
But they will pluck away its nat'ral causes,
And call them meteors, prodigies, and signs,
Abortives, and prefages, tongues of heav'n,
Plainly denouncing vengeance upon John.

Shakespeare's King John.
Take the fine skin of an abortive, and, with starch thin laid on, prepare your ground or tablet.

Peacham on Drawing.
Many are preserved, and do signal service to their country, who, without a provision, might have perished as abortives, or have come to an untimely end, and perhaps have brought, upon their guilty parents, the like destruction.

Addison's Guardian, N° 106.
ABORTIVE. adj. [abortivus, Lat.]

1. That which is brought forth before the due time of birth.

If ever he have 'child, abortive be it,
Prodigious, and untimely brought to light.

Shakespeare's Richard III.
All th' unaccomplish'd works of nature's hand,
Abortive, monstrous, or unkindly mix'd,
Dissolv'd on earth, fleet hither.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. iii. l. 456.
Nor will his fruit expect
Th' autumnal season, but, in summer's pride
When other orchards smile, abortive fall.

Phillips.
2. Figuratively, that which fails for want of time.

How often hast thou waited at my cup,
Remember it, and let it make thee crest-faln;
Ay, and allay this thy abortive pride.

Shakespeare's Henry VI. p. ii.
3. That which brings forth nothing.

The void profound
Of unessential night receives him next,
Wide-gaping; and with utter loss of being
Threatens him, plung'd in that abortive gulf.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. ii. l. 451.
4. That which fails or miscarries, from whatever cause. This is less proper.

Many politic conceptions, so elaborately formed and wrought, and grown at length ripe for delivery, do yet, in the issue, miscarry and prove abortive. South's Sermons.

ABORTIVELY. adv. [from abortive.] Born without the due time; immaturity, untimely.

ABORTIVENESS. n. f. [from abortive.] The state of abortion.

ABORTMENT. n. f. [from abort.] The thing brought forth out of time; an untimely birth.

Concealed treasures, now lost to mankind, shall be brought into use by the industry of converted penitents, whose wretched carcasses the impartial laws dedicate, as untimely feasts, to the worms of the earth, in whose womb those deserted mineral riches must ever lie buried as lost abort- ments, unless those be made the active midwives to deliver them. Bacon's Physical Remains.

ABOVE. prep. [from a, and began, Saxon;
boven, Dutch.]

1. To a higher place; in a higher place.

So when with crackling flames a cauldron fries,
The bubbling waters from the bottom rise;
Above the brims they force their fiery way;
Black vapours climb aloft, and cloud the day.

Dryden, Æneid, vii. l. 643.
2. More

3. More in quantity or number.

Every one that passeth among them, that are numbered from twenty years old and above, shall give an offering unto the Lord. Exodus, xxx. 14.

3. In a superiour degree, or to a superiour degree of rank, power, or excellence.

The Lord is high above all nations, and his glory above the heavens. Psalms cxiii. 4.

The public power of all societies is above every soul contained in the same societies. Hooker, b. i.

There is no riches above a sound body, and no joy above the joy of the heart. Ecclesiastes xxx. 16.

To her

Thou didst resign thy manhood, and the place wherein God set thee above her, made of thee, And for thee: whose perfection far excell'd Her's, in all real dignity.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. x. l. 147.

Latona fees her shine above the rest, And feeds with secret joy her silent breast.

Dryden's Æneid

4. In a state of being superiour to; unattainable by.

It is an old and true distinction, that things may be above our reason, without being contrary to it. Of this kind are the power, the nature, and the universal presence of God, with innumerable other points. Swift

5. Beyond; more than. We were pressed out of measure, above strength; inasmuch that we despaired even of life.

2 Cor. i. 8.

In having thoughts unconfused, and being able to distinguish one thing from another, where there is but the least difference, consists the exactness of judgment and clearness of reason, which is in one man above another. Locke

The inhabitants of Tirol have many privileges above those of the other hereditary countries of the emperor. Addison

6. Too proud for; too high for. A phrase chiefly used in familiar expression.

Kings and princes, in the earlier ages of the world, laboured in arts and occupations, and were above nothing that tended to promote the conveniences of life. Pope's Odyssey; notes.

ABOVE, adv.

1. Over-head; in a higher place.

To men standing below, men standing aloft seem much lessened; to those above, men standing below, seem not so much lessened.

When he established the clouds above; when he strengthened the fountains of the deep; when he gave to the sea his decree, that the waters should not pass his commandment: when he appointed the foundations of the earth: then I was by him, as one brought up with him: and I was daily his delight, rejoicing always before him. Proverbs, viii. 28.

Every good gift, and every perfect gift is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights, with whom is no variableness, neither shadow of turning. James i. 17.

2. In the regions of heaven.

The Trojans from above their foes beheld; And with arm'd legions all the rampires fill'd.

Dryden's Æneid

Your praise the birds shall chant in every grove, And winds shall waft it to the powers above.

Pope's Pastorals

3. Before. [See ABOVE-CITED.]

I said above, that these two machines of the balance, and the dira, were only ornamental, and that the success of the duel had been the same without them. Dryden's Dedication to Æneid

ABOVE ALL. In the first place; chiefly.

I studied Virgil's design, his disposition of it, his manners, his judicious management of the figures, the sober retrenchments of his sense, which always leaves something to gratify our imagination, on which it may enlarge at pleasure; but above all, the elegance of his expression, and the harmony of his numbers.

Dryden's Dedication to the Æneid

ABOVE-BOARD.

1. In open fight; without artifice or trick. A figurative expression, borrowed from gamester, who, when they put their hands under the table, are changing their cards. It is used only in familiar language.

It is the part also of an honest man to deal above-board, and without tricks. L'Estrange

2. Without disguise or concealment.

Though there have not been wanting such heretofore, as have practised these unworthy arts, for as much as there have been villains in all places, and all ages, yet now-a-days they are owned above-board. South's Sermons

ABOVE-CITED. Cited before. A figurative expression, taken from the ancient manner of writing books on scrolls; where whatever is cited or mentioned before in the same page, must be above.

It appears from the authority above-cited, that this is a fact confessed by heathens themselves.

Addison on the Christian Religion

ABOVE-GROUND. An expression used to signify alive; not in the grave.

ABOVE-MENTIONED. See ABOVE-CITED.

I do not remember, that Homer any-where falls into the faults above-mentioned, which were indeed the false refinements of latter ages.

Addison's Spectator, N° 279.

To ABOVE-UND. v. n. [abundo, Lat. abonder, Fr.]

1. To have in great plenty; to be copiously stored. It is used sometimes with the particle in, and sometimes the particle with.

The king becoming graces,

I have no relish of them, but abound

In the division of each several crime, Acting it many ways. Shakspeare's Macbeth

Corn, wine, and oil, are wanting to this ground, In which our countries fruitfully abound.

Dryden's Indian Emperor

A faithful man shall abound with blessings: but he that maketh haste to be rich, shall not be innocent. Proverbs xxviii. 20.

Now that languages are made, and abound with words, standing for combinations, an usual way of getting complex ideas, is by the explication of those terms that stand for them. Locke

2. To be in great plenty.

And because iniquity shall abound, the love of many shall wax cold.

Matthew xxiv. 12.

Words are like leaves, and where they most abound, Much fruit of sense beneath is rarely found.

Pope's Essay on Criticism

ABOUT. prep. [abutari, or abutari, Sax, which seems to signify encircling on the outside.]

1. Round, surrounding, encircling.

Let not mercy and truth forsake thee. Bind them about thy neck; write them upon the table of thy heart. Proverbs iii. 3.

She cries, and tears her cheeks, Her hair, her vest; and, stooping to the sands, About his neck she cast her trembling hands.

Dryden's Fables

2. Near to.

Speak unto the congregation, saying, get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. Exodus

Thou dost nothing, Sergius, Thou canst endeavour nothing, nay, not think; But I both see and hear it; and am with thee, By and before, about and in thee too.

Benj. Jonson's Catiline

3. Concerning, with regard to.

When Constantine had finished an house for the service of God at Jerusalem, the dedication he judged a matter not unworthy, about the solemn performance whereof, the greatest part of the bishops in Christendom should meet together. Hooker

The painter is not to take so much pains about the drapery as about the face where the principal resemblance lies. Dryden

They are most frequently used as words equivalent, and do both of them indifferently signify either a speculative knowledge of things, or a practical skill about them, according to the exigency of the matter or thing spoken of. Tillot's Sermon i.

Theft is always a sin, although the particular species of it, and the denomination of particular acts, doth suppose positive laws about dominion and property. Stillingfleet

Children should always be heard, and fairly and kindly answered, when they ask after any thing they would know, and desire to be informed about. Curiosity should be as carefully cherished in children, as other appetites suppressed. Locke

It hath been practised as a method of making men's court, when they are asked about the rate of lands, the abilities of tenants, the state of trade, to answer, that all things are in a flourishing condition. Swift's short View of Ireland

4. In a state of being engaged in, or employed upon.

Our blessed Lord was pleased to command the representation of his death and sacrifice on the cross should be made by breaking of bread and effusion of wine; to signify to us the nature and sacredness of the liturgy we are about. Taylor

Labour, for labour's sake, is against nature. The understanding, as well as all the other faculties, chooses always the shortest way to its end, would presently obtain the knowledge it is about, and then set upon some new inquiry. But this, whether laziness or haste, often misleads it. Locke

Our armies ought to be provided with secretaries, to tell their story in plain English, and to let us know, in our mother tongue, what it is our brave countrymen are about. Addison's Spectator, N° 309.

5. Appendant to the person; as cloaths.

If you have this about you, As I will give you when we go, you may Boldly assault the necromancer's hall.

Milton's Comus

It is not strange to me, that persons of the fairer sex should like, in all things about them, that handfomeness for which they find themselves most liked. Boyle on Colours

6. Relating to the person, as a servant, or dependant.

Liking very well the young gentleman, such I took him to be, admitted this Deiphantus about me, who well shewed, there is no service like his that serves because he loves. Sidney, b. iii.

7. Relating to person, as an act or office.

Good corporal, for my old dame's sake, stand my friend: she hath no body to do any thing about her when I am gone, and she is old and cannot help herself.

Shakspeare's Henry IV.

ABOUT, adv.

1. Circularly, in a round; circum.

The weyward sisters, hand in hand, Posters of the sea and land,

Thus do go about, about, Thrice to thine, and thrice to mine,

And thrice again to make up nine. Shakspeare's Macbeth

2. In circuit, in compass.

I'll tell you what I am about.—Two yards and more.—No quips now, Pistol: indeed I am in the waste two yards about; but I am about no waste, I am about thrift.

Shakspeare

A tun about was ev'ry pillar there, A polish'd mirror shone not half so clear.

Dryden's Fables

3. Nearly; circiter.

When the boats were come within about sixty yards of the pillar, they found themselves all bound, and could go no farther; yet so as they might move to go about, but might not approach nearer.

Bacon's New Atlantis

4. Here and there; every way; circa.

Up rose the gentle virgin from her place, And looked all about, if she might spy Her lovely knight. Fairy Queen, b. i. cant. ii. Stan. 33.

A wolf that was past labour, in his old age, borrows a habit, and so about he goes, begging charity from door to door, under the disguise of a pilgrim. L'Estrange

5. With to before a verb; as, about to fly; upon the point, within a small distance of.

These dying lovers, and their floating sons, Suspend the fight, and silence all our guns: Beauty and youth, about to perish, finds

Such noble pity in brave English minds. Waller

6. Round; the longest way, in opposition to; the short straight way.

Gold hath these natures; greatness of weight; closeness of parts; fixation; pliancy, or softness;

ness; immunity from rust; colour or tincture of yellow: Therefore the sure way (though most about) to make gold, is to know the causes of the several natures before rehearsed.

Bacon's Natural History, N° 328.

Spies of the Volscians

Held me in chace, that I was forced to wheel
Three or four miles about; else had I, Sir,
Half an hour since brought my report.

Shakespeare's Coriolanus.

7. To bring about; to bring to the point or state desired; as, he has brought about his purposes.

Whether this will be brought about, by breaking his head, I very much question. Spectator.

8. To come about; to come to some certain state or point. It has commonly the idea of revolution or gyration.

Wherefore it came to pass, when the time was come about, after Hannah had conceived, that she bare a son. 1 Samuel i. 20.

One evening it befel, that looking out,
The wind they long had with'd was come about;
Well pleas'd they went to rest; and if the gale
'Till morn continu'd, both resolv'd to fail.

Dryden's Fables.

9. To go about; to prepare to do it.

Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law? Why go ye about to kill me? John vii. 19.

In common language, they say, to come about a man, to circumvent him.

Some of these phrases seem to derive their original from the French à bout; venir à bout d'une chose; venir à bout de quelqu'un.

A Bp. for Archbishop; which see.

ABRACADABRA. A superstitious charm against agues.

To ABRADE. v. a. [abrado, Lat.] To rub off; to wear away from the other parts; to waste by degrees.

By this means there may be a continued supply of what is successively abraded from them by decurion of waters. Hale.

ABRAHAM'S BALM. The name of an herb.

ABRASION. n. f. [See ABRASE.]

1. The act of abrading, or rubbing off.

2. [In medicine.] The wearing away of the natural mucus, which covers the membranes, particularly those of the stomach and guts, by corrosive or sharp medicines, or humours.

Quincy.

3. The matter worn off by the attrition of bodies.

ABREAST. adv. [See BREAST.] Side by side; in such a position that the breasts may bear against the same line.

My cousin Suffolk,

My soul shall thine keep company to heav'n:

Tarry, sweet soul, for mine, then fly abreast.

Shakespeare's Henry V.

For honour travels in a straight so narrow,

Where one but goes abreast.

Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida.

The riders rode abreast, and one his shield,

His lance of cornel wood another held.

Dryden's Fables.

ABRICOT. See APRICOT.

To ABRIDGE. v. a. [abreger, Fr. abbrevio, Lat.]

1. To make shorter in words, keeping still the same substance.

All these sayings, being declared by Jason of Cyrene in five books, we will cloy to abridge in one volume. 2 Macc. ii. 23.

2. To contract, to diminish, to cut short.

The determination of the will, upon inquiry, is following the direction of that guide; and he, that has a power to act or not to act, according as such determination directs, is free. Such determination abridges not that power wherein liberty consists. Locke.

3. To deprive of; to cut off from. In which sense it is followed by the particle from, or of, preceding the thing taken away.

I have disabled mine estate,

By shewing something a more swelling port,

Than my faint means would grant continuance,

Nor do I now make moan to be abridg'd

From such a noble rate. Shakef. Merch. of Ven.

They were formerly, by the common law, discharged from pontage and murage; but this privilege has been abridged them since by several statutes. Ayliffe's Parergon Juris Canonici.

ABRIDGED OF. part. Deprived of, debarred from, cut short.

ABRIDGER. n. f.

1. He that abridges; a shortener.

2. A writer of compendiums or abridgments.

ABRIDGMENT. n. f. [abregement, French.]

1. The epitome of a larger work contracted into a small compass; a compend; a summary.

Surely this commandment containeth the law and the prophets; and, in this one word, is the abridgment of all volumes of scripture.

Hooker, b. ii. § 5.

Idolatry is certainly the first-born of folly, the great and leading paradox; nay, the very abridgment and sum total of all absurdities. South's Sermon.

2. A diminution in general.

All trying, by a love of littleness,

To make abridgments, and to draw to less,

Even that nothing, which at first we were.

Donne.

3. Contraction; reduction.

The constant desire of happiness, and the constraint it puts upon us, nobody, I think, accounts an abridgment of liberty, or at least an abridgment of liberty to be complained of. Locke.

4. Restraint from any thing pleasing; contraction of any thing enjoyed.

It is not barely a man's abridgment in his external accommodations which makes him miserable, but when his conscience shall tell him that it was his sin and his folly which brought him under that abridgment. South.

ABROACH. adv. [See TO BROACH.]

1. In a posture to run out, or yield the liquor contained; properly spoken of vessels.

The jars of gen'rous wine,

He set abroad, and for the feast prepar'd.

Dryd. Virgil.

The Templer spruce, while ev'ry spout's abroad, Stays 'till 'tis fair, yet seems to call a coach.

Swift's Miscel.

2. In a figurative sense; in a state to be diffused or extended, in a state of such beginning as promises a progress.

That man, that sits within a monarch's heart,

And ripens in the sunshine of his favour,

Would he abuse the count'nance of the king,

Alack! what mischiefs might be set abroad,

In shadow of such greatness?

Shakespeare's Henry IV. p. ii.

ABROAD. adv. [compounded of a and broad. See BROAD.]

1. Without confinement; widely; at large.

Intermit no watch

Against a wakeful foe, while I abroad,

Thro' all the coasts of dark destruction seek Deliverance. Milt. Parad. Lost, b. ii. l. 463.

Again, the lonely fox roams far abroad,

On secret rapine bent, and midnight fraud;

Now haunts the cliff, now traverses the lawn,

And flies the hated neighbourhood of man.

Prior.

2. Out of the house.

Welcome, Sir,

This cell's my court; here have I few attendants, And subjects none abroad. Shakef. Tempest.

Lady — walked a whole hour abroad, without dying after it. Pope's Letters.

3. In another country.

They thought it better to be somewhat hardly yoked at home, than for ever abroad, and discredited. Hooker, Pref.

Whoever offers at verbal translation, shall have the misfortune of that young traveller, who lost his own language abroad and brought home no other instead of it. Sir J. Denham.

What learn our youth abroad, but to refine

The homely vices of their native land?

Dryd. Span. Friar.

He who sojourns in a foreign country, refers what he sees and hears abroad, to the state of things at home. Auerb. Sermon.

4. In all directions, this way and that; with wide expansion.

Full in the midst of this infernal road,

An elm displays her dusky arms abroad.

Dryd. Virg. Æn. vi.

5. Without, not within.

Bodies politic, being subject, as much as natural, to dissolution, by divers means, there are undoubtedly more states overthrown through diseases bred within themselves, than through violence from abroad. Hooker, Dedication.

To ABROGATE. v. a. [abrogo, Lat.] To take away from a law its force; to repeal; to annul.

Laws have been made upon special occasions, which occasions ceasing, laws of that kind do abrogate themselves. Hooker, b. iv. § 14.

The negative precepts of men may cease by many instruments, by contrary customs, by publick disrelish, by long omission: but the negative precepts of God never can cease, but when they are expressly abrogated by the same authority.

Taylor's Rule of living holy.

ABROGATION. n. f. [abrogatio, Lat.] The act of abrogating; the repeal of a law.

The commissioners from the confederate Roman catholics, demanded the abrogation and repeal of all those laws, which were in force against the exercise of the Roman religion. Clarendon, b. viii.

To ABROOK. v. a. [from To brook, with a superabundant, a word not in use.] To brook, to bear, to endure.

Sweet Nell, ill can thy noble mind abrook

The abject people gazing on thy face

With envious looks, still laughing at thy shame.

Shakespeare's Henry VI. p. ii.

ABRUPT. adj. [abruptus, Lat. Broken off.]

1. Broken, craggy.

Resistless, roaring, dreadful, down it comes From the rude mountain, and the mossy wild, Tumbling through rocks abrupt. Thomf. Winter.

2. Divided, without any thing intervening.

Or spread his airy flight,

Upborn with indefatigable wings,

Over the vast abrupt, ere he arrive

The happy isle. Milt. Parad. Lost, b. ii. l. 409.

3. Sudden, without the customary or proposed preparatives.

My lady craves

To know the cause of your abrupt departure.

Shakespeare.

The abrupt and unkind breaking off the two first parliaments, was wholly imputed to the Duke of Buckingham. Clarendon.

Abrupt, with eagle-speed she cut the sky;

Instant invisible to mortal eye.

Then first he recogniz'd th' ethereal guest.

Pope's Odyssey, b. i.

4. Unconnected.

The abrupt stile, which hath many breaches, and doth not seem to end but fall. B. Jonson's Discovery.

ABRUPTED. adj. [abruptus, Lat. a word little in use.] Broken off suddenly.

The effects of their activity are not precipitously abrupted, but gradually proceed to their cessations.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. vi. 10.

ABRUPTION. n. f. [abruptio, Lat.] Breaking off, violent and sudden separation.

Those which are inclosed in stone, marble, or such other solid matter, being difficultly separable from it, because of its adhesion to all sides of them, have commonly some of that matter still adhering to them, or at least marks of its abruption from them, on all their sides. Woodw. Nat. Hist. p. 4.

ABRUPTLY. adv. [See ABRUPT.] Hastily, without the due forms of preparation.

The sweetness of virtue's disposition, jealous even over itself, suffered her not to enter abruptly into questions of Musidorus. Sidney, b. ii.

Now missing from their joy so lately found,

So lately found, and so abruptly gone.

Par. Regain, b. ii.

They both of them punctually observed the time thus agreed upon, and that in whatever company or business business they were engaged, they left it abruptly, as soon as the clock warned them to retire.

ABS

Addison, Spectator, N° 241.

ABRUPTNESS. n. f. [from abrupt.]

1. An abrupt manner, haste, suddenness, untimely vehemence.

2. The state of an abrupt or broken thing; roughness, cragginess; as of a fragment violently disjoined.

The crystallized bodies found in the perpendicular intervals, have always their root, as the jewellers call it, which is only the abruptness, at the end of the body whereby it adhered to the stone, or sides of the intervals; which abruptness is caused by its being broke off from the said stone.

Woodw. Nat. Hist. p. 4.

ABSCISS. n. f. [abscissus, Lat.] A morbid cavity in the body; a tumour filled with matter; a term of chirurgery.

If the patient is not relieved, nor dies in eight days, the inflammation ends in a suppuration and an abscess in the lungs, and sometimes in some other part of the body.

Arbuth. of Diet.

Lindanus conjectured it might be some hidden abscess in the mesentery, which, breaking some few days after, was discovered to be an apostem of the mesentery.

Harvey on Consumptions.

TO ABSCIND. v. a. To cut off, either in a natural or figurative sense.

ABSCISSA. [Lat.] Part of the diameter of a conic section, intercepted between the vertex and a semi-ordinate.

ABSCISSION. n. f. [abscissio, Lat.]

1. The act of cutting off.

Fabricius ab Aquapendente renders the abscission of them difficult enough, and not without danger.

Wifeman's Surgery.

2. The state of being cut off.

By cessation of oracles, with Montacutius, we may understand this intercession, not abscission, or consummate defolation.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. vi. c. 12.

TO ABSCOND. v. n. [abscondo, Lat.] To hide one's self; to retire from the public view: generally used of persons in debt, or criminals eluding the law.

The marmotte or mus alpinus which absconds all winter, lives on its own fat: for in autumn when it shuts itself up in its hole, it is very fat; but in the spring-time, when it comes forth again very lean.

Ray on the Creation.

ABSCONDER. n. f. [from abscond.] The person that absconds.

ABSENCE. n. f. [See ABSENT.]

1. The state of being absent, opposed to presence.

Sir, 'tis fit

You have strong party to defend yourself By calmness, or by absence: all's in danger.

Shakespeare's Coriolanus.

His friends beheld, and pity'd him in vain, For what advice can ease a lover's pain? Absence, the best expedient they could find, Might save the fortune, if not cure the mind.

Dryden's Fables.

You have given no dissertation upon the absence of lovers, nor laid down any methods how they should support themselves under those separations.

Addison, Spectator, N° 241.

2. Want of appearance, in the legal sense.

Absence is of a fourfold kind or species. The first is a necessary absence, as in banished persons; this is entirely necessary. A second, necessary and voluntary; as, upon the account of the commonwealth, or in the service of the church. The third kind the civilians call a probable absence; as, that of students on the score of study. And the fourth, an absence entirely voluntary; as, on the account of trade, merchandize, and the like. Some add a fifth kind of absence, which is committed cum dolo & culpa, by a man's non-appearance on a citation; as, in a contumacious person, who, in hatred to his contumacy, is, by the law, in some respects, reputed as a person present.

Ayliffe's Parergon Juris Canonici.

3. Inattention, heedlessness, neglect of the present object.

ABS

I continued my walk, reflecting on the little absences and distractions of mankind.

Addison, Spectator, N° 77.

4. It is used with the particle from.

His absence from his mother off he'll mourn, And, with his eyes, look wishes to return.

Dryden's Juv. Sat. ii.

ABSENT. adj. [absens, Lat.]

1. Not present: used with the particle from.

In spring the fields, in autumn hills I love; At morn the plains, at noon the shady grove; But Delia always: absent from her sight, Nor plains at morn, nor groves at noon delight.

Pope's Past.

Where there is advantage to be given, Both more and less have given him the revolt; And none serve with him but constrained things, Whose hearts are absent too.

Shakef. Macbeth.

Whether they were absent or present, they were vexed alike.

Wisd. xi. 11.

2. Absent in mind, inattentive; regardless of the present object.

I distinguish a man that is absent, because he thinks of something else, from him that is absent, because he thinks of nothing.

Addison, Spectator, N° 77.

TO ABSENT. v. a. To withdraw, to forbear to come into presence.

If thou didst ever hold me in thy heart,

Absent thee from felicity a while,

And in this harsh world draw thy breath in pain,

To tell my tale.

Shakespeare's Hamlet.

Go—for thy stay, not free, absents the more.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. ix. l. 372.

Tho' I am forc'd thus to absent myself

From all I love, I shall contrive some means,

Some friendly intervals, to visit thee.

Southern's Spartan Dame.

The Arengo is still called together in cafes of importance; and if, after due summons, any member absents himself, he is to be fined to the value of about a penny English.

Addison's Remarks on Italy.

ABSENTA'NEOUS. adj. Relating to absence; absent.

Dict.

ABSENTEE. n. f. He that is absent from his station or employment, or country. A word used commonly with regard to Irishmen living out of their country.

Then was the first statute made against absentees, commanding all such as had land in Ireland, to return and reside thereupon.

Sir John Davies on Ireland.

A great part of estates in Ireland are owned by absentees, and such as draw over the profits raised out of Ireland, refunding nothing.

ABSINTHIATED. part. [from absinthium, Lat.] wormwood.] Imbittered, impregnated with wormwood.

Dict.

TO ABST. v. n. [abstho, Lat.] To stand off, to leave off.

Dict.

TO ABSOLVE. v. a. [absolvo, Lat.]

1. To clear, to acquit of a crime in a judicial sense.

Your great goodness, out of holy pity,

Absolve'd him with an axe.

Shakef. Henry VIII.

Our victors, blest in peace, forget their wars,

Enjoy past dangers, and absolve the stars.

Tickell.

As he hopes, and gives out, by the influence of his wealth, to be here absolved; in condemning this man, you have an opportunity of belying that general scandal, of redeeming the credit lost by former judgments.

Swift's Miscellanies.

2. To set free from an engagement or promise.

Compell'd by threats to take that bloody oath,

And the act ill, I am absolve'd by both.

Waller's Maid's Tragedy.

This command, which must necessarily comprehend the persons of our natural fathers, must mean a duty we owe them, distinct from our obedience to the magistrate, and from which the most absolute power of princes cannot absolve us.

Locke.

3. To pronounce sin remitted, in the ecclesiastical sense.

But all is calm in this eternal sleep;

Here grief forgets to groan, and love to weep;

ABS

Ev'n superstition loses ev'ry fear; For God, not man, absolves our frailties here.

Pope's Eloisa to Abelard.

4. To finish, to complete. This use is not common.

What cause

Mov'd the creator, in his holy rest

Through all eternity, so late to build

In chaos; and the work begun, how soon

Absolve'd. Milt. Parad. Lost, b. vii. l. 94.

If that which is so supposed infinitely distant from what is now current, is distant from us by a finite interval, and not infinitely, then that one circulation which preceded it, must necessarily be like ours, and consequently absolved in the space of twenty-four hours.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

ABSOLUTE. adj. [absolutus, Lat.]

1. Complete; applied as well to persons as things. Because the things that proceed from him are perfect, without any manner of defect or main; it cannot be but that the words of his mouth are absolute, and lack nothing which they should have, for performance of that thing whereunto they tend.

Hooker, b. ii. § 6.

What is his strength by land?—

—Great and increasing: but by sea

He is an absolute master.

Shakef. Ant. and Cleop.

2. Unconditional; as an absolute promise.

Although it runs in forms absolute, yet it is indeed conditional, as depending upon the qualification of the person to whom it is pronounced.

South's Sermons.

3. Not relative; as, absolute space.

I see still the distinctions of sovereign and inferior, of absolute and relative worship, will bear any man out in the worship of any creature with respect to God, as well at least as it doth in the worship of images.

Stilllingfl. Def. of Disc. on Rom. Idol.

An absolute mode is that which belongs to its subject, without respect to any other beings whatsoever: but a relative mode is derived from the regard that one being has to others.

Watts's Logic.

In this sense we speak of the ablative case absolute in grammar.

4. Not limited; as absolute power.

My crown is absolute, and holds of none;

I cannot in a base subjection live,

Nor suffer you to take, tho' I would give.

Dryden's Indian Emperor.

5. Positive; certain; without any hesitation. In this sense it rarely occurs.

Long is it since I saw him,

But time hath nothing blurr'd those lines of favour, Which then he wore; the snatches in his voice, And burst of speaking were as his: I'm absolute

'Twas very Cloten.

Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

ABSOLUTELY. adv. [from absolute.]

1. Completely, without restriction.

All the contradictions which grow in those minds, that neither absolutely climb the rock of virtue, nor freely sink into the sea of vanity.

Sidney.

What merit they can build upon having joined with a protestant army, under a king they acknowledge, to defend their own liberties and properties, is, to me, absolutely inconceivable; and, I believe, will equally be so for ever.

Swift's Prefb. Plea.

2. Without relation; in a state unconnected.

Absolutely we cannot discommend, we cannot absolutely approve either willingness to live, or forwardness to die.

Hooker, b. v.

These then being the perpetual causes of zeal; the greatest good, or the greatest evil; either absolutely so in themselves, or relatively so to us; it is therefore good to be zealously affected for the one against the other.

Sprat's Sermons.

No sensible quality, as light, and colour, and heat, and sound, can be subsistent in the bodies themselves, absolutely considered, without a relation to our eyes and ears, and other organs of sense. These qualities are only the effects of our sensation, which arise from the different motions, upon our nerves, from objects without, according to their various modifications and positions.

Bentley's Sermons.

3. Without limits or dependance.

Vol. I. N° 2.

C

The

The prince long time had courted fortune's love,
But, once possess'd, did absolutely reign:
Thus, with their Amazons, the heroes strove,
And conquer'd first those beauties they would gain.

Dryden's Annus Mirabilis.

4. Without condition.

And of that nature, for the most part, are things absolutely unto all men's salvation necessary, either to be held or denied, either to be done or avoided.

Hobbes's Preface.

5. Peremptorily, positively.

Being as I am, why didst not thou
Command me absolutely not to go,
Going into such danger, as thou saidst?

Paradise Lost, b. ix.

ABSOLUTENESS. n. f. [from absolute.]

1. Completeness.

2. Freedom from dependance, or limits.

The absoluteness and illimitedness of his commission was generally much spoken of.

Clarendon, b. viii.

There is nothing that can raise a man to that generous absoluteness of condition, as neither to cringe, to fawn, or to depend meanly; but that which gives him that happiness within himself, for which men depend upon others.

South's Ser.

3. Despoticism.

He kept a strait hand on his nobility, and chose rather to advance clergymen and lawyers, which were more obsequious to him, but had less interest in the people, which made for his absoluteness, but not for his safety.

Bacon's Henry VII.

They dress up power with all the splendor and temptation absoluteness can add to it.

Locke.

ABSOLUT'ION. n. f. [from absolutio, Lat.]

1. Acquittal.

Absolution, in the civil law, imports a full acquittal of a person by some final sentence of law; also, a temporary discharge of his farther attendance upon a mesne process, through a failure or defect in pleading; as it does likewise in the canon law, where, and among divines, it likewise signifies a relaxation of him from the obligation of some sentence pronounced either in a court of law, or else in foro penitentiali. Thus there is, in this kind of law, one kind of absolution, termed judicial, and another, styled a declaratory or extrajudicial absolution.

Ayliffe's Parergon Juris Can.

2. The remission of sins, or penance, declared by ecclesiastical authority.

The absolution pronounced by a priest, whether papist or protestant, is not a certain infallible ground to give the person, so absolved, confidence towards God.

South's Sermons.

ABSOLUTORY. adj. [from absolutorius, Lat.] That which absolves.

Though an absolutory sentence should be pronounced in favour of the persons, upon the account of nearness of blood; yet, if adultery shall afterwards be truly proved, he may be again proceeded against as an adulterer.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

ABSONANT. adj. [See absonus.] Contrary to reason, wide from the purpose.

ABSONOUS. adj. [from absonus Lat. ill-sounding.] Absurd, contrary to reason. It is not much in use, and it may be doubted whether it should be followed by to or from.

To suppose an uniter of a middle constitution, that should partake of some of the qualities of both, is unwarranted by any of our faculties; yea, most absonous to our reason.

Glanville's Scopsis Scientifica, c. 4.

TO ABSORB. v. a. [from absorbo, Lat. preter. absorpsi; part. pret. absorpsi, or absorpt.]

1. To swallow up.

Moses imputed the deluge to the disruption of the abyss; and St. Peter to the particular constitution of that earth, which made it obnoxious to be absorpt in water.

Burn's Theory.

Some tokens shew

Of fearless friendship, and their sinking mates
Sustain; vain love, tho' laudable, absorpt
By a fierce eddy, they together found
The vast profundity.

Phillips.

2. To suck up. See ABSORBENT.

The evils that come of exercise are that it doth absorb and attenuate the moisture of the body.

Bacon.

Supposing the forementioned consumption should prove so durable, as to absorb and extenuate the said sanguine parts to an extreme degree, it is evident, that the fundamental parts must necessarily come into danger.

Harvey on Consumption.

While we perspire, we absorb the outward air.

Arbutnot.

ABSORBENT. n. f. [from absorbens, Lat.]

A medicine that, by the softness or porosity of its parts, either causes the asperities of pungent humours, or dries away superfluous moisture in the body.

Quincy.

There is a third class of substances, commonly called absorbents; as, the various kinds of stells, coral, chalk, crabs eyes, &c. which likewise raise an effervescence with acids, and are therefore called alkalis, though not so properly, for they are not salts.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

ABSORPT. part. [from absorb.] Swallowed up; used as well, in a figurative sense, of persons, as, in the primitive, of things.

What can you expect from a man, who has not talked these five days? who is withdrawing his thoughts, as far as he can, from all the present world, its customs and its manners, to be fully possessed and absorpt in the past.

Pope's Letters.

ABSORPTION. n. f. [from absorb.] The act of swallowing up.

It was below the dignity of those sacred penmen, or the Spirit of God that directed them, to shew us the causes of this disruption, or of this absorption; this is left to the inquiries of men.

Burnet's Theory of the Earth.

TO ABSTAIN. v. n. [from abstineo, Lat.] To forbear, to deny one's self any gratification; with the particle from.

If thou judge it hard and difficult,
Converting, looking, loving, to abstain

From love's due rites, nuptial embraces sweet;
And, with desires, to languish without hope.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. x. l. 993.

To be perpetually longing, and impatiently desirous of any thing, so that a man cannot abstain from it, is to lose a man's liberty, and to become a servant of meat and drink, or smoke.

Taylor's Rule of living holy.

Even then the doubtful billows scarce abstain
From the toss'd vessel on the troubled main.

Dryden's Virgil.

ABSTEMIOUS. adj. [from abstemius, Lat.] Temperate, sober, abstinent, refraining from excess or pleasures. It is used of persons; as, an abstemious hermit; and of things; as, an abstemious diet. It is spoken likewise of things that cause temperance.

The instances of longevity are chiefly amongst the abstemious. Abstinence in extremity will prove a mortal disease; but the experiments of it are very rare.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

Clytorean streams the love of wine expel,
(Such is the virtue of th' abstemious well)
Whether the colder nymph that rules the flood
Extinguishes, and balks the drunken god:
Or that Melampus (to have some assur'd)
When the mad Pretides with charms he cur'd,
And pow'ful herbs, both charms and simples cast
Into the sober spring, where still their virtues last.

Dryden's Fables.

ABSTEMIOUSLY. adv. [from abstemious.] Temperately, soberly, without indulgence.

ABSTEMIOUSNESS. n. f. [See ABSTEMIOUS.] The quality of being abstemious.

ABSTENTION. n. f. [from abstineo, Lat.] The act of holding off, or restraining; restraint.

TO ABSTERGE. v. a. [from abstergo, Lat.] To cleanse by wiping; to wipe.

ABSTERGENT. adj. Cleansing; having a cleansing quality.

TO ABSTERSE. [See ABSTERGE.] To cleanse, to purify; a word very little in use, and less analogous than absterge.

Nor will we affirm, that iron receiveth, in the stomach of the ostrich no alteration; but we suffer this effect rather from corrosion than digestion; not any tendency to chification by the natural heat, but rather some attrition from an acid and vitriolous humidity in the stomach, which may absterse and shave the scoriaceous parts thereof.

Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. iii.

ABSTERSION. n. f. [from absterse, Lat.] The act of cleansing. See ABSTERGE.

Absterse is plainly a scouring off, or incision of the more viscous humours, and making the humours more fluid, and cutting between them and the part; as is found in nitrous water, which scoureth linen cloth speedily from the foulness.

Bacon's Natural History, N° 42.

ABSTERSIVE. adj. [from absterge.] That has the quality of absterging or cleansing.

It is good, after purging, to use apozemes and broths, not so much opening as those used before purging; but abstersive and mundifying clysters also are good to conclude with, to draw away the reliques of the humours.

Bacon's Natural Hist.

A tablet stood of that abstersive tree,
Where Aethiops fwarthy bird did build to nest.

Sir John Denham.

There, many a flow'r abstersive grew,
Thy fav'rite flow'rs of yellow hue.

Swift's Miscellanies.

ABSTINENCE. n. f. [from abstinencia, Lat.]

1. Forbearance of any thing; with the particle from.

Because the abstinence from a present pleasure, that offers itself, is a pain, nay, oftentimes a very great one: it is no wonder that that operates after the same manner pain does, and lessens, in our thoughts, what is future; and so forces us, as it were, blindfold into its embraces.

Locke.

2. Fasting, or forbearance of necessary food. It is generally distinguished from temperance, as the greater degree from the less; sometimes as single performances from habits; as, a day of abstinence, and a life of temperance.

Say, can you fast? your stomachs are too young:

And abstinence ingenders maladies.

Shakespeare's Love's Lab. Lost.

And the faces of them, which have used abstinence, shall shine above the stars; whereas our faces shall be blacker than darkness.

2 Esdras, vii. 55.

Religious men, who hither must be sent
As awful guides of heavenly government;
To teach you penance, fasts, and abstinence,
To punish bodies for the soul's offence.

Dryden's Ind. Emp.

ABSTINENCY. n. f. The same with ABSTINENCE.

Were our rewards for the abstinencies, or riots, of this present life, under the prejudices of short or finite, the promises and threats of Christ would lose much of their virtue and energy.

Hammond's Fundam.

ABSTINENT. adj. [from abstinens, Lat.] That uses abstinence, in opposition to covetous, rapacious, or luxurious. It is used chiefly of persons.

ABSTORTED. adj. [from abstortus, Lat.] Forced away, wrung from another by violence.

DiG.

TO ABSTRACT. v. a. [from abstrahere, Lat.]

1. To take one thing from another.

Could we abstract from these pernicious effects; and suppose this were innocent, it would be too light to be matter of praise.

Decay of Piety.

2. To separate by distillation.

Having dephlegmed spirit of salt, and gently abstracted the whole spirit, there remaineth in the retort a styptical substance.

Boyle.

3. To separate ideas.

Those who cannot distinguish, compare, and abstract, would hardly be able to understand and make use of language, or judge or reason to any tolerable degree.

Locke.

4. To reduce to an epitome.

If we would fix in the memory the discourses we hear, or what we design to speak, let us abstract them into brief compends, and review them often.

Watts's Imp. of the Mind.

ABSTRACT. adj. [from abstractus, Lat. See the verb TO ABSTRACT.]

1. Separated

1. Separated from something else; generally used with relation to mental perceptions; as, abstract mathematics, abstract terms, in opposition to concrete.

Mathematics, in its latitude, is usually divided into pure and mixed. And though the pure do handle only abstract quantity in general, as geometry, arithmetic; yet that which is mixed, doth consider the quantity of some particular determinate subject. So astronomy handles the quantity of heavenly motions, music of sounds, and mechanics of weights and powers.

Wilkins's Mathematical Magick.

Abstract terms signify the mode or quality of a being, without any regard to the subject in which it is; as, whiteness, roundness, length, breadth, wisdom, mortality, life, death.

Watts's Logic.

2. With the particle from.

Another fruit from the considering things in themselves, abstract from our opinions and other men's notions and discourses on them, will be, that each man will pursue his thoughts in that method, which will be most agreeable to the nature of the thing, and to his apprehension of what it suggests to him.

Locke.

ABSTRACT. n. f. [from the verb.]

1. A smaller quantity, containing the virtue or power of a greater.

You shall there find a man, who is the abstract Of all faults all men follow. Shakesp. Ant. and Cleo.

If you are false, these epithets are small;

You're then the things, and abstract of them all.

Dryd. Aur.

2. An epitome made by taking out the principal parts.

When Mnemon came to the end of a chapter, he recollected the sentiments he had remarked; so that he could give a tolerable analysis and abstract of every treatise he had read, just after he had finished it.

Watts's Imp. of the Mind.

3. The state of being abstracted, or disjointed.

The hearts of great princes, if they be considered, as it were in abstract, without the necessity of states, and circumstances of time, can take no full and proportional pleasure in the exercise of any narrow bounty.

Wotton.

ABSTRACTED. part. adj. [from abstract.]

1. Separated; disjointed.

That space the evil one abstracted stood From his own evil, and for the time remain'd Stupidly good.

Milton.

2. Refined, purified.

Abstracted spiritual love, they like Their souls exhal'd.

Dante.

3. Abstruse; difficult.

4. Absent of mind, inattentive to present objects; as, an abstracted scholar.

ABSTRACTEDLY. adv. With abstraction, simply, separately from all contingent circumstances. Or whether more abstractedly we look,

Or on the writers, or the written book: Whence, but from heav'n, could men unskill'd in arts,

In several ages born, in several parts, Weave such agreeing truths? or how, or why Should all conspire to cheat us with a lie? Unask'd their pains, ungrateful their advice, Starving their gain, and martyrdom their price.

Dryden's Religio Laici.

ABSTRACTION. n. f. [from abstract, Lat.]

1. The act of abstracting.

The word abstraction signifies a withdrawing some part of an idea from other parts of it; by which means such abstracted ideas are formed, as neither represent any thing corporeal or spiritual; that is, any thing peculiar or proper to mind or body.

Watts's Logic.

2. The state of being abstracted.

3. Absence of mind; inattention.

4. Disregard of worldly objects.

A hermit wishes to be praised for his abstraction.

Pope's Let.

ABSTRACTIVE. adj. [from abstract.] Having the power or quality of abstracting.

ABSTRACTLY. adv. [from abstract.] In an abstract manner; absolutely, without reference to any thing else.

Matter abstractly and absolutely considered, cannot have born an infinite duration now past and expired.

Bentley's Sermons.

ABSTRACTNESS. n. f. [from abstract.] Subtlety; separation from all matter or common notion.

I have taken some pains to make plain and familiar to your thoughts, truths, which established prejudice, or the abstractness of the ideas themselves, might render difficult.

Locke.

ABSTRACTED. part. adj. [from abstract, Lat.] Unbound.

To ABSTRACT. v. a. To unbind.

DiC.

To ABSTRUDE. v. a. [from abstrudo, Lat.] To thrust off, or pull away.

DiC.

ABSTRUSE. adj. [from abstrusus, Lat. thrust out of sight.]

1. Hidden.

Th' eternal eye whose sight discerns Abstruse thoughts, from forth his holy mount, And from within the golden lamps that burn Nightly before him, saw, without their light, Rebellion rising.

Milt. Parad. Lost, b. v. l. 712

2. Difficult; remote from conception or apprehension. It is opposed to obvious and easy.

So spake our Sire, and by his count'nance, seem'd Ent'ring on studious thoughts abstruse.

Paradise Lost, b. viii.

The motions and figures within the mouth are abstruse, and not easy to be distinguished, especially those of the tongue, which is moved through the help of many muscles, so easily, and habitually, and variously, that we are scarce able to give a judgment of motions and figures thereby framed.

Holder.

No man could give a rule of the greatest beauties, and the knowledge of them was so abstruse, that there was no manner of speaking which could express them.

Dryd. Dufresnoy.

ABSTRUSELY. adv. In an abstruse manner; obscurely, not plainly, or obviously.

ABSTRUSENESS. n. f. [from abstruse.] The quality of being abstruse; difficulty, obscurity. It is not oftentimes so much what the scripture says, as what some men persuade others it says, that makes it seem obscure, and that as to some other passages that are so indeed, since it is the *abstruse*ness of what is taught in them, that makes them almost inevitably so; it is little less saucy, upon such a score, to find fault with the style of the scripture, than to do so with the author for making us but men.

Boyle on the Scripture.

ABSTRUSITY. n. f. [from abstruse.]

1. Abstruse.

2. That which is abstruse. A word seldom used. Authors are also suspicious, nor greedily to be swallowed, who pretend to write of secrets, to deliver antipathies, sympathies, and the occult abstrusities of things.

Brown's Vul. Err.

To ABSUME. v. a. [from absumo, Lat.] To bring to an end by a gradual waste; to eat up. An uncommon word.

That which had been burning an infinite time could never be burnt, no not so much as any part of it; for if it had burned part after part, the whole must needs be absumed in a portion of time.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

ABSURD. adj. [from absurdus, Lat.]

1. Unreasonable; without judgment, as used of men.

Seeming wise men may make shift to get opinion; but let no man chuse them for employment; for certainly you had better take for business a man somewhat absurd, than over formal.

Bacon.

A man, who cannot write with wit on a proper subject, is dull and stupid; but one, who shews it in an improper place, is as impertinent and absurd.

Addison. Spectator, No. 291.

2. Inconsistent, contrary to reason, used of sentiments or practices.

The thing itself appeared desirable to him, and accordingly he could not but like and desire it; but then, it was after a very irrational absurd way, and contrary to all the methods and principles of a rational agent; which never wills a thing really and properly, but it applies to the means, by which it is to be acquired.

South's Sermons.

But grant that those can conquer, these can cheat, 'Tis phrase absurd to call a villain great: Who wickedly is wise, or mally brave, Is but the more a fool, the more a knave.

Pope's Essay on Man.

ABSURDITY. n. f. [from absurd.]

1. The quality of being absurd; want of judgment, applied to men; want of propriety, applied to things.

How clear forever this idea of the infinity of number be, there is nothing more evident than the absurdity of the actual idea of an infinite number.

Locke.

2. That which is absurd; as, his travels are full of absurdities. In which sense it has a plural.

That satisfaction we receive from the opinion of some pre-eminence in ourselves, when we see the absurdities of another, or when we reflect on any past absurdities of our own.

Addison.

ABSURDLY. adv. [from absurd.] After an absurd manner; improperly; unreasonably.

But man we find the only creature, Who, led by folly, combats nature;

Who, when the loudly cries, Forbear, With obstinacy fixes there;

And where his genius least inclines, Absurdly bends his whole designs.

Swift's Myf.

We may proceed yet further with the atheist, and convince him, that not only his principle is absurd, but his consequences also as absurdly deduced from it.

Bentley's Sermons.

ABSURDNESS. n. f. [from absurd.] The quality of being absurd; injudiciousness; impropriety. See ABSURDITY; which is more frequently used.

ABUNDANCE. n. f. [from abundantia, Fr.]

1. Plenty; a sense chiefly poetical. At the whisper of thy word, Crown'd abundance spreads my board.

Crowd's abundance spreads my board. Grasshew.

The doubled charge his subjects' love supplies, Who, in that bounty, to themselves are kind;

So glad Egyptians see their Nilus rise, And, in his plenty, their abundance find.

Dryden's Ann. Mir.

2. Great numbers.

The river Inn is shut up between mountains, covered with woods of fir-trees. Abundance of peasants are employed in hewing down the largest of these trees, that, after they are barked and cut into shape, are tumbled down.

Addison on Italy.

3. A great quantity.

Their chief enterprise was the recovery of the Holy land; in which worthy, but extremely difficult, action, it is lamentable to remember what abundance of noble blood hath been shed, with very small benefit unto the Christian state.

Sir Walter Raleigh's Essays.

4. Exuberance, more than enough.

For well I wot, most mighty sovereigns, That all this famous antique history, Of some, th' abundance of an idle brain, Will judged be, and painted forgery.

Spenser.

ABUNDANT. adj. [from abundans, Lat.]

1. Plentiful.

Good, the more Communicated, more abundant grows; The author not impair'd, but honour'd more.

Paradise Lost, b. v.

2. Exuberant.

If the vessels are in a state of too great rigidity, so as not to yield, a strong projectile motion occasions their rupture, and hemorrhages; especially in the lungs, where the blood is abundant.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

3. Fully stored. It is followed sometimes by in, commonly by with.

The world began but some ages before these were found out, and was abundant with all things at first; and men not very numerous; and therefore were not put so much to the use of their wits, to find out ways for living commodiously.

Burnet.

4. It is applied generally to things, sometimes to persons.

The Lord, the Lord God, merciful and gracious, long suffering, and abundant in goodness and truth.

Exodus, xxxiv. 6.

Abund.

ABUNDANTLY. adv. [from abundant.]
1. In plenty.
Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life. Genesis, i. 20.

God on thee
Abundantly his gifts hath also pour'd;
Inward and outward both, his image fair.

Paradise Lost, b. viii.
2. Amply, liberally, more than sufficiently.
Ye saw the French tongue abundantly purified.

Sprat.
Heroic poetry has ever been esteemed the greatest work of human nature. In that rank has Aristotle placed it; and Longinus is so full of the like expressions, that he abundantly confirms the other's testimony.

Dryden's State of Innocence, Pref.
What the example of our equals wants of authority, is abundantly supplied in the imaginations of friendship, and the repeated influences of a constant conversation. Rogers's Sermons.

To ABUSE. v. a. [abutor, abusus, Lat.]
In abuse the verb, f has the sound of z; in the noun, the common sound.

1. To make an ill use of.
They that use this world, as not abusing it; for the fashion of this world passeth away.

1 Cor. vii. 31.
He has fixed and determined the time for our repentance, beyond which he will no longer await the perverseness of men, no longer suffer his compassion to be abused. Rogers's Sermons.

2. To violate; to defile.
Arachne figured how Jove did abuse
Europa like a bull, and on his back
Her through the sea did bear. Spenser.

3. To deceive; to impose upon.
He perhaps,
Out of my weakness and my melancholy,
As he is very potent with such spirits,
Abuses me to damn me. Shakesp. Hamlet.

The world hath been much abused by the opinion of making gold: the work itself I judge to be possible; but the means hitherto propounded, are, in the practice, full of error.

Bacon's Natural History, N^o. 126
It imports the misrepresentation of the qualities of things and actions, to the common apprehensions of men, abusing their minds with false notions; and so, by this artifice, making evil pass for good, and good for evil, in all the great concerns of life. South's Sermons.

Nor be with all these tempting words abus'd;
These tempting words were all to Sappho us'd.

Pope.
4. To treat with rudeness; to reproach.
I am no strumpet, but of life as honest
As you that thus abuse me. Shakesp. Othello.
But he mocked them, and laughed at them,
and abused them shamefully, and spake proudly.

1 Mac. vii. 34.
Some praise at morning what they blame at night,
But always think the last opinion right.
A muse by these is like a mistress us'd,
This hour she's idoliz'd, the next abus'd.

Pope's Essay on Criticism.
The next criticism seems to be introduced for no other reason, but to mention Mr. Bickerstaff, whom the author every where endeavours to imitate and abuse. Addison.

ABUSERS. n. s. [from the verb abuse.]
1. The ill use of any thing.
The casting away things profitable for the sustenance of man's life, is an unthankful abuse of the fruits of God's providence towards mankind. Hooker, b. v. § 9.

Little knows
Any, but God alone, to value right
The good before him, but perverts best things
To worst abuse, or to their meanest use.

Paradise Lost, b. iv.
2. A corrupt practice; bad custom.
The nature of things is such, that, if abuses be not remedied, they will certainly increase.

Swift for Advancement of Religion.

3. Seducement.
Was it not enough for him to have deceived me, and, through the deceit abused me, and, after the abuse, forsaken me, but that he must now, of all the company, and before all the company, lay want of beauty to my charge.

Sidney, b. ii.
4. Unjust, censure, rude reproach, contumely.
I dark in light, expos'd
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse, and wrong.

Samf. Agon.
ABUSERS. n. s. [from the verb abuse.]
1. He that makes an ill use.

2. He that deceives.
Next thou, th' abuser of thy prince's ear.

Denb. Sophy.
3. He that reproaches with rudeness.
4. A ravisher, a violator.

ABUSIVE. adj. [from abuse.]
1. Practising abuse.
The tongue moved gently first, and speech was low,

Till wrangling science taught it noise and show,
And wicked wit arose, thy most abusive foe.

Pope's Miscellanies.
Dame Nature, as the learned show,
Provides each animal its foe;

Hounds hunt the hare, the wily fox
Devours your geese, the wolf your flocks.
Thus envy pleads a natural claim,
To persecute the muse's fame,

On poets in all times abusive,
From Homer down to Pope inclusive.

Swift's Miscellanies.
2. Containing abuse; as, an abusive lampoon.
Next, Comedy appear'd with great applause,
Till her licentious and abusive tongue
Waken'd the magistrates coercive pow'r.

Roscommon.
3. Deceitful; a sense little used, yet not improper.
It is verified by a number of examples, that whatsoever is gained by an abusive treaty, ought to be restored in integrum.

Bacon's Considerations on War with Spain.
ABUSIVELY. adv. [from abuse.]
1. Improperly, by a wrong use.

The oil, abusively called spirit, of roses swims at the top of the water, in the form of a white butter; which I remember not to have observed in any other oil drawn in any limbeck.

Boyle's Sceptical Chymist.
2. Reproachfully.
ABUSIVENESS. n. s. [from abuse.] The quality of being abusive; foulness of language.

Pick out of mirth, like stones out of thy ground,
Profaneness, filthiness, abusiveness.
These are the scum, with which coarse wits abound:

The fine may spare these well, yet not go less.

Herbert.
To ABUT. v. n. obsolete, [aboutir, to touch at the end, Fr.] To end at, to border upon; to meet, or approach to, with the particle upon.

Two mighty monarchies,
Whose high upreared and abutting fronts
The narrow perilous ocean parts asunder.

Shakespeare's Henry V.
The Loos are two several corporations, distinguished by the addition of east and west, abutting upon a navigable creek, and joined by a fair bridge of many arches.

Carew.
ABUTTAL. n. s. [from abut.] The butting or boundaries of any land. A writing declaring on what lauds, highways, or other places, it does abut.

ABUTMENT. n. s. [from abut.] That which abuts, or borders upon another.

ABYSM. n. s. [abyssus, old Fr. now written contractedly abime.] A gulf; the same with abyss.

My good stars, that were my former guides,
Have empty left their orbs, and shot their fires
Into the abysm of hell. Shakesp. Ant. and Cleop.

ABYSS. n. s. [abyssus, Lat. Abussus, bottomless, Gr.]

1. A depth without bottom.

Who shall tempt with wand'ring feet
The dark, unbottom'd, infinite abyss,
And, through the palpable obscure, find out
This uncouth way. Milt. Parad. Lost, b. ii. l. 405.
Thy throne is darkness in th' abyss of light,
A blaze of glory that forbids the sight;
O teach me to believe thee thus conceal'd,
And search no farther than thyself reveal'd.

Dryden.
Jove was not more pleas'd
With infant nature, when his spacious hand
Had rounded this huge ball of earth and seas
To give it the first push, and see it roll
Along the vast abyss.

Addison. Guardian, N^o. 110.
2. A great depth, a gulph; hyperbolically.
The yawning earth disclos'd th' abyss of hell.

Dryd. Virg. Georg. i.
3. In a figurative sense, that in which any thing is lost.

For sepulchres themselves must crumbling fall,
In time's abyss, the common grave of all.

Dryd. Jew. Ser. x.
If, discovering how far we have clear and distinct ideas, we confine our thoughts within the contemplation of those things, that are within the reach of our understandings, and launch not out into that abyss of darkness, out of a presumption, that nothing is beyond our comprehension. Locke.

4. The body or waters supposed at the centre of the earth.

We are here to consider what is generally understood by the great abyss, in the common explanation of the deluge; and 'tis commonly interpreted either to be the sea, or subterraneous waters hid in the bowels of the earth. Burnet's Theory.

5. In the language of divines, hell.

From that insatiable abyss,
Where flames devour, and serpents hiss,
Promote me to thy seat of bliss.

Roscommon.
Ac, Ak, or Ake.

Being initials in the names of places, as Acon, signify an oak, from the Saxon ac, an oak.

Gibson's Camden.
ACA'CIA. n. s. [Lat.]

1. A drug brought from Egypt, which, being supposed the inspissated juice of a tree, is imitated by the juice of sloes, boiled to the same consistence.

Dictionnaire de Comm. Savary. Trevoux.
2. A tree commonly so called here, though different from that which produces the true acacia; and therefore termed pseudocacia, or Virginian acacia.

Millar.
ACADE'MIAL. adj. [from academy.] Relating to an academy, belonging to an academy.

ACADE'MIAN. n. s. [from academy.] A scholar of an academy or university; a member of an university. Wood, in his Athenae Oxoniensis, mentions a great feast made for the academicians.

ACADE'MICK. n. s. [from academy.] A student of an university.

A young academic shall dwell upon a journal that treats of trade, and be lavish in the praise of the author; while persons skilled in those subjects, hear the tattle with contempt.

Watts's Improvement of the Mind.
ACADE'MICK. adj. [academicus, Lat.] Relating to an university.

While thro' poetic scenes the genius roves,
Or wanders wild in academic groves.

Dunciad, b. iv. l. 481.
ACADE'MICAL. adj. [academicus, Lat.] Belonging to an university.

He drew him first into the fatal circle, from a kind of resolved privateness; where, after the academical life, he had taken such a taste of the rural, as I have heard him say, that he could well have bent his mind to a retired course.

Wotton.
ACADE'MICIAN. n. s. [academicien, Fr.] The member of an academy. It is generally used in speaking of the professors in the academies of France.

ACADE'MIST. n. s. [from academy.] The member of an academy. This is not often used.

It is observed by the Parisian academists, that some amphibious quadrupeds, particularly the sea-calf half or seal, have their epiglottis extraordinarily large. Ray on the Creation.

ACADEMY. n. f. [anciently, and properly, with the accent on the first syllable, now frequently on the second. Academia, Lat. from Academos of Athens, whose house was turned into a school, from whom the Groves of Academe in Milton.]

1. An assembly or society of men, uniting for the promotion of some art.

Our court shall be a little academy,
Still and contemplative in living arts.

Shak. Love's Labour Lost.

2. The place where sciences are taught.

Amongst the academies, which were composed by the rare genius of those great men, these four are reckoned as the principal; namely, the Athenian school, that of Sicyon, that of Rhodes, and that of Corinth. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

3. An university.

4. A place of education, in contradistinction to the universities or public schools. The thing, and therefore the name, is modern.

ACANTHUS. n. f. [Lat.] The name of the herb bears-breech, remarkable for being the model of the foliage on the Corinthian chapter.

On either side

Acanthus, and each od'rous bushy shrub,
Fenc'd up the verdant wall.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. iv. l. 696.

ACATALECTIC. n. f. [ἀκατάληκτος, Gr.] A verse which has the complete number of syllables, without defect or superfluity.

To ACCEDE. v. n. [accedo, Lat.] To be added to, to come to; generally used in political accounts; as, another power has acceded to the treaty; that is, has become a party.

To ACCELERATE. v. a. [accelero, Lat.]

1. To make quick, to hasten, to quicken motion; to give a continual impulse to motion, so as perpetually to increase.

Take new beer, and put in some quantity of stale beer into it; and see whether it will not accelerate the clarification, by opening the body of the beer, whereby the grosser parts may fall down into lees. Bacon's Natural Hist. N^o. 307.

By a skilful application of those notices, may be gained the accelerating and bettering of fruits, and the emptying of mines, at much more easy rates than by the common methods.

Glanville Sceptis.

If the rays endeavour to recede from the densest part of the vibration, they may be alternately accelerated and retarded by the vibrations overtaking them. Newton's Optics.

Spices quicken the pulse, and accelerate the motion of the blood, and dissipate the fluids; from whence leanness, pains in the stomach, loathings, and fevers. Arbutnot on Aliments.

Lo! from the dread immensity of space

Returning, with accelerated course,

The rushing comet to the sun descends.

Thomson's Sum. l. 1690.

2. It is generally applied to matter, and used chiefly in philosophical language; but it is sometimes used on other occasions.

In which council the king himself, whose continual vigilancy did suck in sometimes causeless suspicions, which few else knew, inclined to the accelerating a battle. Bacon's Henry VII.

Perhaps it may point out to a student now and then, what may employ the most useful labours of his thought, and accelerate his diligence in the most momentous inquiries. Watts.

ACCELERATION. n. f. [acceleratio, Lat.]

1. The act of quickening motion.

The law of the acceleration of falling bodies, discovered first by Galileo, is, that the velocities acquired by falling, being as the time in which the body falls, the spaces through which it passes, will be as the squares of the velocities, and the velocity and time taken together, as in a quadruplicate ratio of the spaces.

2. The state of the body accelerated, or quickened in its motion.

The degrees of acceleration of motion, the gra-vation of the air, the existence or non-existence of empty spaces, either coacervate or interspersed, and many the like, have taken up the thoughts and times of men in disputes concerning them.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

3. The act of hastening.

Considering the languor ensuing that action in some, and the visible acceleration it maketh of age in most, we cannot but think venery much abridgeth our days. Brown.

To ACCEND. v. a. [accendo, Lat.] To kindle, to set on fire; a word very rarely used.

Our devotion, if sufficiently accended, would, as theirs, burn up innumerable books of this sort. Devay of Piety.

ACCENSION. n. f. [accensio, Lat.] The act of kindling, or the state of being kindled.

The fulminating damp will take fire at a candle, or other flame, and, upon its accension, gives a crack or report, like the discharge of a gun, and makes an explosion so forcible as sometimes to kill the miners, shake the earth, and force bodies, of great weight and bulk, from the bottom of the pit or mine. Woodward's Nat. Hist.

ACCENT. n. f. [accentus, Lat.]

1. The manner of speaking or pronouncing, with regard either to force or elegance.

I know, Sir, I am no flatterer; he that beguiled you in a plain accent was a plain knave; which, for my part, I will not be. Shakespeare's King Lear.

Your accent is something finer than you could purchase in so removed a dwelling. Shakespeare's As you like it.

2. In grammar, the marks made upon syllables, to regulate their pronunciation.

Accent, as in the Greek names and usage, seems to have regarded the tune of the voice; the acute accent raising the voice in some certain syllables to a higher, i. e. more acute pitch or tone, and the grave depressing it lower, and both having some emphasis, i. e. more vigorous pronunciation. Holder.

3. Poetically, language or words.

How many ages hence

Shall this our lofty scene be acted o'er,
In states unborn, and accents yet unknown.

Shakespeare's Julius Caesar.

Winds on your wings to heav'n her accents bear;
Such words as heav'n alone is fit to hear.

Dryden's Virg. Post. 3.

4. A modification of the voice, expressive of the passions or sentiments.

The tender accent of a woman's cry
Whit pass unheard, will unregarded die;
When the rough seaman's louder shouts prevail,
When fair occasion shews the springing gale. Prior.

To ACCENT. v. a. [from accentus, Lat.]

1. To pronounce, to speak words with particular regard to the grammatical marks or rules.

Having got somebody to mark the last syllable but one, where it is long, in words above two syllables (which is enough to regulate her pronunciation, and accenting the words) let her read daily in the gospels, and avoid understanding them in Latin, if she can. Locke on Educa. § 177.

2. In poetry; to pronounce or utter in general.

O my unhappy lines! you that before
Have serv'd my youth to vent some wanton cries,
And, now congeal'd with grief, can scarce implore
Strength to accent, Here my Albertus lies! Wott.

3. To write or note the accents.

To ACCENTUATE. v. a. [accentur, Fr.] To place the proper accents over the vowels.

ACCENTUATION. n. f. [from accentuatus.]

1. The act of placing the accent in pronunciation.

2. Marking the accent in writing.

To ACCEPT. v. a. [accipio, Lat. acceptor, Fr.]
1. To take with pleasure; to receive kindly; to admit with approbation. It is distinguished from receive, as specific from general; noting a particular manner of receiving.

Neither do ye kindle fire on my altar for nought. I have no pleasure in you, faith the Lord of hosts; neither will I accept an offering at your hand. Malachi, i. 10.

God is no respecter of persons: but, in every nation, he that feareth him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with him. Acts, x. 34, 35.

You have been graciously pleased to accept this tender of my duty. Dryden's Dedic. to his Fables.

Charm by accepting, by submitting fway,
Yet have your humour most when you obey. Pope.

2. It is used in a kind of juridical sense; as, to accept terms, accept a treaty.

They slaughter'd many of the gentry, for whom no sex or age could be accepted for excuse. Sidney.

His promise Palamon accepts, but pray'd
To keep it better than the first he made. Dryden's Fables.

Those who have defended the proceedings of our negotiators at the treaty of Gertruydenburgh, dwell upon their zeal and patience in endeavouring to work the French up to their demands, but say nothing of the probability that France would ever accept them. Swift.

3. In the language of the bible, to accept persons, is to act with personal and partial regard.

He will surely reprove you, if ye do secretly accept persons. Job, xiii. 10.

4. It is sometimes used with the particle of.

I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face; peradventure he will accept of me. Genesis, xxxii. 20.

ACCEPTABILITY. n. f. The quality of being acceptable. See ACCEPTABLE.

He hath given us his natural blood to be shed, for the remission of our sins, and for the obtaining the grace and acceptability of repentance.

Taylor's Worthy Communicant.

ACCEPTABLE. adj. [acceptabile, Fr. from the Latin.] It is pronounced by some with the accent on the first syllable, as by Milton; by others, with the accent on the second, which is more analogical.

1. That which is likely to be accepted; grateful; pleasing. It is used with the particle to before the person accepting.

This woman, whom thou mad'st to be my help,
And gav'st me as thy perfect gift, so good,
So fit, so acceptable, so divine,
That from her hand I could expect no ill. Paradise Lost, b. ii.

I do not see any other method left for men of that function to take, in order to reform the world, than by using all honest arts to make themselves acceptable to the laity. Swift.

After he had made a peace so acceptable to the church, and so honourable to himself, he died with an extraordinary reputation of sanctity.

Addison on Italy.

ACCEPTABLENESS. n. f. [from acceptabile.]

The quality of being acceptable.

It will thereby take away the acceptableness of that conjunction. Grew's Cosmologia Sacra, b. ii. c. 2.

ACCEPTABLY. adv. [from acceptabile.] In an acceptable manner; so as to please; with the particle to. For the accent, see ACCEPTABLE.

Do not omit thy prayers, for want of a good oratory; for he that prayeth upon God's account, cares not what he suffers, so he be the friend of Christ; nor where nor when he prays, so he may do it frequently, fervently, and acceptably. Taylor.

If you can teach them to love and respect other people, they will, as your age requires it, find ways to express it acceptably to every one.

Locke on Education, § 145.

ACCEPTANCE. n. f. [acceptance, Fr.]

1. Reception with approbation.

By that acceptance of his sovereignty, they also accepted of his laws; why then should any other laws be now used amongst them?

Spenser's State of Ireland.

If he tells us his noble deeds, we must also tell him our noble acceptance of them. Shak. Coriol.

Thus Imbolden'd spake, and freedom us'd
Permissive, and acceptance found.

Par. Lost. b. viii. l. 435.

Some.

Some men cannot be fools with so good acceptance as others. South's Sermons

2. The meaning of a word as it is received or understood, acceptation is the word now commonly used.

That pleasure is man's chiefest good, because indeed it is the perception of good that is properly pleasure, is an assertion most certainly true, though under the common acceptance of it, not only false but odious: for, according to this, pleasure and sensuality pass for terms equivalent; and therefore he, who takes it in this sense, alters the subject of the discourse. South.

ACCEPTANCE. [in law.] The receiving of a rent, whereby the giver binds himself, for ever, to allow a former act done by another, whether it be in itself good or not. Corvel.

ACCEPTATION. n. f. [from accept.]

1. Reception, whether good or bad. This large sense seems now wholly out of use.

Yet, poor soul! knows he no other, but that I do suspect, neglect, yea, and detest him. For, every day, he finds one way or other to set forth himself unto me; but all are rewarded with like coldness of acceptation. Sidney, b. ii.

What is new finds better acceptation, than what is good or great. Denham's Sophy.

2. Good reception, acceptance.

Cain, envious of the acceptation of his brother's prayer and sacrifice, slew him; making himself the first manlayer, and his brother the first martyr. Raleigh's History of the World, b. i.

3. The state of being acceptable; regard.

Some things, although not to required of necessity, that, to leave them undone, excludeth from salvation, are, notwithstanding, of so great dignity and acceptation with God, that most ample reward in heaven is laid up for them. Hooker, b. ii.

They have those enjoyments only as the consequences of the state of esteem and acceptation they are in with their parents and governors. Locke on Education, § 53.

4. Acceptance in the juridical sense. This sense occurs rarely.

As, in order to the passing away a thing by gift, there is required a surrender of all right on this part that gives; so there is required also an acceptation on his part to whom it is given. South's Sermons.

5. The meaning of a word, as it is commonly received.

Thereupon the Earl of Lauderdale made a discourse upon the several questions, and what acceptation these words and expressions had. Clarendon, b. viii.

All matter is either fluid or solid, in a large acceptation of the words, that they may comprehend even all the middle degrees between extreme fixedness and coherency, and the most rapid intestine motion of the particles of bodies. Bentley's Sermons.

AN ACCEPTER. n. f. [from accept.] The person that accepts.

ACCEPTILATION. n. f. [from acceptatio, Lat.] A term of the civil law, importing the remission of a debt by an acquittance from the creditor, testifying the receipt of money which has never been paid.

ACCEPTION. n. f. [from acceptio, Fr. from acceptio, Lat.] The received sense of a word; the meaning. Not in use.

That this hath been esteemed the due and proper acceptation of this word, I shall testify by one evidence, which gave me the first hint of this notion. Hammond on Fundamentals.

ACCES. n. f. [In some of its senses, it seems derived from accessus; in others, from accessio, Lat. access, Fr.]

1. The way by which any thing may be approached.

The access of the town was only by a neck of land. Bacon.

There remained very advantageous accesses for temptations to enter and invade men, the fortifications being very slender, little knowledge of immortality, or any thing beyond this life, and no assurance that repentance would be admitted for sin. Hammond on Fundamentals.

And here th' access a gloomy grove defends;
And here th' unnavigable lake extends,
O'er whose unhappy waters, void of light,
No bird presumes to steer his airy flight. Dryden's Æneid vi.

2. The means, or liberty, of approaching either to things or men.

When we are wrong'd, and would unfold our griefs,
We are deny'd access unto his person,
Ev'n by those men that most have done us wrong. Shakespeare.

They go commission'd to require a peace,
And carry presents to procure access. Dryd. Æneid, vii. l. 209.

He grants what they besought;
Instructed, that to God is no access;
Without Mediator, whose high office now
Moses in figure bears. Par. Lost, b. xiii. l. 239.

3. Encrease, enlargement, addition.

The gold was accumulated, and store treasures,
For the most part; but the silver is still growing.
Besides, infinite is the access of territory and empire by the same enterprize. Bacon.

Nor think superfluous their aid;
I, from the influence of thy looks, receive
Access in every virtue; in thy fight
More wife, more watchful, stronger. Paradise Lost, b. ix.

Although to opinion, there be many gods, may seem an access in religion, and such as cannot at all consist with atheism, yet doth it deductively, and upon inference, include the same; for unity is the inseparable and essential attribute of Deity. Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. i. c. 10.

The reputation
Of virtuous actions past, if not kept up
With an access, and fresh supply, of new ones,
Is lost and soon forgotten. Denham's Sophy.

4. It is sometimes used, after the French, to signify the returns or fits of a distemper; but this sense seems yet scarcely received into our language.

For as relapses make diseases
More desperate than their first accesses. Hudibras.

ACCESSARINESS. n. f. [from accessary.] The state of being accessary.

Perhaps this will draw us into a negative accessariness to the mischiefs. Decay of Piety.

ACCESSARY. adj. [A corruption, as it seems, of the word accessory, which see; but now more commonly used than the proper word.] That which, without being the chief constituent of a crime, contributes to it. But it had formerly a good and general sense.

As for those things that are accessary hereunto, those things that so belong to the way of salvation, &c. Hooker, b. iii. § 3.

He had taken upon him the government of Hull, without any apprehension or imagination, that it would ever make him accessary to rebellion. Clarendon, b. viii.

ACCESSIBLE. adj. [from accessibilis, Lat. accessibile, Fr.] That which may be approached; that which we may reach or arrive at.

It is applied both to persons and things, with the particle to.

Some lie more open to our senses and daily observation; others are more occult and hidden, and though accessible, in some measure, to our senses, yet not without great search and scrutiny, or some happy accident. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

Those things, which were indeed inexplicable, have been racked and tortured to discover themselves, while the plainer and more accessible truths, as if despicable while easy, are clouded and obscured. Decay of Piety.

As an island, we are accessible on every side, and exposed to perpetual invasions; against which it is impossible to fortify ourselves sufficiently, without a power at sea. Addison's Freeholder.

In conversation, the tempers of men are open and accessible, their attention is awake, and their minds disposed to receive the strongest impressions; and what is spoken is generally more affecting, and more apposite to particular occasions. Rogers.

ACCESION. n. f. [from accessio, Lat. accessio, Fr.]

1. Encrease by something added, enlargement, augmentation.

Nor could all the king's bounties, nor his own large accessions, raise a fortune to his heir; but after vast sums of money, and great wealth gotten, he died unlamented. Clarendon.

There would not have been found the difference here set down betwixt the force of the air, when expanded, and what that force should have been according to the theory, but that the included inch of air received some little accession during the trial. Boyle's Spring of the Air.

The wisest among the nobles began to apprehend the growing power of the people; and therefore, knowing what an accession thereof would accrue to them, by such an addition of property, used all means to prevent it. Swift.

Charity, indeed, and works of munificence are the proper discharge of such over-proportioned accessions, and the only virtuous enjoyment of them. Rogers's Sermons.

2. The act of coming to, or joining one's self to; as, accession to a confederacy.

Beside, what wife objections he prepares
Against my late accession to the wars?
Does not the fool perceive his argument
Is with more force against Achilles bent? Dryden's Fables.

3. The act of arriving at; as, the king's accession to the throne.

ACCESSORILY. adv. [from accessory.] In the manner of an accessory.

ACCESSORY. adj. [Joined to another thing, so as to increase it; additional.]

In this kind there is not the least action, but it doth somewhat make to the accessory augmentation of our blifs. Hooker.

ACCESSORY. n. f. [from accessorius, Lat. accessoire, Fr.] This word, which had anciently a general signification, is now almost confined to forms of law.]

1. Applied to persons.

A man that is guilty of a felonious offence, not principally, but by participation; as, by commandment, advice, or concealment. And a man may be accessory to the offence of another, after two sorts, by the common law, or by statute: and, by the common law, two ways also: that is, before or after the fact. Before the fact; as, when one commandeth or adviseth another to commit a felony, and is not present at the execution thereof; for his presence makes him also a principal; wherefore there cannot be an accessory before the fact in manslaughter; because manslaughter is sudden and not premeditated. Accessory after the fact, is, when one receiveth him, whom he knoweth to have committed felony. Accessory by statute, is he that abets, counsels, or hides any man committing, or having committed an offence made felony by statute. Corvel.

By the common law, the accessories cannot be proceeded against, till the principal has received his trial. Spenser's State of Ireland.

But pause, my soul! and study, ere thou fall
On accidental joys, th' essential.
Still before accessories do abide

A trial, must the principal be try'd. Donne.

Now were all transform'd
Alike, to serpents all, as accessories
To his bold riot. Milton's Par. Lost, b. x. l. 520.

2. Applied to things.

An accessory is said to be that which does accede unto some principal fact or thing in law; and, as such, generally speaking, follows the reason and nature of its principal. Ayliffe.

ACCIDENT. n. f. [a corruption of accidentis, from accidentia, Lat.]

The little book containing the first rudiments of grammar, and explaining the properties of the eight parts of speech.

I do confess, I do want eloquence,
And never yet did learn mine accidence. Taylor the Water-poet.

ACCIDENT. n. f. [from accidens, Lat.]

1. The property or quality of any being, which may be separated from it, at least in thought. IF

If she were but the body's accident,
And her sole being did in it subsist,
As white in snow she might herself absent,
And in the body's substance not be miss'd.

Sir John Davies.

An accidental mode, or an accident, is such a mode as is not necessary to the being of a thing; for the subject may be without it, and yet remain of the same nature that it was before; or it is that mode which may be separated or abolished from its subject.

Watts's Logick.

2. In grammar, the property of a word.

The learning of a language is nothing else but the informing of ourselves, what composes of letters are, by consent and institution, to signify such certain notions of things, with their modalities and accidents.

Holder's Elements of Speech.

3. That which happens unforeseen; casualty, chance.

General laws are like general rules in physick, according whereunto, as no wise man will desire himself to be cured, if there be joined with his disease some special accident, in regard whereof, that whereby others in the same infirmity, but without the like accident, recover health, would be, to him, either hurtful, or, at the least, unprofitable.

Hooker, b. v. § 9.

The flood, and other accidents of time, made it one common field and pasture with the land of Eden.

Raleigh's History of the World.

Our joy is turn'd

Into perplexity, and new amaz;

For whither is he gone? What accident

Hath rapt him from us? Parad. Regained.

And trivial accidents shall be forborn,

That others may have time to take their turn.

Dryd. Fables.

The reformation owed nothing to the good intentions of king Henry. He was only an instrument of it (as the logicians speak) by accident.

Swift's Miscellanies.

ACCIDENTAL. n. f. [accidental, Fr. See ACCIDENT.] A property nonessential.

Conceive, as much as you can, of the essentials of any subject, before you consider its accidentals.

Watts's Logick.

ACCIDENTAL. adj. [from accident.]

1. Having the quality of an accident, nonessential; used with the particle to, before that in which the accident inheres.

A distinction is to be made between what pleases naturally in itself, and what pleases upon the account of machines, actors, dances, and circumstances, which are merely accidental to the tragedy.

Rymer's Tragedies of the last Age.

This is accidental to a state of religion, and therefore ought to be reckoned among the ordinary difficulties of it.

Tillotson.

2. Casual, fortuitous, happening by chance.

Thy fin's not accidental, but a trade.

Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.

So shall you hear

Of accidental judgments, casual slaughters;

Of death's put on by cunning, and forc'd cause.

Shakesp. Hamlet.

Look upon things of the most accidental and mutable nature; accidental in their production, and mutable in their continuance; yet God's preference of them is as certain in him, as the memory of them is, or can be, in us.

South's Sermons.

3. In the following passage it seems to signify adventitious.

Ay, such a minister as wind to fire,

That adds an accidental fierceness to

Its natural fury.

Denham's Sophy.

ACCIDENTALLY. adv. [from accidental.]

1. After an accidental manner; nonessentially. Other points no less concern the commonwealth, though but accidentally depending upon the former.

Spenser's State of Ireland.

I conclude choler accidentally bitter, and acrimonious, but not in itself.

Harvey on Consumptions.

2. Casually, fortuitously.

Although virtuous men do sometimes accidentally make their way to preferment, yet the world is so corrupted, that no man can reasonably hope to be rewarded in it, merely upon account of his virtue.

Swift's Miscellanies.

ACCIDENTALNESS. n. f. [from accidental.] The quality of being accidental.

Diſt.

ACCIPIENT. n. f. [accipiens, Lat.] A receiver, perhaps sometimes used for recipient.

Diſt.

TO ACCITE. v. a. [accito, Lat.] To call, to summons; a word not in use now.

Our coronation done, we will accite

No prince, no peer, shall have just cause to say,
Heav'n shorten Harry's happy life one day.

Shakesp. Henry IV.

ACCLAM. n. f. [acclamo, Lat. from which probably first the verb acclaim, now lost, and then the noun.] A shout of praise, acclamation.

Back from pursuit thy pow'rs, with loud acclaim,

Thee only extoll'd. Milt. Par. Lost, b. iii. l. 397.

The herald ends; the vaulted firmament

With loud acclaims; and vast applause, is rent.

Dryden's Fables.

ACCLAMATION. n. f. [acclamatio, Lat.] Shouts of applause; such as those with which a victorious army salutes the general.

It hath been the custom of Christian men, in token of the greater reverence, to stand, to utter certain words of acclamation, and, at the name of Jesus, to bow.

Hooker, b. v. § 29.

Gladly then he mix'd

Among those friendly pow'rs, who him receiv'd

With joy, and acclamations loud, that one,

That, of so many myriads fall'n, yet one

Return'd, not lost. Milton's Par. Lost, b. vi. l. 23.

Such an enchantment is there in words, and so fine a thing does it seem to some, to be ruined plausibly, and to be ushered to their destruction with panegyric and acclamation.

South.

ACCLIVITY. n. f. [from acclivus, Lat.] The steepness or slope of a line inclining to the horizon, reckoned upwards; as, the ascent of an hill is the acclivity, the descent is the declivity.

Quincy.

The men, leaving their wives and younger children below, do, not without some difficulty, clamber up the acclivities, dragging their kine with them, where they feed them, and milk them, and make butter and cheese, and do all the dairy-work.

Ray on the Creation.

ACCLIVOUS. adj. [acclivus, Lat.] Rising with a slope.

TO ACCLOY. v. a. [See CLOY.]

1. To fill up, in an ill sense; to crowd, to stuff full; a word almost obsolete.

Fairy Queen.

2. To fill to satiety; in which sense cloy is still in use.

They that escape best in the temperate zone, would be accloyed with long nights, very tedious, no less than forty days.

Ray on the Creation.

TO ACCOIL. v. n. [See COIL.] To crowd, to keep a coil about, to bustle, to be in a hurry: a word now out of use.

About the cauldron many cooks accoil'd,

With hooks and ladles, as need did require;

The while the viands in the vessel boil'd,

They did about their business sweat, and sorely

ACCOLENT. n. f. [accolens, Lat.] He that inhabits near a place; a borderer.

Diſt.

ACCOMMODABLE. adj. [accommodabilis, Lat.] That which may be fitted; with the particle to.

As there is infinite variety in the circumstances of persons, things, actions, times and places! so we must be furnished with such general rules as are accommodable to all this variety, by a wise judgment and discretion.

Watts's Logick.

TO ACCOMMODATE. v. a. [accommodo, Lat.]

1. To supply with conveniences of any kind.

These three,

The rest do nothing; with this word, stand, stand, Accommodated by the place (more charming

With their own nobleness, which could have turn'd A distaff to a lance), gilded pale looks.

Shakesp. Cymbeline.

2. With the particle to, to adapt, to fit, to make consistent with.

He had altered many things, not that they were not natural before, but that he might accommodate himself to the age in which he lived.

Dryden on Dramatic Poetry.

'Twas his misfortune to light upon an hypothesis, that could not be accommodated to the nature of things, and human affairs; his principles could not be made to agree with that constitution and order which God hath settled in the world.

3. To reconcile; to adjust what seems inconsistent or at variance; to make consistency appear.

Part know how to accommodate St. James and St. Paul better than some late reconcilers, Norris.

TO ACCOMMODATE. v. n. To be conformable to.

They make the particular enſigns of the twelve tribes accommodate unto the twelve ſigns of the zodiac.

Brown.

Neither fort of chymists have duly considered how great variety there is in the textures and consistencies of compound bodies; and how little the consistency and duration of many of them seem to accommodate and be explicable by the proposed notion.

Boyle's Scept. Chym.

ACCOMMODATE. adj. [accommodatus, Lat.] Suitable, fit; used sometimes with the particle for, but more frequently with to.

They are so acted and directed by nature, as to cast their eggs in such places as are most accommodated for the exclusion of their young, and where there is food ready for them so soon as they be hatched.

Ray on the Creation.

In these cases we examine the why, the what, and the how, of things, and propose means accommodated to the end.

L'Eſtrange.

God did not primarily intend to appoint this way of worship, and to impose it upon them as that which was most proper and agreeable to him, but that he condescended to it as most accommodated to their present state and inclination.

Tillotson.

ACCOMMODATELY. adv. [from accommodate.] Suitably, fitly.

ACCOMMODATION. n. f. [from accommodate.]

1. Provision of conveniences.

2. In the plural, conveniences, things requisite to ease or refreshment.

The king's commissioners were to have such accommodations, as the other thought fit to leave to them; who had been very civil to the king's commissioners.

Clarendon, b. viii.

3. Adaption, fitness; with the particle to.

Indeed that disputing physiology is no accommodation to your designs, which are not to teach men to cant endlessly about materia and forma.

Glanville's Scepſis.

The organization of the body, with accommodation to its functions, is fitted with the most curious mechanism.

Hale's Origin.

4. Composition of a difference, reconciliation, adjustment.

Diſt.

TO ACCOMPANY. v. a. [accompagner, Fr.] To be with another as a companion. It is used both of persons and things.

Go visit her, in her chaste bower of rest, Accompany'd with angel-like delights.

Spenser, Sonnet iii.

The great business of the senses being to make us take notice of what hurts or advantages the body, it is wisely ordered by nature, that pain should accompany the reception of several ideas.

Locke.

As folly is usually accompanied with perverseness, so it is here.

Swift's short View of Ireland.

TO ACCOMPANY. v. n. To associate with; to become a companion to.

No man in effect doth accompany with others, but he learneth ere he is aware, some gesture, voice, or fashion.

Bacon's Nat. Hist.

ACCOMPlice. n. f. [complice, Fr. from complex,

plex, a word in the barbarous Latin, much in use.]

1. An associate, a partaker, usually in an ill sense.

There were several scandalous reports industriously spread by Wood, and his accomplices, to discourage all opposition against his infamous project. Swift.

2. A partner, or co-operator, in a sense indifferent.

If a tongue would be talking without a mouth, what could it have done, when it had all its organs of speech, and accomplices of sound, about it. Addison. Spectator, N^o. 247.

3. It is used with the particle to before a thing, and with before a person.

Childless Arturius, vastly rich before,
Thus by his losses multiplies his store,
Suspected for accomplice to the fire,
That burnt his palace but to build it higher. Dryd. Jew. Sat.

Who, should they steal for want of his relief,
He judg'd himself accomplice with the thief. Dryden's Fables.

7. ACCOMPLISH, v. a. [accomplir, Fr. from complet, Lat.]

1. To complete, to execute fully; as, to accomplish a design.

He that is far off shall die of the pestilence, and he that is near shall fall by the sword, and he that remaineth, and is besieged, shall die by the famine. Thus will I accomplish my fury upon them. Ezekiel, vi. 12.

2. To complete a period of time.

He would accomplish seventy years in the desolations of Jerusalem. Daniel, ix. 2.

3. To fulfil; as, a prophecy.

The vision,
Which I made known to Lucius ere the stroke
Of this yet scarce cold battle, at this instant
Is full accomplish'd. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.
We see every day those events exactly accomplished, which our Saviour foretold at so great a distance. Addison.

4. To gain, to obtain.

Tell him from me (as he will win my love)
He bear himself with honourable action;
Such as he hath observ'd in noble ladies
Unto their lords by them accomplish'd. Shak. Taming of a Shrew.

I'll make my heav'n in a lady's lap.

Oh miserable thought, and more unlikely,
Than to accomplish twenty golden crowns. Shak. Henry V.

5. To adorn, or furnish, either mind or body.

From the tents
The armourers accomplishing the knights,
With busy hammers closing rivets up,
Give dreadful note of preparation. Shak. Hen. V.
ACCOMPLISHED, participial adj.
1. Complete in some qualification.

For who expects, that, under a tutor, a young gentleman should be an accomplished publick orator or logician. Locke.

2. Elegant; finished in respect of embellishments; used commonly of acquired qualifications, without including moral excellence.

The next I took to wife,

O that I never had! fond with too late,
Was in the vale of Sorec, Dalila,
That specious monster, my accomplish'd snare. Samson Agon.

ACCOMPLISHER, n. f. [from accomplish.] The person that accomplishes. Dict.

ACCOMPLISHMENT, n. f. [accomplissement, Fr.]

1. Completion, full performance, perfection.

This would be the accomplishment of their common felicity, in case, by their evil, either through destiny or advice, they suffered not the occasion to be lost. Sir John Haywood.

Thereby he might evade the accomplishment of those afflictions he now but gradually endureth. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

He thought it impossible to find, in any one body, all those perfections which he sought for the accomplishment of a Helena; because nature, in any individual person, makes nothing that is perfect in all its parts. Dryden's Dufresnoy, Pref.

2. Completion; as of a prophecy.

The miraculous success of the apostles preaching, and the accomplishment of many of their predictions, which, to those early Christians, were matters of faith only, are, to us, matters of fight and experience. Atterbury's Sermons.

3. Embellishment, elegance, ornament of mind or body.

Young heirs, and elder brothers, from their own reflecting upon the estates they are born to, and therefore thinking all other accomplishments unnecessary, are of no manner of use but to keep up their families. Addison. Spectator, N^o. 123.

4. The act of obtaining or perfecting any thing; attainment; completion.

The means suggested by policy and worldly wisdom, for the attainment of those earthly enjoyments, are unfit for that purpose, not only upon the account of their insufficiency for, but also of their frequent opposition and contrariety to, the accomplishments of such ends. South's Ser.

ACCOMPT, n. f. [Fr. compter and compte, anciently acompter, Skinner.] An account, a reckoning. See ACCOUNT.

The soul may have time to call itself to a just account of all things past, by means whereof repentance is perfected. Hooker, b. v. § 46.

Each Christmas they accompts did clear;
And wound their bottom round the year. Prior.

ACCOMPTANT, n. f. [accountant, Fr.] A reckoner, computer.

See ACCOUNTANT.

As the account runs on, generally the accountant goes backward. South's Sermons.

ACCOMPTING DAY. The day on which the reckoning is to be settled.

To whom thou much dost owe, thou much must pay;

Think on the debt against th' accompting day. Sir J. Denham.

To ACCORD, v. a. [derived, by some, from corda; the string of a musical instrument, by others, from corda, hearts; in the first, implying harmony, in the other unity.]

1. To make agree; to adjust one thing to another; with the particle to.

The first sports the shepherds shewed, were full of such leaps and gambols, as being accorded to the pipe which they bore in their mouths, even as they danced, made a right picture of their chief god Pan, and his companions the satyrs. Sidney, b. i.

Her hands accorded the lute's music to the voice; her panting heart danced to the musick. Sid. b. ii.

The lights and shades, whose well accorded strife

Gives all the strength and colour of our life. Pope's Epistle.

2. To bring to agreement; to compose; to accommodate.

Men would not rest upon bare contracts without reducing the debt into a specialty, which created much certainty, and accorded many suits. Sir M. Hale.

To ACCORD, v. n. To agree, to suit one with another; with the particle with.

Things are often spoke, and seldom meant; But that my heart accordeth with my tongue, Seeing the deed is meritorious,

And to preserve my sovereign from his foe. Shak. Henry VI.

Several of the main parts of Moses's history, as concerning the flood, and the first fathers of the several nations of the world, do very well accord with the most ancient account of profane history. Tillotson, Sermon i.

Jarring intersts of themselves create Th' according musick of a well-mixt state. Pope.

ACCORD, n. f. [accord, Fr.]

1. A compact; an agreement; adjustment of a difference.

There was no means for him to satisfy all obligations to God and man, but to offer himself for a mediator of an accord and peace between them. Bacon's Henry VII.

If both are satisfy'd with this accord,
Swear by the laws of knighthood on my sword. Dryden's Fables.

2. Concurrence, union of mind.

At last such grace I found, and means I wrought,
That I that lady to my spouse had won,

Accord of friends, consent of parents fought,
Affiance made, my happiness begun. Spenser's Fairy Queen.

They gathered themselves together, to fight with Joshua and Israel, with one accord. Joshua, ix. 2.

3. Harmony, symmetry, just correspondence of one thing with another.

Beauty is nothing else but a just accord and mutual harmony of the members, animated by a healthful constitution. Dryden's Dufresnoy, Pref.

4. Musical note.

Try, if there were in one steeple two bells of unison, whether the striking of the one would move the other, more than if it were another accord. Bacon's Natural History, N^o. 281.

We must not blame Apollo, but his lute,
If false accords from her false strings be sent. Sir J. Davies.

5. Own accord; voluntary motion: used both of persons and things.

Ne Guyon yet spake word,
Till that they came unto an iron door,
Which to them open'd of its own accord. Fairy Queen.

Will you blame any man for doing that of his own accord, which all men ought to be compelled to do, that are not willing of themselves. Hooker.

All animal substances, exposed to the air, turn alkaline of their own accord; and some vegetables, by heat, will not turn acid, but alkaline. Arbutnot on Aliments.

6. Action in speaking, correspondent to the words.

Titus, I am come to talk to thee.—
—No, not a word: how can I grace my talk, Wanting a hand to give it that accord? Shakespeare's Titus And.

ACCORDANCE, n. f. [from accord.]

1. Agreement with a person; with the particle with.

And prays he may in long accordance bide,
With that great worth which hath such wonders wrought. Fairfax, b. ii. stanza 63.

2. Conformity to something.

The only way of defining of sin, is, by the contrariety to the will of God; as of good, by the accordance with that will. Hammond's Funds.

ACCORDANT, adj. [accordant, Fr.] Willing; in a good humour. Not in use.

The prince discovered that he loved your niece, and meant to acknowledge it this night in a dance; and, if he found her accordant, he meant to take the present time by the top, and instantly break with you of it. Shak. Much ado about Nothing.

ACCORDING, prep. [from accord, of which it is properly a participle, and is therefore never used but with to.]

1. In a manner suitable to, agreeable to, in proportion.

Our churches are places provided, that the people might there assemble themselves in due and decent manner, according to their several degrees and orders. Hooker, b. v. § 13.

Our zeal, then, shall be according to knowledge. And what kind of knowledge? Without all question, first, according to the true saving, evangelical knowledge. It should be according to the gospel, the whole gospel: not only according to its truths, but precepts: not only according to its free grace, but necessary duties: not only according to its mysteries, but also its commandments. Sprat's Sermons.

Noble is the same that is built on candour and ingenuity, according to those beautiful lines of Sir John Denham. Addison. Spectator.

2. With regard to.

God made all things in number, weight, and measure, and gave them to be considered by us according to these properties, which are inherent in created beings. Holder on Time.

3. In proportion. The following phrase is, I think, vitious.

A man may, with prudence and a good conscience, approve of the professed principles of one party more than the other, according as he thinks they best promote the good of church and state.

Swift on the Sentiments of a Church of Englandman.
ACCORDINGLY. adv. [from accord.] Agreeably, suitably, conformably.

As the actions of men are of sundry distinct kinds, so the laws thereof must accordingly be distinguished. Hooker, b. i.

Sirrah, thou'rt said to have a stubborn soul, That apprehends no further than this world; And squar'st thy life accordingly.

Shakespeare, Measure for Measure.
Whoever is so assured of the authority and sense of scripture, as to believe the doctrine of it, and to live accordingly, shall be saved. Tillotson's Pref.

Mealy substances, fermented, turn sour. Accordingly, given to a weak child, they still retain their nature; for bread will give them the cholice. Arbutnot on Aliments.

To ACCOST. v. a. [acoster, Fr.] To speak to first; to address; to salute.

You mistake, knight: accost her, front her, board her, woo her, assail her.

Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.
At length, collecting all his serpent wiles, With footling words renew'd, him thus accosts.

Paradise Regained.
I first accosted him: I su'd, I sought, And, with a loving force, to Phenex brought.

Dryden's Æneid.
ACCO'STABLE. adj. [from acost.] Easy of access; familiar. Not in use.

They were both indubitable, strong, and high-minded men, yet of sweet and accessible nature, almost equally delighting in the press and affluence of dependents and suitors. Wotton.

ACCOUNT. n. s. [from the old French acomppt, from computus, Lat. it was originally written acomppt, which see; but, by gradually softening the pronunciation, in time the orthography changed to account.]

1. A computation of debts or expences; a register of facts relating to money.

At many times I brought in my accounts, Laid them before you; you would throw them off, And say, you found them in mine honesty.

Shakespeare's Timon.
When my young master has once got the skill of keeping accounts (which is a business of reason more than arithmetic) perhaps it will not be amiss, that his father from thenceforth require him to do it in all his concerns. Locke on Educ.

2. The state or result of a computation; as, the account stands thus between us.

Behold this have I found, faith the Preacher, counting one by one, to find out the account. Ecclesiasticus, vii. 27.

3. Such a state of persons or things, as may make them more or less worthy of being considered in the reckoning. Value, or estimation.

For the care that they took for their wives and their children, their brethren and kinsfolks, was in least account with them: but the greatest and principal fear was for the holy temple, 2 Maccab. xv. 18.

That good affection, which things of smaller account have once set on work, is by so much the more easily raised higher. Hooker, b. v. § 35.

I should make more account of their judgment, who are men of sense, and yet have never touched a pencil, than of the opinion given by the greatest part of painters. Dryden's Dufresne.

4. Profit; advantage; to turn to account is to produce advantage.

We would establish our souls in such a solid and substantial virtue, as will turn to account in that great day, when it must stand the test of infinite wisdom and justice. Add. Spett. N^o. 399.

5. Distinction, dignity, rank.
There is such a peculiarity in Homer's manner of apostrophizing Eumæus, it is generally applied, by that poet, only to men of account and distinction. Pope's Odyssey; notes.

6. A reckoning verified by finding the value of a thing equal to what it was accounted.

Considering the usual motives of human actions, which are pleasure, profit, and ambition, I cannot yet comprehend how those persons find their account in any of the three. Swift.

7. A reckoning referred to, or sum charged upon any particular person; and thence, figuratively, regard; consideration; fake.

If he hath wronged thee, or oweth thee ought, put that on my account. Philemon, i. 8.

This must be always remembered, that nothing can come into the account of recreation, that is not done with delight. Locke on Education, § 197.

In matters where his judgment led him to oppose men on a public account, he would do it vigorously and heartily. Atterbury's Sermons.

The assertion is our Saviour's, though uttered by him in the person of Abraham the father of the faithful; who, on the account of that character, is very fitly introduced. Atterbury.

These tribunes kindled great dissensions between the nobles and the commons, on the account of Coriolanus, a nobleman, whom the latter had impeached. Swift's Contest in Athens and Rome.

Nothing can recommend itself to our love, on any other account, but either as it promotes our present, or is a means to assure to us a future happiness. Rogers's Sermon v.

Sempronius gives no thanks on this account. Addison's Cato.

8. A narrative, relation; in this use it may seem to be derived from conte, Fr. a tale, a narration.

9. The review or examination of an affair taken by authority; as, the magistrate took an account of the tumult.

Therefore is the kingdom of heaven likened unto a certain king, which would take account of his servants; and when he had begun to reckon, one was brought unto him, which owed him ten thousand talents. Matt. xix. 23, 24.

10. The relation and reasons of a transaction given to a person in authority.

What need we fear who knows it, when none can call our power to account? Shak. Macbeth.

The true ground of morality can only be the will and law of a God who sees men in the dark, has in his hands rewards and punishments, and power enough to call to account the proudest offender. Locke.

11. Explanation; assignment of causes.

It is easy to give account, how it comes to pass, that though all men desire happiness, yet their wills carry them so contrarily. Locke.

It being, in our author's account, a right acquired by begetting, to rule over those he had begotten, it was not a power possible to be inherited, because the right, being consequent to, and built on, an act perfectly personal, made that power so too, and impossible to be inherited. Locke.

12. An opinion previously established.

These were designed to join with the forces at sea, there being prepared a number of flat-bottomed boats to transport the land forces under the wing of the great navy: for they made no account, but that the navy should be absolutely master of the seas. Bacon's Considerations on War with Spain.

A prodigal young fellow, that had sold his clothes, upon the sight of a swallow, made account that summer was at hand, and away went his shirt too. L'Estrange, Fable cxxvii.

13. The reasons of any thing collected.

Being convinced, upon all accounts, that they had the same reason to believe the history of our Saviour, as that of any other person to which they themselves were not actually eye-witnesses, they were bound, by all the rules of historical faith, and of right reason, to give credit to this history. Addison.

14. In law.

Account is, in the common law, taken for a writ or action, brought against a man, that, by means of office or business undertaken, is to render an account unto another; as, a bailiff toward his master, a guardian to his ward. Corwell.

To ACCO'UNT. v. a. [See ACCOUNT.]

1. To esteem, to think, to hold in opinion.

That also was accounted a land of giants. Deut.

2. To reckon, to compute.

Neither the motion of the moon, whereby months are computed, nor the sun, whereby years are accounted, consisteth of whole numbers. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

3. To assign to, as a debt; with the particle to. For some years really accrued the yearly sum of two hundred thousand pounds to the king's coffers: and it was, in truth, the only project that was accounted to his own service. Clarendon.

4. To hold in esteem; with of.

Silver was nothing accounted of in the days of Solomon. Chron.

To ACCO'UNT. v. n.

1. To reckon.

The calendar months are likewise arbitrarily and unequally settled by the same power; by which months we, to this day, account, and they measure, and make up, that which we call the Julian year. Holder on Time.

2. To give an account, to assign the causes; in which sense it is followed by the particle for.

If any one should ask, why our general continued so easy to the last? I know no other way to account for it, but by that unmeasurable love of wealth, which his best friends allow to be his predominant passion. Swift.

3. To make up the reckoning; to answer; with for.

Then thou shalt see him plung'd, when least he fears,

At once accounting for his deep arrears. Dryden's Juv. Sat. xiii.

They have no uneasy prefaces of a future reckoning, wherein the pleasures they now taste must be accounted for; and may, perhaps, be outweighed by the pains which shall then lay hold of them. Atterbury's Sermons.

4. To appear as the medium, by which any thing may be explained.

Such as have a faulty circulation through the lungs, ought to eat very little at a time; because the increase of the quantity of fresh chyle must make that circulation still more uneasy; which, indeed, is the case of consumptive and some asthmatic persons, and accounts for the symptoms they are troubled with after eating. Arbutnot on Aliments.

ACCO'UNTABLE. adj. [from account.] Of whom an account may be required; who must answer for: followed by the particle to before the person, and for before the thing.

Accountable to none

But to my conscience and my God alone. Oldham.

Thinking themselves exalted from standing upon their own legs, or being accountable for their own conduct, they very seldom trouble themselves with enquiries. Locke on Education.

The good magistrate will make no distinction; for the judgment is God's; and he will look upon himself as accountable at his bar for the equity of it. Atterbury's Sermons.

ACCO'UNTANT. adj. [from account.] Accountable to; responsible for. Not in use.

His offence is so, as it appears,

Accountant to the law upon that pain. Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.

I love her too,

Not out of absolute lust (though, peradventure, I stand accountant for as great a sin).

But partly led to diet my revenge. Sh. Othello.

ACCO'UNTANT. n. s. [See ACCOUNTANT.] A computer; a man skilled or employed in accounts.

VOL. I. N^o. 2. D The

The different compute of divers states; the short and irreconcilable years of some; the exceeding error in the natural frame of others; and the false deductions of ordinary accountants in most.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.
ACCO'UNT-BOOK. n. f. A book containing accounts.

I would endeavour to comfort myself upon the loss of friends, as I do upon the loss of money; by turning to my account-book, and seeing whether I have enough left for my support.

Swift.
ACCO'UNTING. n. f. [from account.] The act of reckoning, or making up of accounts.

This method faithfully observed, must keep a man from breaking, or running behind-hand in his spiritual estate; which, without frequent accountings, he will hardly be able to prevent.

South's Sermons.
To ACCO'UPLE. v. a. [from accopler, Fr.] to join, to link together. We now use couple.

He sent a solemn embassy to treat a peace and league with the king; accoupling it with an article in the nature of a request.

Bacon's Henry VII.
To ACCO'URAGE. v. a. [Obsolete. See COURAGE.] To animate.

That forward pair the ever would assuage,
When they would strive due reason to exceed;
But that same froward twain would accourage,
And of her plenty add unto her need.

Fairy Queen, b. ii. c. ii.
To ACCO'URT. v. a. [See To COURT.] To entertain with courtship, or courtesey; a word now not in use.

Who all this while were at their wanton rest,
Accounting each her friend with lavish feast.

Fairy Queen.
To ACCO'UTRE. v. a. [from accotrere, Fr.] To dress to equip.

Is it for this they study? to grow pale,
And miss the pleasures of a glorious meal?
For this, in rags accoutred are they seen,
And made the May-game of the public spleen?

Dryden.
ACCO'UTREMENT. n. f. [from accoutrement, Fr.] Dress, equipage, furniture relating to the person; trappings, ornaments.

I profess requital to a hair's breadth; not only in the simple office of love, but in all the accoutrement, compliment, and ceremony of it.

Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor.
Christianity is lost among them in the trappings and accoutrements of it; with which, instead of adorning religion, they have strangely disguised it, and quite stifled it in the crowd of external rites and ceremonies.

Tillop's Sermon xxviii.
I have seen the pope officiate at St. Peter's, where, for two hours together, he was busied in putting on or off his different accoutrements, according to the different parts he was to act in them.

Addison's Spectator, N^o. 201.
How gay with all th' accoutrements of war,
The Britons come, with gold well-fraught they come.

Phil.
ACCRETION. n. f. [from accretio, Lat.] The act of growing to another, so as to increase it.

Plants do nourish; inanimate bodies do not: they have an accretion, but no alimentation.

Bacon's Natural History, N^o. 602.
The changes seem to be effected by the exhaling of the moisture, which may leave the tingling corpules more dense, and something augmented by the accretion of the oily and earthy parts of that moisture.

Newton's Optics.
Infants support abstinence worst, from the quantity of aliment consumed in accretion.

Arbutnot on Aliments.
ACC'RETIVE. adj. [from accretim.] Growing; that which by growth is added.

If the motion be very slow, we perceive it not: we have no sense of the accretive motion of plants and animals: and the fly shadow steals away upon the dial; and the quickest eye can discover no more but that it is gone.

Glanville's Scipis.

To ACCRO'ACH. v. a. [from accroacher, Fr.] To draw to one as with a hook; to gripe, to draw away by degrees what is another's.

ACCRO'ACHMENT. n. f. [from accroach.] The act of accroaching.

To ACCRU'E. v. n. [from the participle accru, formed from accroître, Fr.]

1. To accede to, to be added to; as, a natural production or effect, without any particular respect to good or ill.

The Son of God, by his incarnation, hath changed the manner of that personal subsistence; no alteration thereby accruing to the nature of God.

Hooker, b. v. § 54.
2. To be added, as an advantage or improvement, in a sense inclining to good rather than ill; in which meaning it is more frequently used by later authors.

From which compact there arising an obligation upon every one, so to convey his meaning, there accrueth also a right to every one, by the same signs, to judge of the sense or meaning of the person so obliged to express himself.

South's Sermons.
Let the evidence of such a particular miracle be never so bright and clear, yet it is still but particular; and must therefore want that kind of force, that degree of influence, which accrueth to a standing general proof, from its having been tried or approved, and consented to, by men of all ranks and capacities, of all tempers and interests, of all ages and nations.

Atterbury's Ser.
3. To append to, or arise from: as, an ill consequence: this sense seems to be less proper.

His scholar Aristotle, as in many other particulars, so likewise in this, did justly oppose him, and became one of the authors; choosing a certain benefit, before the hazard that might accrue from the disreputations of ignorant persons.

Wilkins.
4. In a commercial sense, to be produced, or arise; as, profits.

The yearly benefit that, out of those his works, accrueth to her majesty, amounteth to one thousand pounds.

Carew's Survey.
The great profits which have accrued to the duke of Florence from his free port, have let several of the states of Italy on the same project.

Addison on Italy.
5. To follow, as loss; a vitious use.

The benefit or loss of such a trade accruing to the government, until it comes to take root in the nation.

Temple's Miscellanies.
ACCUBA'TION. n. f. [from accubo, to lie down to, Lat.] The ancient posture of leaning at meals.

It will appear, that accubation, or lying down at meals, was a gesture used by very many nations.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.
To ACCU'MB. v. a. [from accumbo, Lat.] To lie at the table, according to the ancient manner.

Diſt.
ACCUMBENT. adj. [from accumbens, Lat.] Leaning.

The Roman recumbent, or more properly, accumbent posture in eating was introduced after the first Punic war.

Arbutnot on Coins.
To ACCU'MULATE. v. a. [from accumulo, Lat.] To heap one thing upon another; to pile up; to heap together. It is used either literally, as, to accumulate money; or figuratively, as, to accumulate merit or wickedness.

If thou dost slander her, and torture me,
Never pray more; abandon all remorse;
On horrors head horrors accumulate;
For nothing canst thou to damnation add.

Shakespeare's Othello.
Crusht by imaginary treasons weight,
Which too much merit did accumulate.

Sir John Denham.
ACCUMULA'TION. n. f. [from accumulate.]

1. The act of accumulating.

One of my place in Syria, his lieutenant,
For quick accumulation of renown,
Which he achiev'd by th' minute, lost his favour.

Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra.
Some, perhaps, might otherwise wonder at such an accumulation of benefits, like a kind of embroidering, or lifting of one favour upon another.

Wotton.
2. The state of being accumulated.

By the regular returns of it in some people, and their freedom from it after the morbid matter is exhausted, it looks as there were regular accumulations and gatherings of it, as of other humours in the body.

Arbutnot on Dict.
ACCUMULATIVE. adj. [from accumulate.]

1. That which accumulates.

2. That which is accumulated.

If the injury meet not with meekness, it then acquires another accumulative guilt, and stands answerable not only for its own positive ill, but for all the accidental, which it causes in the sufferer.

Government of the Tongue.
ACCUMULA'TOR. n. f. [from accumulate.] He that accumulates; a gatherer or heaper together.

Injuries may fall upon the passive man, yet, without revenge there would be no broils and quarrels, the great accumulators and multipliers of injuries.

Decay of Piety.
ACCURACY. n. f. [from accuratio, Lat.] Exactness, nicety.

This perfect artifice and accuracy might have been omitted, and yet they have made shift to move.

More.
Quickness of imagination is seen in the invention, fertility in the fancy, and the accuracy in the expression.

Dryden.
The man who hath the stupid ignorance, or hardened effrontery! to insult the revealed will of God; or the petulant conceit, to turn it into ridicule; or the arrogance to make his own perfections the measure of the Divinity; or, at best, that can collate a text, or quote an authority, with an insipid accuracy; or demonstrate a plain proposition, in all formality; these now are the only men worth mentioning.

Delany.
We consider the uniformity of the whole design, accuracy of the calculations, and skill in restoring and comparing passages of ancient authors.

Arbutnot on Coins.
ACCURATE. adj. [from accuratus, Lat.]

1. Exact, as opposed to negligence or ignorance, applied to persons.

2. Exact, without defect or failure, applied to things.

No man living has made more accurate trials than Reaumur, that brightest ornament of France.

Colson.
3. Determinate; precisely fixed.

Those conceive the celestial bodies have more accurate influences upon these things below, than indeed they have but in gross.

Bacon.
ACCURATELY. adv. [from accurate.] In an accurate manner; exactly, without error, nicely.

The fine of incidence is either accurately, or very nearly, in a given ratio to the fine of refraction.

Newton.
That all these distances, motions, and quantities of matter, should be so accurately and harmoniously adjusted in this great variety of our system, is above the fortuitous hits of blind material causes, and must certainly, flow from that eternal fountain of wisdom.

Bentley.
ACCURATENESS. n. f. [from accurate.] Exactness, nicety.

But sometime after, suspecting that in making this observation I had not determined the diameter of the sphere with sufficient accurateness, I repeated the experiment.

Newton.
To ACCURSE. v. a. [See CURSE.] To doom to misery; to invoke misery upon any one.

As if it were an unlucky comet, or as if God had so accursed it, that it should never shine to give light in things concerning our duty any way towards him.

Hooker.
When Hildebrand accursed and cast down from his throne Henry IV. there were none so hardy as to defend their lord.

Sir W. Raleigh's Essays.
ACCURSED. part. adj.

1. That which is cursed or doomed to misery.

'Tis the most certain sign the world's accursed,
That the best things corrupted are and worst.

Denham.
2. That which deserves the curse; execrable; hateful, detestable; and, by consequence, wicked; malignant.

A Swift

ACC

A swift blessing

May soon return to this our suffering country,
Under a hand accurs'd! Shak. Macbeth.

The chief part of the misery of wicked men;
and those accurs'd spirits, the devils, is this, that they are of a disposition contrary to God. Tillotson.

They, like the seed from which they sprung,
accurs'd,

Against the Gods immortal hatred nurs'd. Dryden.

ACCUSABLE. adj. [from the verb accuse.] That which may be censured; blameable; culpable.

There would be a manifest defect, and Nature's improvisation were justly accusable; if animals, so subject unto diseases from bilious causes, should want a proper conveyance for cholera.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ACCUSATION. n. f. [from accuse.]

1. The act of accusing.

Thus they in mutual accusation spent
The fruitless hours, but neither self-condemning,
And of their vain contest appear'd no end.

Milton.

2. The charge brought against any one by the accuser.

You read

These accusations, and these grievous crimes
Committed by your person, and your followers.

Shakespeare.

All accusation, in the very nature of the thing,
still supposing, and being founded upon some law:
for where there is no law, there can be no transgression; and where there can be no transgression,
I am sure there ought to be no accusation. South.

3. In the sense of the courts—

A declaration of some crime preferred before a competent judge, in order to inflict some judgment on the guilty person. Ayliffe's Paragon.

ACCUSATIVE. adj. [accusativus, Lat.] a term of grammar, signifying the relation of the noun, on which the action implied in the verb terminates.

ACCUSATORY. adj. [from accuse.] That which produces or containeth an accusation.

In a charge of adultery, the accuser ought to set forth, in the accusatory libel, some certain and definite time. Ayliffe.

TO ACCUSE. v. a. [accuso, Lat.]

1. To charge with a crime. It requires the particle of before the subject of accusation.
He stripp'd the bears foot of its leafy growth;
And, calling western winds, accus'd the spring of flood. Dryden's Virgil.

The professors are accused of all the ill practices which may seem to be the ill consequences of their principles. Addison.

2. It sometimes admits the particle for.

Never send up a leg of a fowl at supper, while there is a cat or a dog in the house, that can be accused for running away with it: But, if there happen to be neither, you must lay it upon the rats, or a strange greyhound. Swift.

3. To blame or censure, in opposition to applause or justification.

Their conscience bearing witness, and their thoughts the mean while accusing or else excusing one another. Rom. ii. 15.

Your valour would your sloth too much accuse,
And therefore, like themselves, they princes choose.

Dryden's Tyrannick Love.

ACCUSER. n. f. [from accuse.] He that brings a charge against another.

There are some persons forbidden to be accusers, on the score of their sex, as women; others, of their age, as pupils and infants; others, upon the account of some crimes committed by them; and others, on the score of some filthy lucre to propose to gain thereby; others, on the score of their conditions, as libertines against their patrons; and, others, through a suspicion of calumny, as having once already given false evidence; and, lastly, others on account of their poverty, as not being worth more than fifty aurei.

Ayliffe's Paragon.

—That good man, who drank the pois'nous draught,

With mind serene, and could not wish to see
His vile accuser drunk as deep as he. Dryden.

ACE

If the person accused maketh his innocence plainly to appear upon his trial, the accuser is immediately put to an ignominious death; and, out of his goods and lands, the innocent person is quadruply recompensed. Gulliver's Travels.

TO ACCUSTOM. v. a. [accostumer, Fr.]

1. To habituate, to enure, with the particle to.
It is used chiefly of persons.

How shall we breathe in other air

Less pure, accustom'd to immortal fruits? Milton.
It has been some advantage to accustom one's self to books of the same edition.

Wat's Improvement of the Mind.

TO ACCUSTOM. v. n. To be wont to do any thing. Obsolete.

A boat over-freighted funk, and all drowned, saying one woman, that in her first popping up again, which most living things accustom, got hold of the boat. Carew.

ACCUSTOMABLE. adj. [from accustom.] Of long custom or habit; habitual, customary.

Animals even of the same original, extraction, and species, may be diversified by accustomable residence in one climate, from what they are in another.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

ACCUSTOMABLY. adv. According to custom.

Touching the king's fines accustomably paid for the purchasing of writs original, I find no certain beginning of them, and do therefore think that they grow up with the chancery.

Bacon's Alienation.

ACCUSTOMANCE. n. f. [accostumance, Fr.] Custom, habit, use.

Through accustomance and negligence, and perhaps some other causes, we neither feel it in our own bodies, nor take notice of it in others. Boyle.

ACCUSTOMARILY. adv. In a customary manner; according to common or customary practice.

Go on, rhetoric, and expose the peculiar emi-nency which you accustomarily marshal before logic to public view. Cleveland.

ACCUSTOMARY. adj. [from accustom.] Usual, practised; according to custom.

ACCUSTOMED. adj. [from accustom.] According to custom; frequent; usual.

Look how the rubs her hands.—It is an accustomed action with her, to seem thus washing her hands: I have known her continue in this a quarter of an hour. Shakespeare. Macbeth.

ACE. n. f. [As not only signified a piece of mone-ny, but any integer, from whence is derived the word ace or unit. Thus As signified the whole inheritance. Arbutnot on Coins.]

1. An unit; a single point on cards or dice.

When lots are shuffled together in a lap, urn, or pitcher; or if a man blindfold casts a die, what reason in the world can he have to presume, that he shall draw a white stone rather than a black, or throw an ace rather than a six. South.

2. A small quantity; a particle; an atom.

He will not bate an ace of absolute certainty;
but however doubtful or improbable the thing is,
coming from him it must go for an indisputable truth. Government of the Tongue.

I'll not wag an ace further: the whole world shall not bribe me to it. Dryden's Spanish Friar.

ACE'PHALOUS. adj. [ἀκεφαλος, Gr.] Without a head. Diët.

ACE'RE. adj. [acerbus, Lat.] Acid, with an addition of roughness, as most fruits are before they are ripe. Quincy.

ACE'RITY. n. f. [acerbitas, Lat.]

1. A rough four taste.

2. Applied to men, sharpness of temper; severity.

True it is, that the talents for criticism, namely, smartness, quick censure, vivacity of remark, indeed all but acerbity, seem rather the gifts of youth than of old age. Pope.

TO ACERVATE. v. a. [acervo, Lat.] to heap up. Diët.

ACERVATION. n. f. [from acervate.] The act of heaping together.

ACERVOSE. adj. Full of heaps. Diët.

ACERSCENT. adj. [acerescens, Lat.] That which has a tendency to sourness or acidity.

ACI

The same persons, perhaps, had enjoyed their health as well with a mixture of animal diet, qualified with a sufficient quantity of acescents; as bread, vinegar, and fermented liquors. Arbut. on Al.

ACET O'SE. adj. That which has in it any thing four. Diët.

ACETO'SITY. n. f. [from acetose.] The state of being acetose, or of containing sourness. Diët.

ACE'TOUS. adj. [from acetum, vinegar, Lat.]
Having the quality of vinegar, four.

Raisins, which consist chiefly of the juice of grapes, inspissated in the skins or husks by the avolation of the superfluous moisture through their pores, being distilled in a retort, did not afford any vinous, but rather an acetous spirit. Boyle.

ACHE. n. f. [ace, Sax. æce, Gr. now generally written ake; and in the plural akes, of one syllable; the primitive manner being preserved chiefly in poetry, for the sake of the measure.]
A continued pain. See AKE.

I'll rack thee with old cramps;

Fill all thy bones with aches, make thee roar,
That beasts shall tremble at thy din. Shakespeare.

A coming show'r your shooting corns preface,
Old aches throb, your hollow tooth will rage.

Swift.

TO ACHE. v. n. [See ACHE.] To be in pain.

Upon this account, our senses are dulled and spent by any extraordinary intention, and our very eyes will ache, if long fixed upon any difficultly discerned object. Glanville.

TO ACH'VEVE. v. a. [achever, Fr. to complete.]

1. To perform, to finish a design prosperously.

Our toils, my friends, are crown'd with sure success:

The greater part perform'd, achieve the less.

Dryden.

2. To gain, to obtain.

Experience is by industry achiev'd,
And perfected by the swift course of time. Shak.

Tranio, I burn, I pine, I perish, Tranio,
If I achieve not this young modest girl. Shakespeare.

Thou hast achiev'd our liberty, confin'd

Within hell-gates till now. Milton.

Show all the spoils by valiant kings achiev'd,

And groaning nations by their arms reliev'd.

Prior.

ACH'EVER. n. f. He that performs; he that obtains what he endeavours after.

A victory is twice itself, when the achiever brings home full numbers.

Shakespeare's Much ado about Nothing.

AN ACH'VEMENT. n. f. [achievement, Fr.]

1. The performance of an action.

From every coast that heaven walks about,
Have thither come the noble martial crew,
That famous hard achievements still pursue.

Fairy Queen.

2. The escutcheon, or ensigns armorial, granted to any man for the performance of great actions.

Then shall the war, and stern debate, and strife
Immortal, be the bus'ness of my life;

And in thy fame, the dusty spoils among,
High on the burnish'd roof, my banner shall be hung;

Rank'd with my champion's bucklers, and below,
With arms revers'd, the achievements of the foe.

Dryden.

Achievement, in the first sense, is derived from achieve, as it signifies to perform; in the second,
from achieve, as it imports to gain.

ACHING. n. f. [from ache.] Pain; uneasiness.

When old age comes to wait upon a great and worshipful sinner, it comes attended with many painful girds and achings called the gout. South.

ACHOR. n. f. [achor, Lat. ἀχρ, Gr. furfur.]

A species of the herpes; it appears with a crusty scab, which causes an itching on the surface of the head, occasioned by a salt sharp serum oozing through the skin. Quincy.

AC'ID. adj. [acidus, Lat. acide, Fr.] Sour, sharp.

Wild trees last longer than garden trees; and in the same kind, those whose fruit is acid, more than those whose fruit is sweet.

Bacon's Natural History.

Diët.

D 2

Acid, or four, proceeds from a salt of the same nature, without mixture of oil; in austere tastes the oily parts have not disentangled themselves from the salts and earthy parts; such is the taste of unripe fruits.

Arbutnot on Aliments

Liquors and substances are called acids, which being composed of pointed particles, affect the taste in a sharp and piercing manner. The common way of trying, whether any particular liquor hath in it any particles of this kind, is by mixing it with syrup of violets, when it will turn of a red colour; but if it contains alkaline or lixivial particles, it changes that syrup green.

Quincy.

ACIDITY. n. f. [from acid.] The quality of being acid; an acid taste; sharpness; sourness.

Fishes, by the help of a dissolvent liquor, corrode and reduce their meat, skin, bones, and all, into a chylus or cremor; and yet this liquor manifests nothing of acidity to the taste.

Ray.

When the taste of the mouth is bitter, it is a sign of a redundancy of a bilious alkali, and demands a quite different diet from the case of acidity or sourness.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

ACIDNESS. n. f. [from acid.] The quality of being acid; acidity. See ACIDITY.

ACIDULE. n. f. [that is, aque acidule.]

Medicinal springs impregnated with sharp particles, as all the nitrous, chalybeate, and alum springs are.

Quincy.

The acidule, or medical springs, emit a greater quantity of their minerals than usual; and even the ordinary springs, which were before clear, fresh, and limpid, become thick and turbid, and are impregnated with sulphur and other minerals, as long as the earthquake lasts.

Woodward's Natural History.

To ACIDULATE. v. a. [aciduler, Fr.] To impregnate or tinge with acids in a slight degree.

A diet of fresh unfalted things, watery liquors acidulated, farinaceous emollient substances, four milk, butter, and acid fruits. Arbutnot on Aliments.

To ACKNOWLEDGE. v. a. [a word formed, as it seems, between the Latin and English, from agnosco, and knowledge, which is deduced from the Saxon, cnapan, to know.]

1. To own the knowledge of; to own any thing or person in a particular character.

My people do already know my mind,

And will acknowledge you and Jessica,
In place of Lord Bassanio and myself. Shakespeare.

None that acknowledge God, or providence,
Their souls eternity did ever doubt. Davies.

2. To confess; as, a fault.

For I acknowledge my transgressions; and my sin is ever before me. Psalms li. 3.

3. To own; as, a benefit; sometimes with the particle to before the person conferring the benefit.

His spirit

Taught them; but they his gifts acknowledged not. Milton.

In the first place, therefore, I thankfully acknowledge to the Almighty power the assistance he has given me in the beginning, and the prosecution of my present studies. Dryden.

ACKNOWLEDGING. adj. [from acknowledge.] Grateful; ready to acknowledge benefits received. A Gallicism, reconcilliant.

He has shewn his hero acknowledging and ungrateful, compassionate and hard-hearted; but, at the bottom, fickle and self-interested.

Dryden's Virgil.

ACKNOWLEDGMENT. n. f. [from acknowledge.] 1. Concession of any character in another; as, existence, superiority.

The due contemplation of the human nature doth, by an necessary connexion and chain of causes, carry us up to the unavoidable acknowledgment of the Deity; because it carries every thinking man to an original of every successive individual.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

2. Concession of the truth of any position. Immediately upon the acknowledgment of the christian faith, the eunuch was baptized by Philip. Hooker.

3. Confession of a fault.

4. Confession of a benefit received; gratitude.

5. Act of attestation to any concession; such as homage.

There be many wide countries in Ireland, in which the laws of England were never established, nor any acknowledgment of subjection made.

Spenser's State of Ireland.

6. Something given or done in confession of a benefit received.

The second is an acknowledgment to his majesty for the leave of fishing upon his coasts; and though this may not be grounded upon any treaty, yet, if it appear to be an ancient right on our side, and custom on theirs, not determined or extinguished by any treaty between us, it may with justice be insisted on.

Temple's Miscellanies.

ACME. n. f. [ἀκμή, Gr.]

The height of any thing; more especially used to denote the height of a distemper, which is divided into four periods. 1. The arête, the beginning or first attack. 2. Anabasis, the growth.

3. Acme, the height. And, 4. Paracme which is the declension of the distemper. Quincy.

ACOLUTHIST. n. f. [ἀκολούθῳ, Gr.] One of the lowest order in the Romish church, whose office is to prepare the elements for the offices, to light the church, &c.

It is duty, according to the papal law, when the bishop sings mass, to order all the inferior clergy to appear in their proper habits; and to see that all the offices of the church be rightly performed; to ordain the acolutists, to keep the sacred vessels.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

ACOLYTE. n. f. The same with ACOLUTHIST.

ACONITE. n. f. [aconitum, Lat.] Properly the herb wolfs-bane, but commonly used in poetical language for poison in general.

Our land is from the rage of tygers freed,

Nor nourishes the lion's angry feed;

Nor pois'nous aconite is here produc'd,

Or grows unknown, or is, when known, re-fus'd. Dryden.

Despair, that aconite does prove,

And certain death to others, love,

That poison never yet withstood,

Does nourish mine, and turns to blood. Gran.

ACORN. n. f. [Æcurn, Sax. from ac, an oak, and corn, corn or grain; that is, the grain or fruit of the oak.] The seed or fruit borne by the oak.

Errours, such as are but acorns in our younger brows, grow oaks in our older heads, and become inflexible. Brown.

Content with food which nature freely bred,

On wildings and on strawberries they fed;

Cornels and bramble-berries gave the rest,

And falling acorns furnish'd out a feast. Dryden's Ovid.

He that is nourished by the acorns he picked up under an oak, or the apples he gathered from the trees in the wood, has certainly appropriated them to himself. Locke.

ACORNEO. adj. [from acorn.] Stored with acorns.

Like a full acorn'd boar. Shakespeare.

ACOSTICKS. n. f. [ἀκούστικα of ἀκούω, Gr. to hear.]

1. The doctrine or theory of sounds.

2. Medicines to help the hearing. Quincy.

To ACQUAINT. v. a. [acquaint, Fr.]

1. To make familiar with; applied either to persons or things.

It has with before the object.

We that acquaint ourselves with ev'ry zone,

And pass the tropicks, and behold each pole;

When we come home, are to ourselves unknown,

And unacquainted still with our own soul. Davies.

There with thee, new welcome faint,

Like fortunes may her soul acquaint. Milton.

Before a man can speak on any subject, it is necessary to be acquainted with it. Locke on Edu.

Acquaint yourselves with things ancient and modern, natural, civil, and religious, domestic and national; things of your own and foreign countries; and, above all, be well acquainted with God and yourselves; learn animal nature, and the workings of your own spirits. Watt's Logic.

2. To inform. With is more in use before the object than of.

But for some other reasons, my grave Sir,

Which is not fit you know, I not acquaint

My father of this business. Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.

A friend in the country acquaints me, that two or three men of the town are got among them, and have brought words and phrases, which were never before in those parts. Tatler.

ACQUAINTANCE. n. f. [acquaintance, Fr.]

1. The state of being acquainted with; familiarity, knowledge.

It is applied as well to persons as things, with the particle with.

Nor was his acquaintance less with the famous poets of his age, than with the noblemen and ladies. Dryden.

Our admiration of a famous man lessens upon our nearer acquaintance with him; and we seldom hear of a celebrated person, without a catalogue of some notorious weaknesses and infirmities. Addison.

Would we be admitted into an acquaintance with God: let us study to resemble him. We must be partakers of a divine nature, in order to partake of this high privilege and alliance. Atterbury.

2. Familiar knowledge, simply without a preposition.

Brave foldier, pardon me,
That any accent breaking from thy tongue,
Should scape the true acquaintance of mine ear. Shakespeare.

This keeps the understanding long in converse with an object, and long converse brings acquaintance. South.

In what manner he lived with those who were of his neighbourhood and acquaintance, how obliging his carriage was to them, what kind offices he did, and was always ready to do them, I forbear particularly to say. Atterbury.

3. A slight or initial knowledge, short of friendship, as applied to persons.

I hope I am pretty near seeing you, and therefore I would cultivate an acquaintance; because if you do not know me when we meet, you need only keep one of my letters, and compare it with my face; for my face and letters are counterparts of my heart. Swift to Pope.

A long novice of acquaintance should precede the vows of friendship. Bolingbroke.

4. The person with whom we are acquainted; him of whom we have some knowledge, without the intimacy of friendship.

In this sense, the plural is, in some authors, acquaintance, in others acquaintances.

But she, all vow'd unto the red-cross knight,
His wand'ring peril closely did lament.

Ne in this new acquaintance could delight,
But her dear heart with anguish did torment. Fairy Queen.

That young men travel under some tutor, I allow well, so that he be such a one that may be able to tell them, what acquaintances they are to seek, what exercises or discipline the place yieldeth. Bacon.

This, my lord, has justly acquired you as many friends, as there are persons who have the honour to be known to you; mere acquaintance you have none, you have drawn them all into a nearer line; and they who have conversed with you, are for ever after inviolably yours. Dryden.

We see he is ashamed of his nearest acquaintances. Boyle against Beccles.

ACQUAINTED. [from acquaint.] Familiar; well known; not new.

Now call we our high court of parliament;
That war or peace, or both at once may be

As things acquainted and familiar to us. Shakespeare.

ACQUEST. n. f. [acquest, Fr. from acquies, written by some acquist, with a view to the word word acquire, or acquisita.] Attachment, acquisition; the thing gained.

New acquests are more burden than strength.

Mud, reposed near the osten of rivers, makes continual additions to the land, thereby excluding the sea, and preserving these shells as trophies and signs of its new acquests and encroachments.

To ACQUIESCE. v. n. acquiesce, Fr. acquiescere, Lat.] To rest in, or remain satisfied with, without opposition or discontent. It has in before the object.

Others will, upon account of the receivedness of the proposed opinion, think it rather worthy to be examined than acquiesced in.

Neither a bare approbation of, nor a mere wishing, nor unactive complacency in; nor, lastly, a natural inclination to things virtuous and good, can pass before God for a man's willing of such things; and, consequently, if men, upon this account, will needs take up and acquiesce in an airy ungrounded persuasion, that they will those things which really they not will, they fall thereby into a gross and fatal delusion.

He hath employed his transcendent wisdom and power, that by these he might make way for his benignity, as the end wherein they ultimately acquiesce.

ACQUIESCENCE. n. f. [from acquiesce.]

1. A silent appearance of content, distinguished on one side from avowed consent, on the other from opposition.

Neither from any of the nobility, nor of the clergy, who were thought most averse from it, there appeared any sign of contradiction to that; but an entire acquiescence in all the bishops thought fit to do.

2. Satisfaction, rest, content.

Many indeed have given over their pursuits after fame, either from disappointment, or from experience of the little pleasure which attends it, or the better informations or natural coldness of old age; but seldom from a full satisfaction and acquiescence in their present enjoyments of it.

3. Submission; confidence.

The greatest part of the world take up their persuasions concerning good and evil, by an implicit faith, and a full acquiescence in the word of those, who shall represent things to them under these characters.

ACQUIRABLE. adj. [from acquire.] That which may be acquired or obtained; attainable.

Those rational instincts, the connate principles engraven in the human soul, though they are truths acquirable and deducible by rational consequence and argumentation, yet seem to be inscribed in the very crasis and texture of the soul, antecedent to any acquisition by industry or the exercise of the discursive faculty in man.

If the powers of cogitation and volition, and sensation, are neither inherent in matter as such, nor acquirable to matter by any motion or modification of it; it necessarily follows, that they proceed from some cogitative substance, some incorporeal inhabitant within us, which we call spirit and soul.

To ACQUIRE. v. a. [accuerir, Fr. acquiere, Lat.]

1. To gain by one's own labour or power; to obtain what is not received from nature, or transmitted by inheritance.

Better to leave undone than by our deed Acquire too high fame, while he, we serve, 's away.

2. To come to; to attain.

Motion cannot be perceived without the perception of its terms, viz. the parts of space which it immediately left, and those which it next acquires.

ACQUIRED. particip. adj. [from acquire.] Gained by one's self in opposition to those things which are bestowed by nature.

We are seldom at ease, and free enough from the solicitation of our natural or adopted desires; but a constant succession of uneasinesses, out of that stock, which nature wants, or acquired habits, have heaped up, take the will in their turns.

An ACQUIRER. n. f. [from acquire.] The person that acquires; a gainer.

An ACQUIREMENT. n. f. [from acquire.] That which is acquired; gain; attainment. The word may be properly used in opposition to the gifts of nature.

These his acquirements, by industry, were exceedingly both enriched and enlarged by many excellent endowments of nature.

By a content and acquiescence in every species of truth, we embrace the shadow thereof; or so much as may palliate its just and substantial acquirements.

It is very difficult to lay down rules for the acquisition of a taste. The faculty must, in some degree, be born with us.

ACQUISITION. n. f. [acquisition, Lat.]

1. The act of acquiring or gaining.

Each man has but a limited right to the good things of the world; and the natural allowed way, by which he is to compass the possession of these things, is by his own industrious acquisition of them.

2. The thing gained; acquirement.

Great Sir, all acquisition

Of glory as of empire, here I lay before

Your royal feet.

A state can never arrive to its period in a more deplorable crisis, than when some prince lies hovering like a vulture to dismember its dying carcass; by which means it becomes only an acquisition to some mighty monarchy, without hopes of a resurrection.

ACQUISITIVE. adj. [acquisitivus, Lat.] That which is acquired or gained.

He died not in his acquisitive but in his native soil; nature herself, as it were, claiming a final interest in his body, when fortune had done with him.

ACQUIST. n. f. [See ACQUEST.] Acquirement; attainment; gain. Not in use.

His servant he with new acquist Of true experience from this great event, With peace and consolation hath dismissed.

To ACQUIT. v. a. [acquiter, Fr. See QUIT.]

1. To set free.

Ne do I wish (for wishing were but vain) To be acquit from my continual smart;

But joy her thrall for ever to remain,

And yield for pledge my poor captived heart.

2. To clear from a charge of guilt; to absolve; opposed to condemn, either simply with an accusative, as, the jury acquitted him, or with the particles from or of, which is more common, before the crime.

If I sin, then thou markest me, and thou wilt not acquit me from mine iniquity.

By the suffrage of the most and best he is already acquitted, and, by the sentence of some, condemned.

He that judges, without informing himself to the utmost that he is capable, cannot acquit himself of judging amiss.

Neither do I reflect upon the memory of his majesty, whom I entirely acquit of any imputation.

3. To clear from any obligation.

Steady to my principles, and not dispirited with my afflictions, I have, by the blessing of God on my endeavours, overcome all difficulties; and in some measure, acquitted myself of the debt which I owed the public when I undertook this work.

4. In a similar sense, it is said, The man hath acquitted himself well; that is, he hath discharged his duty.

ACQUITMENT. n. f. [from acquit.] The state of being acquitted; or act of acquitting.

The word imports properly an acquittal or discharge of a man upon some precedent accusation, and a full trial and cognizance of his cause had thereupon.

ACQUITTAL. n. f. in law, is a deliverance and setting free from the suspicion or guiltiness of an offence.

The constant design of both these orators, was to drive some one particular point, either the condemnation or acquittal of an accused person.

To ACQUITTANCE. v. n. To procure an acquittance; to acquit: a word not in present use.

But if black scandal and foul-fac'd reproach, Attend the sequel of your imposition, Your mere enforcement shall acquittance me From all the impure blots and stains thereof.

ACQUITTANCE. n. f. [from acquit.]

1. The act of discharging from a debt.

But soon shall find

Forbearance, no acquittance, ere day end

Justice shall not return, as beauty, scorn'd.

2. A writing testifying the receipt of a debt.

You can produce acquittances

For such a sum, from special officers

Of Charles his father.

They quickly pay their debt, and then

Take no acquittances, but pay again.

The same man bought and sold to himself, paid

the money, and gave the acquittance.

ACRE. n. f. [Æcre, Sax.] A quantity of land containing in length forty perches, and four in breadth, or four thousand eight hundred and forty square yards.

Search ev'ry acre in the high-grown field,

And bring him to our eye.

ACRID. adj. [acer, Lat.] Of a hot biting taste;

bitter; so as to leave a painful heat upon the organs of taste.

Bitter and acid differ only by the sharp particles of the first, being involved in a greater quantity of oil than those of the last.

ACRIMONIOUS. adj. Abounding with acrimony;

sharp; corrosive.

If gall cannot be rendered acrimonious, and bitter of itself, then whatever acrimony or amaritude redounds in it, must be from the admixture of melancholy.

ACRIMONY. n. f. [acrimonia, Lat.]

1. Sharpness, corrosiveness.

There be plants that have a milk in them when they are cut; as, figs, old lettuce, sow-thistles, spurge. The cause may be an inception of putrefaction:

for those milks have all an acrimony,

though one would think they should be lenitive.

Bacon's Natural History.

The chymists define salt, from some of its properties, to be a body fusible in the fire, congealable again

by cold into brittle glebes or crystals, soluble in water, so as to disappear, not malleable, and having something in it which affects the organs of taste with a sensation of acrimony or sharpness.

2. Sharpness of temper, severity, bitterness of thought or language.

John the Baptist set himself, with much acrimony

and indignation, to baffle this senseless arrogant conceit of theirs, which made them huff at the doctrine of repentance, as a thing below them, and not at all belonging to them.

ACRITUDE. n. f. [from acid.] An acid taste;

a biting heat on the palate.

In green vitriol, with its astringent and sweetish tastes, is joined some acritude.

ACROAMATICAL. adj. [acroamatia, Gr. I bear.]

Of or pertaining to deep learning; the opposite of exoterical.

ACROATICS. n. f. [Acroaticus, Gr.] Aristotle's lectures on the more nice and principal parts of philosophy, to whom none but friends and scholars were admitted by him.

ACRONYCAL. adj. [from ἀκρον, summus, and νύξ, nox; importing the beginning of night.] A term of astronomy, applied to the stars, of which the rising or setting is called acronyral, when they either

either appear above or sink below the horizon at the time of sunset. It is opposed to refracted.

ACRONYCALLY. adv. [from acronymical.] At the acronymical time.

He is tempestuous in the summer, when he rises heliacally, and rainy in the winter, when he rises acronymically. Dryden.

ACROSPIRE. n. f. [from ἀκρῶς and σπίρη, Gr.] A shoot or sprout from the end of seeds before they are put in the ground.

Many corns will smilt, or have their pulp turned into a substance like thick cream; and will send forth their substance in an acrospire. Mortimer.

ACROSPURED. part. adj. Having sprouts, or having shot out.

For want of turning when the malt is spread on the floor, it comes and sprouts at both ends, which is called acrospured, and is fit only for wine. Mortimer.

ACROSS. adv. [from a for at, or the French à, as it is used in à travers, and crois.] Athwart, laid over something so as to cross it.

The harp hath the concave not along the strings, but across the strings; and no harp hath the sound so melting and prolonged as the Irish harp. Bacon.

This view'd, but not enjoy'd, with arms across, He stood, reflecting on his country's loss. Dryden.

There is a set of artificers, who, by the help of several poles, which they lay across each others shoulders, build themselves up into a kind of pyramid: so that you see a pile of men in the air of four or five rows rising one above another. Addison.

AN ACROSTICK. n. f. [from ἀκρῶς and στίχ, Gr.] A poem in which the first letters of every line being taken, makes up the name of the person or thing on which the poem is written.

ACROSTICK. adj.

1. That which relates to an acrostick.

2. That which contains acrosticks.

Leave writing plays, and choose for thy command

Some peaceful province in acrostick land:
There thou may'st wings display, and altars raise,
And torture one poor word ten thousand ways. Dryden.

ACROTERS, or ACROTHERIA. n. f. [from ἀκρῶς, Gr. the extremity of any body.] Little pedestals without bases, placed at the middle and the two extremes of pediments, sometimes serving to support statues.

TO ACT. v. n. [ago, actum, Lat.]

1. To be in action, not to rest.

He hangs between in doubt to act or rest. Pope.

2. To perform the proper functions.

Albeit the will is not capable of being compelled to any of its actings, yet it is capable of being made to act with more or less difficulty, according to the different impressions it receives from motives or objects. South.

3. To practise arts or duties; to conduct one's self.

'Tis plain, that the who, for a kingdom now,
Would sacrifice her love, and break her vow,
Not out of love, but interest, acts alone,
And would, ev'n in my arms, lie thinking of a throne. Dryden's Conquest of Granada.

The desire of happiness, and the constraint it puts upon us to act for it, no body accounts an abridgment of liberty. Locke.

The splendor of his office, is the token of that sacred character which he inwardly bears: and one of these ought constantly to put him in mind of the other, and excite him to act up to it, through the whole course of his administration. Atterbury's Sermons.

It is our part and duty to co-operate with this grace, vigorously to exert those powers, and act up to those advantages to which it restores us. He has given eyes to the blind, and feet to the lame. Rogers's Sermons.

4. To produce effects in some passive subject.

Hence 'tis we wait the wondrous cause to find
How body acts upon impassive mind. Garth's Disf.
The stomach, the intestines, the muscles of the lower belly, all act upon the aliment; besides, the chyle is not sucked, but squeezed into the mouths of the lacteals, by the action of the fibres of the guts. Arbutnot on Aliments.

TO ACT. v. a.

1. To bear a borrowed character; as, a stage-player.

Honour and shame from no condition rise;

Act well your part, there all the honour lies. Pope.

2. To counterfeit; to feign by action.

His former trembling once again renew'd,
With acted fear the villain thus pursu'd. Dryden.

3. To actuate; to put in motion; to regulate the movements.

Most people in the world are acted by levity and humour, by strange and irrational changes. South.

Perhaps they are as proud as Lucifer, as covetous as Demas, as false as Judas, and, in the whole course of their conversation, act, and are acted, not by devotion, but design. South.

We suppose two distinct, incommunicable consciousnesses acting the same body, the one constantly by day, the other by night; and, on the other side, the same consciousness acting by intervals two distinct bodies. Locke.

ACT. n. f. [actum, Lat.]

1. Something done; a deed; an exploit, whether good or ill.

A lower place, not well,

May make too great an act:

Better to leave undone than by our deed

Acquire too high a fame. Shaksp. Ant. and Cleop.

The conscious wretch must all his acts reveal;
Loth to confess, unable to conceal;

From the first moment of his vital breath,
To his last hour of unrepenting death. Dryden.

2. Agency; the power of producing an effect.

I will try the forces

Of these thy compounds on such creatures as
We count not worth the hanging; but none human;

To try the vigour of them, and apply
Allayments to their act; and by them gather

Their several virtues and effects. Shaksp. Cymb.

3. Action; the performance of exploits; production of effects.

'Tis so much in your nature to do good, that your life is but one continued act of placing benefits on many, as the sun is always carrying his light to some part or other of the world. Dryden's Fables.

Who forth from nothing call'd this comely frame,
His will and act, his word and work the same. Prior.

4. The doing of some particular thing; a step taken, a purpose executed.

This act persuades me,

That this remotion of the duke and her,
Is practice only. Shaksp. King Lear.

5. A state of reality; effort.

The feeds of herbs and plants at the first are not in act, but in possibility that which they afterwards grow to be. Hooker.

God alone excepted, who actually and everlastingly is whatsoever he may be, and which cannot hereafter be that which now he is not; all other things besides are somewhat in possibility, which as yet they are not in act. Hooker.

Sure they're conscious

Of some intended mischief, and are fled
To put it into act. Denham's Sophy.

6. Incipient agency; tendency to an effort.

Her legs were buskin'd, and the left before;
In act to shoot, a silver bow she bore. Dryden.

7. A part of a play, during which the action proceeds without interruption.

Many never doubt but the whole condition required by Christ, the repentance he came to preach, will, in that last scene of their last act, immediately before the exit, be as opportunely and acceptably performed, as at any other point of their lives. Hammond's Fundamentals.

Five acts are the just measure of a play. Reform.

ACT

ACT

8. A decree of a court of justice, or edict of a legislature.

They make edicts for usury to support usurers, repeal daily any wholesome act established against the rich, and provide more piercing statutes daily to chain up and restrain the poor. Shaksp. Coriolanus.

You that are king, though he do wear the crown,
Have caus'd him, by new act of parliament,

To blot out me. Shaksp. Henry VI.

9. Record of judicial proceedings.

Judicial acts are all those matters which relate to judicial proceedings; and being reduced into writing by a publick notary, are recorded by the authority of the judge. Ayliffe.

ACTION. n. f. [actio, Fr. actio, Lat.]

1. The quality or state of acting, opposite to rest.

O noble English! that could entertain

With half their forces the full power of France;
And let another half stand laughing by,

All out of work, and cold for action. Shaksp. Henry V.

2. An act or thing done; a deed.

This action, I now go on,

Is for my better grace. Shak. Winter's Tale.

God never accepts a good inclination instead of a good action, where that action may be done; nay, so much the contrary, that, if a good inclination be not seconded by a good action, the want of that action is made so much the more criminal and inexcusable. South.

3. Agency, operation.

It is better, therefore, that the earth should move about its own center, and make those useful vicissitudes of night and day, than expose always the same side to the action of the sun. Bentley.

He has settled laws, and laid down rules conformable to which natural bodies are governed in their actions upon one another. Cheyne.

4. The series of events represented in a fable.

This action should have three qualifications. First, it should be but one action; secondly, it should be an entire action; and, thirdly, it should be a great action. Addison.

5. Gesticulation; the accordance of the motions of the body with the words spoken; a part of oratory.

—He that speaks doth grip the hearer's wrist,
While he that hears makes fearful action

With wrinkled brows. Shak. King John.

Our orators are observed to make use of less gesture or action than those of other countries. Addison.

6. [In law.] It is used with the preposition against before the person, and for before the thing.

Actions are personal, real, and mixt: action personal belongs to a man against another, by reason of any contract, offence, or cause, of like force with a contract or offence made or done by him or some other, for whose fact he is to answer.

Action real is given to any man against another, that possesses the thing required or sued for in his own name, and no other man's. Action mixt, is that which lies as well against or for the thing which we seek, as against the person that hath it; called mixt, because it hath a mixt respect both to the thing and to the person.

Action is divided into civil, penal, and mixt. Action civil is that which tends only to the recovery of that which is due to us; as a sum of money formerly lent. Action penal is that which aims at some penalty or punishment in the party sued, be it corporal or pecuniary: as, in common law, the next friends of a man feloniously slain shall pursue the law against the murderer. Action mixt is that which seeks both the thing whereof we are deprived, and a penalty also for the unjust detaining of the same.

Action upon the case, is an action given for redress of wrongs done without force against any man, by law not specially provided for.

Action upon the statute, is an action brought against a man upon breach of a statute. Covell.

There was never man could have a juster action

ACT

than against filthy fortune than I, since, all other things being granted me, her blindness is the only left.

For our reward then,

First, all our debts are paid; dangers of law, Actions, decrees, judgments, against us quitted.

B. Jonson.

7. In the plural, in France, the same as stocks in England.

ACTIONABLE, adj. [from action.] That which admits an action in law to be brought against it; punishable.

His process was formed; whereby he was found guilty of nought else, that I could learn, which was actionable, but of ambition.

Howell's Vocal Forest.

No man's face is actionable: these singularities are interpretable from more innocent causes.

Collier.

ACTIONARY, or ACTIONIST, n. f. [from action.] One that has a share in actions or stocks.

ACTION-TAKING, adj. Accustomed to resent by means of law; litigious.

A knave, a rascal, a filthy worsted-stocking knave; a lily-liver'd action-taking knave.

Shak.

ACTITATION, n. f. [from actito, Lat.] Action quick and frequent.

Ditt.

TO ACTIVATE, v. a. [from active.] To make active.

This word is perhaps used only by the author alleged.

As snow and ice, especially being holpen, and their cold activated by nitre or salt, will turn water into ice, and that in a few hours; so it may be, it will turn wood or stiff clay into stone, in longer time.

Bacon.

ACTIVE, adj. [from active, Lat.]

1. That which has the power or quality of acting.

These particles have not only a vis inertiae, accompanied with such passive laws of motion, as naturally result from that force, but also they are moved by certain active principles, such as is that of gravity, and that which causes fermentation, and the cohesion of bodies.

Newton's Optics.

2. That which acts, opposed to passive, or that which suffers.

—When an even flame two hearts did touch, His office was indulgently to fit

Actives to passives, correspondency Only his subject was.

Donne.

If you think that, by multiplying the additions in the same proportion that you multiply the ore, the work will follow, you may be deceived: for quantity in the passive will add more resistance than the quantity in the active will add force.

Bacon.

3. Busy, engaged in action; opposed to idle or sedentary, or any state of which the duties are performed only by the mental powers.

'Tis virtuous action that must praise bring forth, Without which flow advice is little worth; Yet they who give good counsel praise deserve, Tho' in the active part they cannot serve.

Denham.

4. Practical; not merely theoretical.

The world hath had in these men fresh experience, how dangerous such active errors are.

Hooker.

5. Nimble; agile; quick.

Some bend the stubborn bow for victory; And some with darts their active sinews try.

Dryden.

6. In grammar.

A verb active is that which signifies action, as I teach.

Clarke's Latin Grammar.

ACTIVELY, adv. [from active.] In an active manner; busily; nimbly. In an active signification; as, the word is used actively.

ACTIVENESS, n. f. [from active.] The quality of being active; quickness; nimbleness. This is a word more rarely used than activity.

What strange agility and activeness do our common tumblers and dancers on the rope attain to, by continual exercise?

Wilkins's Mathematical Magic.

ACTIVITY, n. f. [from active.] The quality of being active, applied either to things or persons.

ACT

Salt put to ice, as in the producing of the artificial ice, increaseth the activity of cold.

Bacon.

Our adversary will not be idle, though we are; he watches every turn of our foul, and incident of our life; and, if we remit our activity, will take advantage of our indolence.

Rogers.

ACTOR, n. f. [from actor, Lat.]

1. He that acts, or performs any thing.

The virtues of either age may correct the defects of both: and good for succession, that young men may be learners, while men in age are actors.

Bacon.

He who writes an Encomium Neronis, if he does it heartily, is himself but a transcript of Nero in his mind, and would gladly enough see such pranks, as he was famous for, acted again, though he dares not be the actor of them himself.

South.

2. He that personates a character; a stage-player.

Would you have

Such an Herculean actor in the scene, And not this hydra? They must sweat no less To fit their properties, than t' express their parts.

Ben Jonson.

When a good actor doth his part present, In every act he our attention draws,

That at the last he may find just applause.

Denham.

These false beauties of the stage are no more lasting than a rain-bow; when the actor ceases to shine upon them, they vanish in a twinkling.

Dryden's Spanish Friar.

ACTRESS, n. f. [from actrix, Fr.]

1. She that performs any thing.

Virgil has, indeed, admitted Fame, as an actress in the Æneids; but the part she acts is very short, and none of the most admired circumstances of that divine work.

Addison.

We sprights have just such natures We had, for all the world, when human creatures;

And therefore I that was an actress here, I play all my tricks in hell, a goblin there.

Dryden.

2. A woman that plays on the stage.

ACTUAL, adj. [from actual, Fr.]

1. That which comprises action.

In this slumbry agitation, besides her walking and other actual performances, what, at any time, have you heard her say?

Shakespeare's Macbeth.

2. Really in act; not merely potential.

Sin, there in pow'r before Once actual; now in body, and to dwell

Habitual habitant.

Milton.

3. In act; not purely in speculation.

For he that but conceives a crime in thought, Contracts the danger of an actual fault: Then what must he expect, that still proceeds To finish sin, and work up thoughts to deeds?

Dryden.

ACTUALITY, n. f. [from actual.] The state of being actual.

The actuality of these spiritual qualities is thus imbrisoned, though their potentiality be not quite destroyed; and thus a crafts, extended, impenetrable, passive, divisible, unintelligent substance is generated, which we call matter.

Cheyne.

ACTUALLY, adv. [from actual.] In act; in effect; really.

All mankind acknowledge themselves able and sufficient to do many things, which actually they never do.

South.

Read one of the chronicles, and you will think you were reading a history of the kings of Israel or Judah, where the historians were actually inspired, and where, by a particular scheme of providence, the kings were distinguished by judgments or blessings, according as they promoted idolatry, or the worship of the true God.

Addison.

Though our temporal prospects should be full of danger, or though the days of sorrow should actually overtake us, yet still we must repose ourselves on God.

Rogers.

ACTUALNESS, n. f. [from actual.] The quality of being actual.

ACTUARY, n. f. [from actuarius, Lat.] The register who compiles the minutes of the proceedings of a court; a term of the civil law.

ACU

Suppose the judge should say, that he would have the keeping of the acts of court remain with him, and the notary will have the custody of them with himself: certainly, in this case, the actuary or writer of them ought to be preferred.

Ayliffe.

ACTUATE, adj. [from the verb To actuate.] Put into action; animated; brought into effect.

The active informations of the intellect, filling the passive reception of the will, like form clothing with matter, grew actuate into a third and distinct perfection of practice.

South.

TO ACTUATE, v. a. [from ago, actum, Lat.] To put into action; to invigorate or increase the powers of motion.

The light made by this animal depends upon a living spirit, and seems, by some vital irradiation, to be actuated into this lustre.

Brown's Vulg. Errors.

Such is every man, who has not actuated the grace given him, to the subduing of every reigning sin.

Decay of Pity.

Men of the greatest abilities are most fired with ambition; and, on the contrary, mean and narrow minds are the least actuated by it.

Addison.

Our passions are the springs which actuate the powers of our nature.

Rogers.

ACTUOSE, adj. [from act.] That which hath strong powers of action: a word little used.

TO ACUATE, v. a. [from acu, Lat.] To sharpen, to invigorate with any powers of sharpness.

Immoderate feeding upon powdered beef, pickled meats, and debauching with strong wines, do inflame and acuate the blood, whereby it is capacitated to corrode the lungs.

Harvey on Consumpt.

ACULEATE, adj. [from aculeatus, Lat.] That which has a point or sting; prickly; that which terminates in a sharp point.

ACUMEN, n. f. [Lat.] A sharp point; figuratively, quickness of intellects.

The word was much affected by the learned Aristarchus in common conversation, to signify genius or natural acumen.

Pope.

ACUMINATED, particip. adj. Ending in a point; sharp-pointed.

This is not acuminated and pointed, as in the rest, but seemeth, as it were, cut off.

Brown's Vulg. Errors.

I appropriate this word, Noli me tangere, to a small round acuminated tubercle, which hath not much pain, unless touched or rubbed, or exasperated by topicks.

Wifeman.

ACUTE, adj. [from acutus, Lat.]

1. Sharp, ending in a point; opposed to obtus or blunt.

Having the ideas of an obtuse and an acute angled triangle, both drawn from equal bases and between parallels, I can, by intuitive knowledge, perceive the one not to be the other, but cannot that way know whether they be equal.

Locke.

2. In a figurative sense applied to men; ingenious; penetrating; opposed to dull or stupid.

The acute and ingenious author, among many very fine thoughts, and uncommon reflections, has started the notion of seeing all things in God.

Locke.

3. Spoken of the senses, vigorous; powerful in operation.

Were our senses altered, and made much quicker and acuter, the appearance and outward scheme of things would have quite another face to us.

Locke.

4. Acute disease. Any disease, which is attended with an increased velocity of blood, and terminates in a few days; opposed to chronical.

Quincy.

5. Acute accent; that which raises or sharpens the voice.

ACUTELY, adv. [from acute.] After an acute manner; sharply; it is used as well in the figurative as primitive sense.

He that will look into many parts of Asia and America, will find men reason there, perhaps, as acutely as himself, who yet never heard of a syllogism.

Locke.

ACUTENESS, n. f. [from acute, which see.]

1. Sharpness.

2. Force of intellects.

They

They would not be so apt to think, that there could be nothing added to the acuteness and penetration of their understandings. Locke.

3. Quickness and vigour of senses.

If eyes so framed could not view at once the hand and the hour-plate, their owner could not be benefited by that acuteness; which, whilst it discovered the secret contrivance of the machine, made him lose its use. Locke.

4. Violence and speedy crisis of a malady.

We apply present remedies according to indications, respecting rather the acuteness of the disease, and precipitancy of the occasion, than the rising and setting of stars. Brown.

5. Sharpness of sound.

This acuteness of sound will shew, that whilst, to the eye, the bell seems to be at rest, yet the minute parts of it continue in a very brisk motion, without which they could not strike the air. Boyle.

ADACTED. participial adj. [adaetus, Lat.] Driven by force; a word little used. Dict.

ADAGE n. f. [adagium, Lat.] A maxim handed down from antiquity; a proverb.

Shallow unimproved intellects, are confident pretenders to certainty; as if, contrary to the adage, science had no friend but ignorance. Glanville's Sceptis Scientifica.

Fine fruits of learning! old ambitious fool, Dar'ft thou apply that adage of the school; As if 'tis nothing worth that lies conceal'd; And science is not science till reveal'd? Dryden.

ADAGIO. n. f. [Italian.] A term used by musicians, to mark a slow time.

ADAMANT. n. f. [adamant, Lat. from α and δαμνω, Gr. that is insuperable, infrangible.]

1. A stone, imagined by writers, of impene- trable hardness.

So great a fear my name amongst them spread, That they suppos'd I could rend bars of steel, And spurn in pieces posts of adamant. Shakef.

Satan, with vast and haughty strides advanc'd, Came tow'ring, arm'd in adamant, and gold. Milton.

Eternal deities,

Who rule the world with absolute decrees, And write whatever time shall bring to pass, With pens of adamant, on plates of brass. Dryden.

2. The diamond.

Hardness, wherein some stones exceed all other bodies, and among them the adamant all other stones, being exalted to that degree thereof, that art in vain endeavours to counterfeit it, the factitious stones of chymists, in imitation being easily detected by an ordinary lapidist. Ray on the Creation.

3. Adamant is taken for the loadstone.

You draw me, you hard-hearted adamant! But yet you draw not iron; for my heart Is true as steel. Shakespeare.

Let him change his lodging from one part of the town to another, which is a great adamant of acquaintance. Bacon.

ADAMANT'AN. adj. [from adamant.] Hard as adamant.

He weaponless himself, Made arms ridiculous, useless the forgery Of brazen shield and spear, the hammer'd cuirass, Chalybear temper'd steel, and frock of mail Adamantean proof. Milton.

This word occurs, perhaps, only in this passage. Dryden.

ADAMANTINE. adj. [adamantinus, Lat.]

1. Made of adamant.

Wide is the fronting gate, and rais'd on high, With adamantine columns, threats the sky. Dryden.

2. Having the qualities of adamant; as, hard- ness, indissolubility.

Could Eve's weak hand, extended to the tree, In funder rend that adamantine chain, Whose golden links, effects and causes be, And which to God's own chair doth fix'd re- main? Davies.

An eternal sterility must have possessed the world, where all things had been fixed and fastened everlastingly with the adamantine chains of specific gravity; if the Almighty had not spoken and said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit-tree yielding fruit after its kind; and it was so. Bentley.

In adamantine chains shall death be bound, And hell's grim tyrant feel th' eternal wound. Pope.

Tho' adamantine bonds the chief restrain, The dire restraint his wisdom will defeat, And soon restore him to his regal seat. Pope.

ADAM'S-APPLE. n. f. [in anatomy.] A pro- nounced part of the throat.

TO ADAPT. v. a. [adapto, Lat.] To fit one thing to another; to suit; to proportion.

'Tis true, but let it not be known, My eyes are somewhat dimmish grown; For nature, always in the right,

To your decays adapts my sight. Swift.

It is not enough that nothing offends the ear, but a good poet will adapt the very sounds, as well as words, to the things he treats of. Pope's Letters.

ADAPTATION. n. f. [from adapt.] The act of fitting one thing to another; the fitness of one thing to another.

Some species there be of middle natures, that is, of bird and beast, as bats; yet are their parts so set together, that we cannot define the begin- ning or end of either, there being a commixtion of both, rather than adaptation or cement of the one unto the other. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Adhesion may be in part ascribed, either to some elastical motion in the pressed glass, or to the exquisite adaptation of the almost number- less, though very small, asperities of the one, and the numerous little cavities of the other; whereby the surfaces do lock in with one another, or are, as it were, clasped together. Boyle.

ADAPTION. n. f. [from adapt.] The act of fitting.

It were alone a sufficient work to shew all the necessities, the wise contrivances, and prudent adaptions, of these admirable machines, for the benefit of the whole. Cheyne.

ADAPTNESS. n. f. [for adaptedness, from adapt.]

Some notes are to display the adaptness of the found to the sense. Dr. Newton.

This word I have found no where else.

TO ADCORPORATE. v. a. [from ad and corpus.] To unite one body with another; more usually wrote accorporate; which see.

TO ADD. v. a. [addo, Lat.]

1. To join something to that which was before. Mark if his birth makes any difference,

If to his words it adds one grain of sense. Dryden.

They, whose muses have the highest flown, Add not to his immortal memory,

But do an act of friendship to their own. Dryden.

2. To perform the mental operation of adding one number or conception to another. To add to is proper, but to add together seems a solecism.

Whatsoever positive ideas a man has in his mind, of any quantity, he can repeat it, and add it to the former, as easily as he can add together the ideas of two days, or two years. Locke.

ADDDABLE. adj. [from add.] That to which something may be added. Addible is more proper. It signifies more properly that which may be added.

The first number in every addition is called the addable number, the other, the number or num- bers added, and the number invented by the ad- dition, the aggregate or sum. Cocker.

TO ADDECIMATE. v. a. [addecimo, Lat.] To take or ascertain tithes. Dict.

TO ADDEEM. v. a. [from deem.] To esteem; to account.

This word is now out of use.

She seems to be addem'd so worthless-bast, As to be mov'd to such an infamy. Daniel's Civil Wars.

ADDER. n. f. [Ætrep, Nædne, as it seems from ætrep, Sax. poison.] A serpent, a viper, a poisonous reptile; perhaps of any species. In common language, adders and snakes are not the same.

Or is the adder better than the eel, Because his painted skin contents the eye? Shakef.

An adder did it; for, with doubler-tongue Than thine, thou serpent, never adder stung. Shakespeare.

The adder teaches us where to strike, by her curious and fearful defending of her head. Taylor.

ADDER'S-GRASS. n. f. The name of a plant, imagined by Skinner to be so named, because ser- pents lurk about it.

ADDER'S-TONGUE. n. f. [opbioglossum, Lat.] The name of an herb.

It hath no visible flower; but the seeds are pro- duced on a spike, which resembles a serpent's tongue; which seed is contained in many longitu- dinal cells. Miller.

The most common simples are comfrey, bugle, agrimony, fennel, paul's-betony, fluellin, peri- winkle, adder's-tongue. Wifeman's Surgery.

ADDER'S-WORT. n. f. An herb so named, on account of its virtue, real or supposed, of cur- ing the bite of serpents.

ADDIBLE. adj. [from add.] Possible to be ad- ded. See ADDDABLE.

The clearest idea it can get of infinity, is the confused, incomprehensible remainder of endless, addible numbers, which affords no prospect of stop, or boundary. Locke.

ADDIBILITY. n. f. [from addible.] The pos- sibility of being added.

This endless addition, or addibility (if any one like the word better) of numbers, so apparent to the mind, is that which gives us the clearest and most distinct idea of infinity. Locke.

ADDICE. n. f. [for which we corruptly speak and write adz, from adice, Sax. an axe.]

The addice hath its blade made thin and some- what arching. As the axe hath its edge parallel to its handle, so the addice hath its edge athwart the handle, and is ground to a bafil on its inside to its outer edge. Maxon's Mechanical Exercises.

TO ADDICT. v. a. [addico, Lat.]

1. To devote, to dedicate, in a good sense; which is rarely used.

Ye know the house of Stephanus, that they have addicted themselves to the ministry of the saints. 1 Cor. xvi. 15.

2. It is commonly taken in a bad sense; as, be addicted himself to vice.

3. To devote one's self to any person, party, or persuasion. A Latinism.

I am neither author or fautor of any sect: I will have no man addict himself to me; but if I have any thing right, defend it as truths. Ben Jonson.

ADDICTEDNESS. n. f. [from addicted.] The quality or state of being addicted.

Those know how little I have remitted of my former addictedness; to make chymical experiments. Boyle.

ADDICTION. n. f. [addictio, Lat.]

1. The act of devoting, or giving up.

2. The state of being devoted.

It is a wonder how his grace should glean it, Since his addiction was to courses vain;

His companies unletter'd, rude, and shallow; His hours fill'd up with riots, banquets, sports. Shakespeare.

AN ADDITAMENT. n. f. [additamentum, Lat.] The addition, or thing added.

Iron will not incorporate with brass, nor other metals, of itself, by simple fire: so as the enquiry must be upon the calcination, and the additament, and the charge of them. Bacon.

In a palace there is first the case or fabrick, or moles of the structure itself; and, besides that, there are certain additaments that contribute to its ornament and use; as, various furniture, rare fountains and aqueducts, divers things appendi- cated to it. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

ADDITION. n. f. [from add.]

1. The act of adding one thing to another; op- posed to diminution.

The infinite distance between the Creator and the

ADD

the noblest of all creatures can never be measured, nor exhausted by endless addition of finite degrees.

Bentley.

2. Additament, or the thing added.

It will not be modestly done, if any of our own wisdom intrude or interpose, or be willing to make additions to what Christ and his apostles have designed.

Hammond.

Some such resemblances, methinks, I find Of our last evening's talk, in this thy dream, But with addition strange!

Milton.

The abolishing of villanage, together with the custom permitted among the nobles, of selling their lands, was a mighty addition to the power of the commons.

Swift.

3. In arithmetick.

Addition is the reduction of two or more numbers of like kind together into one sum or total.

Cocker's Arithmetick.

4. In law. A title given to a man over and above his christian name and surname, throwing his estate, degree, occupation, trade, age, place of dwelling.

Cowell.

Only retain

The name, and all th' addition to a king; The sway, revenue, execution, Beloved sons, be yours; which to confirm, This coronet part between you. Shaksp. K. Lear.

From this time,

For what he did before Corioli, call him, With all th' applause and clamour of the host, Caius Marcius Coriolanus. Bear th' addition nobly ever.

Shakspere's Coriolanus.

There arose new disputes upon the persons named by the king, or rather against the additions and appellations of title, which were made to their names.

Clarendon.

ADDITIONAL, adj. [from addition.] That which is added.

Our kalendar being once reformed and set right, it may be kept so, without any considerable variation, for many ages, by omitting one leap-year; i. e. the additional day, at the end of every 134 years.

Holder on Time

The greatest wits, that ever were produced in one age, lived together in so good an understanding, and celebrated one another with so much generosity, that each of them receives an additional lustre from his contemporaries.

Addison.

They include in them that very kind of evidence, which is supposed to be powerful: and do, withal, afford us several other additional proofs, of great force and clearness.

Atterbury.

ADDITIONAL, n. f. Additament; something added. Not in use.

May be some little additional may further the incorporation.

Bacon.

ADDITIONARY, adj. [from add.] That which has the power or quality of adding.

The additionary fiction gives to a great man a larger share of reputation than belongs to him, to enable him to serve some good end or purpose.

Arbutnot.

ADDLE, adj. [from adel, a disease, Sax. according to Skinner and Junius; perhaps from ydel, idle, barren, unfruitful.] Originally applied to eggs, and signifying such as produce nothing, but grow rotten under the hen; thence transferred to brains that produce nothing.

There's one with truncheon, like a ladle, That carries eggs too fresh or addle: And still at random as he goes, Among the rabble rout bestows.

Hudibras.

After much solitariness, fasting, or long sicknesses, their brains were addle, and their bellies as empty of meat as their heads of wit.

Burton on Melancholy.

Thus far the poet; but his brains grow addle: And all the rest is purely from his needle.

Dryd.

To ADDLE, v. a. [from addle, adj.] To make addle; to corrupt; to make barren.

This is also evidenced in eggs, whereof the sound ones sink, and such as are addled swim; as do also those that are termed hypanemæ, or wind-eggs.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

To ADDLE, v. n. To grow; to increase. Obsolete.

ADD

Where ivy embraceth the tree very fore, Kill ivy, else tree will addle no more.

Tusser's Husbandry.

ADDLE-PATED, adj. Having addled brains. See ADDLE.

Poor slaves in metre, dull and addle-pated, Who rhyme below even David's psalms translated.

Dryden.

To ADDRESS, v. a. [addresser, Fr. from deregar, Span. from dirige, dirigum, Lat.]

1. To prepare one's self to enter upon any action; as, he addressed himself to the work. It has to before the thing.

With him the Palmer eke, in habit sad, Himself address'd to that adventure hard. Fairy Queen.

It lifted up its head, and did address Itself to motion, like as it would speak.

Shaksp. Hamlet.

Then Turnus from his chariot leaping light, Address'd himself on foot to single fight.

Dryden.

2. To get ready; to put in a state for immediate use.

They fell directly on the English battle; whereupon the earl of Warwick address'd his men to take the flank.

Hayward.

Duke Frederick hearing, how that every day Men of great worth resorted to this forest,

Address'd a mighty power, which were on foot, In his own conduct purposely to take

His brother here. Shakspere, As you like it.

To-night in Harfleur we will be your guest, To-morrow for the march we are address'd.

Shaksp.

3. To apply to another by words, with various forms of construction.

4. Sometimes without a preposition. To such I would address with this most affectionate petition.

Decay of Piety.

Among the crowd, but far above the rest, Young Turnus to the beauteous maid address'd.

Dryden.

Are not your orders to address the senate? Add.

5. Sometimes with to. Addressing to Pollio, his great patron, and himself no vulgar poet, he began to assert his native character, which is sublimity.

Dryden.

6. Sometimes with the reciprocal pronoun; as, he addressed himself to the general.

7. Sometimes with the accusative of the matter of the address, which may be the nominative to the passive.

The young hero had address'd his prayers to him for his assistance.

Dryden.

The prince himself, with awful dread possess'd, His vows to great Apollo thus address'd.

Dryden.

His suit was common; but, above the rest, To both the brother-princes thus address'd.

Dryden.

8. To address [in law] is to apply to the king in form.

The representatives of the nation in parliament, and the privy-council, address'd the king to have it recalled.

Swift.

ADDRESS, n. f. [address, Fr.]

1. Verbal application to any one, by way of persuasion; petition.

Henry, in knots involving Emma's name, Had half confess'd and half conceal'd his flame

Upon this tree; and as the tender mark Grew with the year, and widen'd with the bark,

Venus had heard the virgin's soft address, That, as the wound, the passion might encrease.

Prior.

Most of the persons, to whom these addresses are made, are not wise and skilful judges, but are influenced by their own sinful appetites and passions.

Wat's Improvement of the Mind.

2. Courtship.

They often have reveal'd their passion to me; But, tell me, whose address thou favour'st most;

I long to know, and yet I dread to hear it.

Addison.

A gentleman, whom, I am sure, you yourself would have approved, made his address to me.

Addison.

3. Manner of addressing another; as, we say, a man of an happy or a pleasing address; a man of an awkward address.

4. Skill, dexterity.

ADH

I could produce innumerable instances from my own observation, of events imputed to the profound skill and address of a minister, which, in reality, were either mere effects of negligence, weakness, humour, passion, or pride, or at best but the natural course of things left to themselves.

Swift.

5. Manner of directing a letter; a sense chiefly mercantile.

ADDRESSER, n. f. [from address.] The person that addresses or petitions.

ADDU'CENT, adj. [adducens, Lat.]

A word applied to those muscles that bring forward, close, or draw together the parts of the body to which they are annexed.

Quincy.

To ADDU'CE, v. a. [adducere, Fr. duci, Lat.] To sweeten: a word not now in use.

Thus did the French ambassadors, with great shew of their king's affection, and many sugared words, seek to adduce all matters between the two kings.

Bacon's Henry VII.

A'DELING, n. f. [from adel, Sax. illustrious.] A word of honour among the Angles, properly appertaining to the king's children: king Edward the Confessor, being without issue, and intending to make Edgar his heir, called him adeling.

Cowell.

ADENO'GRAPHY, n. f. [from adeno and grapho, Gr.] A treatise of the glands.

ADE'MPTION, n. f. [from adimo, ademptum, Lat.] Taking away; privation.

DiE.

ADE'PT, n. f. [from adeptus, Lat. that is, adeptus artem.] He that is completely skilled in all the secrets of his art. It is, in its original signification, appropriated to the chymists, but is now extended to other artists.

The preservation of chastity is easy to true adepts.

Pope.

ADE'PT, adj. Skilful; thoroughly versed.

If there be really such adept philosophers as we are told of, I am apt to think, that, among their arcana, they are masters of extremely potent menstrooms.

Boyle.

A'DEQUATE, adj. [adequatus, Lat.] Equal to; proportionate; correspondent to, so as to bear an exact resemblance or proportion. It is used generally in a figurative sense, and often with the particle to.

Contingent death seems to be the whole adequate object of popular courage; but a necessary and unavoidable coffin strikes paleness into the stoutest heart.

Harvey on Consumptions.

The arguments were proper, adequate, and sufficient to compass their respective ends.

South.

All our simple ideas are adequate; because, being nothing but the effects of certain powers in things, fitted and ordained by God to produce such sensations in us, they cannot but be correspondent and adequate to those powers.

Locke.

Those are adequate ideas, which perfectly represent their archetypes or objects. Inadequate are but a partial, or incomplete, representation of those archetypes to which they are referred.

Wat's Logic.

A'DEQUATELY, adv. [from adequate.]

1. In an adequate manner; with justness of representation; with exactness of proportion.

Gratitude consists adequately in these two things: first, that it is a debt; and, secondly, that it is such a debt as is left to every man's ingenuity, whether he will pay or no.

South.

2. It is used with the particle to.

Piety is the necessary Christian virtue, proportioned adequately to the omniscience and spirituality of that infinite Deity.

Hammond's Funda.

A'DEQUATENESS, n. f. [from adequate.] The state of being adequate; justness of representation; exactness of proportion.

dram of a scruple, no scruple of a scruple, no incredulous or unsafe circumstance—

Shakespeare's Twelfth Night

3. To remain firmly fixed to a party, person, or opinion.

Good gentlemen, he hath much talk'd of you; And sure I am, two men there are not living, To whom he more adheres. Shakespeare's Hamlet.

Every man of sense will agree with me, that singularity is laudable, when, in contradiction to a multitude, it adheres to the dictates of conscience, morality, and honour. Boyle.

ADHERENCE. n. f. [from adhere.] See ADHESION.

1. The quality of adhering, or sticking; tenacity.
2. In a figurative sense, fixedness of mind; steadiness; fidelity.

The firm adherence of the Jews to their religion is no less remarkable than their dispersion; considering it as persecuted or condemned over the whole earth. Addison.

A constant adherence to one sort of diet may have had effects on any constitution. Arbutnot on Aliments.

Plain good sense, and a firm adherence to the point, have proved more effectual than those arts, which are contemptuously called the spirit of negotiating. Swift.

ADHERENCY. n. f. [The same with adherence.]

1. Steady attachment.

2. That which adheres.

Vices have a native adherency of vexation.

Decay of Piety.

ADHERENT. adj. [from adhere.]

1. Sticking to.

Cloze to the cliff with both his hands he clung, And stuck adherent, and suspended hung. Pope.

2. United with.

Modes are said to be inherent or adherent, that is, proper or improper. Adherent or improper modes arise from the joining of some accidental substance to the chief subject, which yet may be separated from it; so when a bowl is wet, or a boy clothed, these are adherent modes; for the water and the clothes are distinct substances which adhere to the bowl, or to the boy. Watts's Logick.

ADHERENT. n. f. [from adhere.]

1. The person that adheres; one that supports the cause, or follows the fortune of another; a follower, a partisan.

Princes must give protection to their subjects and adherents, when worthy occasion shall require it. Raleigh.

A new war must be undertaken upon the advice of those, who, with their partisans and adherents, were to be the sole gainers by it. Swift.

2. Any thing outwardly belonging to a person.

When they cannot shake the main fort, they must try if they can possess themselves of the out works, raise some prejudice against his discretion, his humour, his carriage, and his extrinsic adherents. Government of the Tongue.

ADHERER. n. f. [from adhere.] He that adheres.

He ought to be indulgent to tender consciences; but, at the same time, a firm adherer to the established church. Swift.

ADHESION. n. f. [adhesio, Lat.]

1. The act or state of sticking to something.

Adhesion is generally used in the natural, and adherence in the metaphorical sense. as, the adhesion of iron to the magnet; and adherence of a client to his patron.

Why therefore may not the minute parts of other bodies, if they be conveniently shaped for adhesion, stick to one another, as well as stick to this spirit? Boyle.

The rest consisting wholly in the sensible configuration, as smooth and rough; or else more, or less, firm adhesion of the parts, as hard and soft, tough and brittle, are obvious. Locke.

— Prove that all things, on occasion,

Love union, and desire adhesion. Prior.

2. It is sometimes taken, like adherence, figuratively, for firmness in an opinion, or steadiness in a practice.

The same want of sincerity, the same adhesion to vice, and aversion from goodness, will be equally a reason for their rejecting any proof whatsoever. Asterbury.

ADHESIVE. adj. [from adhesion.] Sticking; tenacious.

If slow, yet sure, adhesive to the tract, Hot-steaming up. Thomson.

To ADHIBIT. v. a. [adhibeo, Lat.] To apply; to make use of.

Salt, a necessary ingredient in all sacrifices, was adhibited and required in this view only as an emblem of purification.

President Forbes's Letter to a Bishop.

ADHIBITION. n. f. [from adhibeo.] Application; use. Diſt.

ADJACENCY. n. f. [from adjacere, Lat.]

1. The state of lying close to another thing.

2. That which is adjacent. See ADJACENT.

Because the Cape hath sea on both sides near it, and other lands, remote as it were, equidistant from it; therefore, at that point, the needle is not distracted by the vicinity of adjacencies. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ADJACENT. adj. [adjacens, Lat.] Lying near or close; bordering upon something.

It may corrupt within itself, although no part of it issue into the body adjacent. Bacon.

Uniform pellucid mediums, such as water, have no sensible reflection but in their external superficies; where they are adjacent to other mediums of a different density. Newton.

ADJACENT. n. f. That which lies next another.

The sense of the author goes visibly in its own train, and the words receiving a determined sense from their companions and adjacents, will not consent to give countenance and colour to what must be supported at any rate. Locke.

ADIAPHOROUS. adj. [adiaphoros, Gr.] Neutral; particularly used of some spirits and salts, which are neither of an acid or alkaline nature. Quincy.

Our adiaphorous spirit may be obtained, by distilling the liquor that is afforded by woods and divers other bodies. Boyle.

ADIAPHORY. n. f. [adiaphoria, Gr.] Neutrality; indifference.

To ADJECT. v. a. [adicio, adjectum, Lat.] To add to; to put to another thing.

ADJECTION. n. f. [adjectio, Lat.]

1. The act of adjecting, or adding.

2. The thing adjected, or added.

That unto every pound of sulphur, an adjection of one ounce of quicksilver; or unto every pound of petre, one ounce of sal-ammoniac, will much intend the force, and consequently the report, I find no verity. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ADJECTIVIOUS. adj. [from adjection.] Added; thrown in upon the rest.

ADJECTIVE. n. f. [adjectivum, Lat.]

A word added to a noun, to signify the addition or separation of some quality, circumstance, or manner of being; as, good, bad, are adjectives, because in speech, they are applied to nouns, to modify their signification, or intimate the manner of existence in the things signified thereby. Clarke's Latin Grammar.

All the verification of Claudian is included within the compass of four or five lines; perpetually closing his sense at the end of a verse, and that verse commonly which they call golden, or two substantives and two adjectives, with a verb betwixt them, to keep the peace. Dryden.

ADJECTIVELY. adv. [from adjective.] After the manner of an adjective; a term of grammar.

ADIEU. adv. [from à Dieu, used elliptically for à Dieu je vous commende, used at the departure of friends.] The form of parting, originally importing a commendation to the Divine care, but now used in a popular sense, sometimes to things inanimate; farewell.

Ne gave him leave to bid that aged fire Adieu, but nimbly ran her wonted course. Fairy Queen.

Use a more spacious ceremony to the noble lords; you restrained yourself within the list of to cold an adieu; be more expressive to them.

Shakespeare's All's well that ends well.

While now I take my last adieu,

Heave thou no sigh, nor shed a tear;

Left yet my half-clos'd eye may view

On earth an object worth its care. Prior.

To ADJOIN. v. a. [adjungere, Fr. adjungo, Lat.]

1. To join to; to unite to; to put to.

As one who long in populous city pent

Forth issuing on a summer's morn to breathe

Among the pleasant villages and farms

Adjoin'd, from each thing met conceives delight. Milton.

Corrections or improvements should be as remarks adjoin'd, by way of note or commentary, in their proper places, and superadded to a regular treatise. Watts.

2. To fasten by a joint or juncture.

As a maffy wheel

Fixt on the summit of the highest mount,

To whose huge spoke ten thousand lesser things

Are mortis'd and adjoin'd. Shakespeare.

To ADJOIN. v. n. To be contiguous to; to lie next to as to have nothing between.

Th' adjoining fane, th' assembled Greeks express'd,

And hunting of the Caledonian beast. Dryden.

In learning any thing, as little should be proposed to the mind at once, as is possible; and, that being understood and fully mastered, proceed to the next adjoining, yet unknown, simple, unperplexed proposition, belonging to the matter in hand, and tending to the clearing what is principally designed. Locke.

To ADJOURN. v. a. [adjournare, Fr.]

1. To put off to another day, naming the time; a term used in juridical proceedings; as, of parliaments, or courts of justice.

The queen being absent, 'tis a needful fitness, That we adjourn this court to further day. Shakespeare.

By the king's authority alone, and by his writs they are assembled, and by him alone are they prorogued and dissolved; but each house may adjourn itself. Bacon.

2. To put off; to defer; to let stay to a future time.

Then Jupiter, thou king of gods,

Why hast thou thus adjourn'd

The graces for his merits due,

Being all to dolours turn'd. Shak. Cymbeline.

Crown high the goblets with a chearful draught; Enjoy the present hour, adjourn the future thought. Dryden.

The formation of animals being foreign to my purpose, I shall adjourn the consideration of it to another occasion. Woodward's Natural History.

ADJOURNMENT. n. f. [adjournment, Fr.]

1. An assignment of a day, or a putting off till another day.

Adjournment in cyre, an appointment of a day, when the justices in cyre mean to sit again. Cowell.

2. Delay; procrastination; diffinision to a future time.

We will and we will not, and then we will not again, and we will. At this rate we run our lives out in adjournments from time to time, out of a fantastical levity that holds us off and on, betwixt hawk and buzzard. L'Eſtrange.

ADIPOUS. adj. [adiposus, Lat.] Fat. Diſt.

ADIT. n. f. [aditus, Lat.] A passage for the conveyance of water under ground; a passage under ground in general: a term among the miners.

For conveying away the water, they stand in aid of sundry devices; as, adits, pumps, and wheels, driven by a stream, and interchangeably filling and emptying two buckets. Carew.

The delfs would be so flown with waters (it being impossible to make any adits or foughs to drain them) that no gins or machines could suffice to lay and keep them dry. Ray.

ADITION. n. f. [from adeo, aditum, Lat.] The act of going to another.

To ADJUDICATE. v. a. [adjudico, Lat.]

1. To

1. To give the thing controverted to one of the parties by a judicial sentence; with the particle to before the person.

The way of disputing in the schools is by insisting on one topical argument; by the success of which, victory is adjudged to the opponent, or defendant. Locke.

The great competitors for Rome
Cæsar and Pompey, on Pharfalian plains,
Where stern Bellona, with one final stroke,
Adjudg'd the empire of this globe to one. Phillips.

2. To sentence, or condemn to a punishment; with to before the thing.

But though thou art adjudged to the death;
Yet I will favour thee in what I can. Shakef.

3. Simply, to judge; to decree; to determine. He adjudged him unworthy of his friendship, purposing sharply to revenge the wrong he had received. Knolles.

ADJUDICATION. n. f. [adjudicatio, Lat.] The act of judging, or of granting something to a litigant, by a judicial sentence.

TO ADJUDICATE. v. a. [adjudico, Lat.] To judge; to give something controverted to one of the litigants, by a sentence or decision.

TO ADJUGATE. v. a. [adjuugo, Lat.] To yoke to; to join to another by a yoke. Dict.

ADJUMENT. n. f. [adjumentum, Lat.] Help; support. Dict.

ADJUNCT. n. f. [adjunctum, Lat.]

1. Something adherent or united to another, though not essentially part of it.

Learning is but an adjunct to ourself,
And where we are our learning likewise is. Shakespeare.

But I make haste to consider you as abstracted from a court, which (if you will give me leave to use a term of logic) is only an adjunct, not a propriety, of happiness. Dryden.

The talent of discretion, in its several adjuncts and circumstances, is no where so serviceable as to the clergy. Swift.

2. A person joined to another. This sense rarely occurs.

He made him the associate of his heir-apparent, together with the lord Cottington (as an adjunct of singular experience and trust) in foreign travels, and in a business of love. Wotton.

ADJUNCT. adj. United with; immediately consequent.

So well, that what you bid me undertake,
Though that my death were adjunct to my act,
I'd do't. Shakespeare. King John.

ADJUNCTION. n. f. [adjunctio, Lat.]

1. The act of adjoining, or coupling together.

2. The thing joined.

ADJUNCTIVE. n. f. [adjunctivus, Lat.]

1. He that joins.

2. That which is joined.

ADJURATION. n. f. [adjuratio, Lat.]

1. The act of adjuring, or proposing an oath to another.

2. The form of oath proposed to another. When these learned men saw sickness and phrenzy cured, the dead raised, the oracles put to silence, the demons and evil spirits forced to confess themselves no gods, by persons, who only made use of prayer and adjurations in the name of their crucified Saviour; how could they doubt of their Saviour's power on the like occasions? Addison on the Christian Religion.

TO ADJURE. v. a. [adjuro, Lat.] To impose an oath upon another, prescribing the form in which he shall swear.

Thou know'st, the magistrates
And princes of my country came in person,
Solicited, commanded, threaten'd, urg'd,
Adjur'd by all the bonds of civil duty,
And of religion, press'd how just it was,
How honourable. Milton.

Ye lamps of heav'n! he said, and lifted high
His hands now free, thou venerable sky!
Ye sacred altars! from whose flames I fled,
Be all of you adjured. Dryden.

TO ADJUST. v. a. [adjuster, Fr.]

1. To regulate; to put in order; to settle in the right form.

Your Lordship removes all our difficulties, and supplies all our wants, faster than the most visionary projector can adjust his schemes. Swift.

2. To reduce to the true state or standard; to make accurate.

The names of mixed modes, for the most part, want standards in nature, whereby men may rectify and adjust their signification; therefore they are very various and doubtful. Locke.

3. To make conformable. It requires the particle to before the thing to which the conformity is made.

As to the accomplishment of this remarkable prophecy, whoever reads the account given by Josephus, without knowing his character, and compares it with what our Saviour foretold, would think the historian had been a Christian, and that he had nothing else in view, but to adjust the event to the prediction. Addison.

ADJUSTMENT. n. f. [adjustement, Fr.]

1. Regulation; the act of putting in method; settlement.

The farther and clearer adjustment of this affair, I am constrained to adjourn to the larger treatise. Woodward.

2. The state of being put in method, or regulated.

It is a vulgar idea we have of a watch or clock, when we conceive of it as an instrument made to shew the hour: but it is a learned idea which the watch-maker has of it, who knows all the several parts of it, together with the various connexions and adjustments of each part. Watt's Logic.

ADJUTANT. n. f. A petty officer, whose duty is to assist the major, by distributing the pay, and overseeing the punishment, of the common men.

TO ADJUTE. v. a. [adjuvo, adjutum, Lat.] To help; to concur: a word not now in use.

For there be
Six bachelors as bold as he,
Adjuting to his company;
And each one hath his livery. Ben Jonson's Underwoods.

ADJUTOR. n. f. [adjutor, Lat.] A helper. Dict.

ADJUTORY. adj. [adjutorius, Lat.] That which helps. Dict.

AN ADJUTRIX. n. f. [Lat.] She who helps. Dict.

ADJUVANT. adj. [adjuvans, Lat.] Helpful, useful. Dict.

TO ADJUVATE. v. a. [adjuvo, Lat.] To help; to further; to put forward. Dict.

ADMEASUREMENT. n. f. [See MEASURE.] The adjustment of proportions; the act or practice of measuring according to rule.

Admeasurement is a writ, which lieth for the bringing of those to a mediocrity, that usurp more than their part. It lieth in two cases: one is termed admeasurement of dower, where the widow of the deceased holdeth from the heir, or his guardian, more in the name of her dower, than belongeth to her. The other is admeasurement of pasture, which lieth between those that have common of pasture appendant to their freehold, or common by vicinage, in case any one of them, or more, do furcharge the common with more cattle than they ought, Cowell.

In some counties they are not much acquainted with admeasurement by acre; and thereby the writs contain twice or thrice so many acres more than the land hath. Bacon.

ADMEASURATION. n. f. [ad and mensura, Lat.] The act, or practice, of measuring out to each his part.

ADMINICLE. n. f. [adminiculum, Lat.] Help; support; furtherance. Dict.

ADMINICULAR. adj. [from adminiculum, Lat.] That which gives help. Dict.

TO ADMINISTER. v. a. [administro, Lat.]

1. To give; to afford; to supply. Let zephyrs bland Administer their tepid genial airs; Watts.

Naught fear he from the west, whose gentle warmth

Discloses well the earth's all-teeming womb. Phillips.

2. To act as the minister or agent in any employment or office; generally, but not always, with some hint of subordination; as, to administer the government.

For forms of government let fools contest,
Whate'er is best administer'd is best. Pope.

3. To administer justice; to distribute right.

4. To administer the sacraments.

Have not they the old popish custom of administering the blessed sacrament of the holy eucharist with wafer-cakes? Hooker.

5. To administer an oath; to propose or require an oath authoritatively.

Swear by the duty that you owe to heav'n,
To keep the oath that we administer. Shakespeare.

6. To administer physick; to give physick as it is wanted.

I was carried on men's shoulders, administering physick and phlebotomy. Waller's Voyage.

7. To administer to; to contribute; to bring supplies.

I must not omit that there is a fountain rising in the upper part of my garden, which forms a little wandering rill, and administers to the pleasure, as well as the plenty of the place. Speiatur, N.º. 477.

8. To perform the office of an administrator in law. See ADMINISTRATOR.

Neal's order was never performed, because the executors durst not administer. Arbutnot and Pope.

TO ADMINISTRATE. v. a. [administro, Lat.] To exhibit; to give as physick. Not in use.

They have the same effects in medicine, when inwardly administered to animal bodies. Woodward.

ADMINISTRATION. n. f. [administratio, Lat.]

1. The act of administering or conducting any employment; as, the conducting the public affairs; dispensing the laws.

I then did use the person of your father;
The image of his power lay then in me;
And in th' administration of his law;

While I was busy for the commonwealth,
Your highness pleased to forget my place. Shakespeare.

In the short time of his administration, he shone so powerfully upon me, that, like the heat of a Russian summer, he ripened the fruits of poetry in a cold climate. Dryden.

2. The active or executive part of government.

It may pass for a maxim in state, that the administration cannot be placed in too few hands, nor the legislature in too many. Swift.

3. Collectively, those to whom the care of public affairs is committed.

4. Distribution; exhibition dispensation.

There is, in sacraments, to be observed their force, and their form of administration. Hooker.

By the universal administration of grace, begun by our blessed Saviour, enlarged by his apostles, carried on by their immediate successors, and to be completed by the rest to the world's end; all types that darkened this faith are enlightened. Spruit's Sermons.

ADMINISTRATIVE. adj. [from administrare, Lat.] that which administers; that by which any one administers.

ADMINISTRATOR. n. f. [administrator, Lat.]

1. Is properly taken for him that has the goods of a man dying intestate, committed to his charge by the ordinary, and is accountable for the same, whenever it shall please the ordinary to call upon him thereunto. Cowell.

He was wonderfully diligent to enquire and observe what became of the king of Arragon, in holding the kingdom of Castile, and whether he did hold it in his own right, or as administrator to his daughter. Bacon's Henry VII.

2. He that officiates in divine rights.

I feel my conscience bound to remember the death of Christ, with some society of Christians or other, since it is a most plain command; whether the person, who distributes these elements, be only an occasional or a settled administrator. Watts.

3. He that conducts the government.
The residence of the prince, or chief administrat
of the civil power. Swift.
ADMINISTRATRIX. n. f. [Lat.] She who administers in consequence of a will.
ADMINISTRATORSHIP. n. f. [from administra- tor.] the office of administrator.
ADMIRABILITY. n. f. [admirabilis, Lat.] the quality or state of being admirable. Dist.
ADMIRABLE. adj. [admirabilis, Lat.] to be admired; worthy of admiration; of power to excite wonder: always taken in a good sense, and applied either to persons or things.
The more power he hath to hurt, the more admirable is his praise, that he will not hurt. Sidney.
God was with them in all their afflictions, and,
at length, by working their admirable deliverance,
did testify that they served him not in vain. Hooker.
What admirable things occur in the remains of several other philosophers? Short, I confess, of the rules of christianity, but generally above the lives of christians. South's Sermons.

You can at most
To an indifferent lover's praise pretend:
But you would spoil an admirable friend. Dryd.
ADMIRABLENESS. n. f. [from admirable.] The quality of being admirable; the power of raising wonder.
ADMIRABLY. adv. [from admirable.] So as to raise wonder in an admirable manner.
The theatre is the most spacious of any I ever saw, and so admirably well contrived, that, from the very depth of the stage, the lowest found may be heard distinctly to the farthest part of the audience, as in a whispering place; and yet, raise your voice as high as you please, there is nothing like an echo to cause the least confusion. Addison.
ADMIRAL. n. f. [amiral, Fr. of uncertain
etymology.]

An officer or magistrate that has the government of the king's navy, and the hearing and determining all causes, as well civil as criminal, belonging to the sea. Cowell.

2. The chief commander of a fleet.
He also, in battle at sea, overthrew Rodericus Rotundus, admiral of Spain; in which fight the admiral, with his son, were both slain, and seven of his galleys taken. Knolles.

Make the sea shine with gallantry, and all
The English youth flock to their admiral. Waller.

3. The ship which carries the admiral or commander of the fleet.

The admiral galley, wherein the emperor himself was, by great mischance struck upon a sand.
Knolles.

ADMIRALSHIP. n. f. [from admiral.] The office or power of an admiral.

ADMIRALTY. n. f. [amirauté, Fr.] The power, or officers, appointed for the administration of naval affairs.

ADMIRATION. n. f. [admiratio, Lat.]

1. Wonder, the act of admiring or wondering.
Indu'd with human voice, and human sense,
Reasoning to admiration. Milton.

The passions always move, and therefore, consequently, please: for, without motion, there can be no delight: which cannot be considered but as an active passion. When we view those elevated ideas of nature, the result of that view is admiration, which is always the cause of pleasure. Dryden.

There is a pleasure in admiration, and this is that which properly causeth admiration, when we discover a great deal in an object, which we understand to be excellent; and yet we see, we know not how much more beyond that, which our understandings cannot fully reach and comprehend. Tillotson.

2. It is taken sometimes in a bad sense, though generally in a good.

Your boldness I with admiration see;
What hope had you to gain a queen like me?
Because a hero forc'd me once away,
Am I thought fit to be a second prey? Dryden.

To ADMIRE. v. a. [admiro, Lat. admirer, Fr.]

1. To regard with wonder: generally in a good sense.

'Tis here that knowledge wonders, and there is an admiration that is not the daughter of ignorance. This indeed stupidly gazeth at the un-wonted effect; but the philosophic passion truly admires and adores the supreme efficient. Glanville.

2. It is sometimes used, in more familiar speech, for to regard with love.

3. It is used, but rarely, in an ill sense.

You have displac'd the mirth, broke the good meeting

With most admir'd disorder. Shakesp. Macbeth.

To ADMIRE. v. n. To wonder; sometimes with the particle at.

The eye is already so perfect, that I believe the reason of a man would easily have rested here, and admir'd at his own contrivance. Ray on the Creation.

ADMIRER. n. f. [from admirer.]

1. The person that wonders, or regards with admiration.

Neither Virgil nor Horace would have gained so great reputation, had they not been the friends and admirers of each other. Addison.

Who most to shun or hate mankind pretend,
Seek an admirer, or would fix a friend. Pope.

2. In common speech, a lover.

ADMIRINGLY. adv. [from admirer. With admi- ration; in the manner of an admirer.

The king very lately spoke of him admiringly and mournfully. Shakesp. All's well that ends well.

We may yet further admiringly observe, that men usually give freeliest where they have not given before. Boyle.

ADMIRSSIBLE. adj. [admitto, admissum, Lat.]
That which may be admitted.

Suppose that this supposition were admissible, yet this would not any way be inconsistent with the eternity of the divine nature and essence.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

ADMISSION. n. f. [admissio, Lat.]

1. The act or practice of admitting.

There was also enacted that charitable law, for the admission of poor suitors without fee; whereby poor men became rather able to vex than unable to sue. Bacon's Henry VII.

By means of our solitary situation, and our rare admission of strangers, we know most part of the habitable world, and are ourselves unknown. Bacon's New Atlantis.

2. The state of being admitted.

My father saw you ill designs pursue;
And my admission shew'd his fear of you. Dryden.

God did then exercise man's hopes with the expectations of a better paradise, or a more intimate admission to himself. South's Sermons.

Our king descends from Jove;
And hither are we come by his command,

To crave admission in your happy land. Dryden.

3. Admission; the power of entering or being admitted.

All springs have some degree of heat, none ever freezing, no not in the longest and severest frosts; especially those, where there is such a site and disposition of the strata as gives free and easy admission to this heat. Woodward's Natural Hist.

4. In the ecclesiastical law.

It is, when the patron presents a clerk to a church that is vacant, and the bishop, upon examination, admits and allows of such clerk to be fitly qualified, by saying, Admitto te habitem.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

5. The allowance of an argument; the grant of a position not fully proved.

To ADMIT. v. a. [admitto, Lat.]

1. To suffer to enter, to grant entrance.

Mirth admit me of thy crew. Milton.

Does not one table Bavius still admit? Pope.

2. To suffer to enter upon an office; in which sense, the phrase of admission into a college, &c. is used.

The treasurer found it no hard matter so far to terrify him, that, for the king's service, as was pretended, he admitted, for a fix-clerk, a person recommended by him. Clarendon.

3. To allow an argument or position.

Suppose no weapon can thy valour's pride
Subdue, that by no force thou may'st be won,
Admit no steel can hurt or wound thy side,
And be it heav'n hath thee such favour done. Fairfax.

This argument is like to have the less effect on me, seeing I cannot easily admit the inference. Lake.

4. To allow, or grant in general; sometimes with the particle of.

If you once admit of a latitude, that thoughts may be exalted, and images raised above the life, that leads you insensibly from your own principles to mine. Dryden.

ADMITTABLE. adj. [from admit.] The person or thing which may be admitted.

Because they have not a bladder like those we observe in others, they have no gall at all, is a paralogism not admittable, a fallacy that needs not the fun to scatter it. Brown.

The clerk, who is presented, ought to prove to the bishop, that he is a deacon, and that he has orders; otherwise the bishop is not bound to admit him: for, as the law then stood, a deacon was admittable. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ADMITTANCE. n. f. [from admit.]

1. The act of admitting; allowance or permission to enter.

It cannot enter any man's conceit to think it lawful, that every man which listeth should take upon him charge in the church; and therefore a solemn admittance is of such necessity, that without it, there can be no church-polity. Hooker.

As to the admittance of the weighty elastic parts of the air into the blood, through the coats of the vessels, it seems contrary to experiments upon dead bodies. Arbuthnot on Aliments.

2. The power or right of entering.

What

If I do line one of their hands?—'tis gold

Which buys admittance. Shakesp. Cymbeline.

Surely a daily expectation at the gate, is the readiest way to gain admittance into the house.

South's Sermons.

There's news from Bertran; he desires

Admittance to the king, and cries aloud,

This day shall end our fears. Dryden.

There are some ideas which have admittance only through one sense, which is peculiarly adapted to receive them. Locke.

3. Custom, or prerogative, of being admitted to great persons: a sense now out of use.

Sir John, you are a gentleman of excellent breeding, of great admittance, authentick in your place and person, generally allowed for your many warlike, courtlike, and learned preparations.

Shakesp. As you like it.

4. Concession of a position.

Nor could the Pythagorean give easy admittance thereto; for, holding that separate souls successively supplied other bodies, they could hardly allow the raising of souls from other worlds.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

To ADMIT. v. a. [admitto, Lat.] To mingle with something else.

ADMIXTION. n. f. [from admix.] The union of one body with another, by mingling them.

All metals may be calcined by strong waters,
or by admixtion of salt, sulphur, and mercury. Bar.

The elements are no where pure in these lower regions; and if there is any free from the admix- tion of another, sure it is above the concave of the moon. Glanville.

There is no way to make a strong and vigorous powder of saltpetre, without the admixtion of sulphur. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ADMIXTURE. n. f. [from admix.] The body mingled with another; perhaps sometimes the act of mingling.

Whatever acrimony or amaritude, at any time redounds in it, must be derived from the admixture of another sharp bitter substance. Harvey on Gen.

A mass which to the eye appears to be nothing but mere simple earth, shall, to the smell or taste, discover discover a plentiful admixture of sulphur, alum, or some other mineral. Woodward's Nat. Hist.

To ADMONISH. v. a. [admonish, Lat.] To warn of a fault; to reprove gently; to counsel against wrong practices; to put in mind of a fault or a duty; with the particle of, or against, which is more rare; or the infinitive mood of a verb.

One of his cardinals, who better knew the intrigues of affairs, admonished him against that unskilful piece of ingenuity. Decay of Piety.

He of his wicked ways

Shall them admonish, and before them set
The paths of righteousness. Milton.

But when he was admonished by his subject to descend, he came down, gently circling in the air, and singing to the ground. Dryden.

ADMONISHER. n. f. [from admonish] The person that admonishes, or puts another in mind of his faults or duty.

Horace was a mild admonisher; a court-satirist fit for the gentle times of Augustus. Dryden.

ADMONISHMENT. n. f. [from admonish] Admonition; the notice by which one is put in mind of faults or duties: a word not often used.

But yet be wary in thy studious care.—

—Thy grave admonishments prevail with me. Shakespeare's Henry V. p. 1.

To th' infinitely good we owe

Immortal thanks, and his admonishment
Receive with solemn purpose to observe
Immutably his sovereign will, the end
Of what we are. Milton.

ADMONITION. n. f. [admonitio, Lat.] The hint of a fault or duty; counsel; gentle reproof.

They must give our teachers leave, for the saving of souls, to intermingle sometimes, with other more necessary things, admonition concerning these not unnecessary. Hooker.

From this admonition they took only occasion to redouble their fault, and to sleep again; so that, upon a second and third admonition, they had nothing to plead for their unseasonable drowsiness. South's Sermons.

ADMONITIONER. n. f. [from admonition] A liberal dispenser of admonition; a general adviser. A ludicrous term.

Albeit the admonitioners did seem at first to like no precript form of prayer at all, but thought it the best that their minister should always be left at liberty to pray, as his own discretion did serve, their defender and his associates, have since proposed to the world a form as themselves did like. Hooker.

ADMONITORY. adj. [admonitorius, Lat.] That which admonishes.

The sentence of reason is either mandatory, shewing what must be done; or else permissive, declaring only what may be done; or, thirdly, admonitory, opening what is the most convenient for us to do. Hooker.

ADMURMURATION. n. f. [admurmuro, Lat.] The act of murmuring, or whispering to another. DiC.

To ADMOVE. v. a. [admoveo, Lat.] To bring one thing to another. A word not in use.

If, unto the power of loadstone or iron, we admove the north-pole of the loadstone, the powders, or small divisions, will erect and conform themselves thereto. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ADOL. n. f. [from the verb to do, with a before it, as the French affaire, from a and faire.]

1. Trouble, difficulty.

He took Clitophon prisoner, whom, with much ado, he keepeth alive; the Helots being villainously cruel. Sidney.

They moved, and in the end persuaded, with much ado, the people to bind themselves by solemn oath. Hooker.

He kept the borders and marches of the pale with much ado; he held many parliaments, wherein sundry laws were made. Sir John Davies.

With much ado, he partly kept awake;

Not suffering all his eyes repose to take. Dryden.

2. Bustle; tumult; business; sometimes with the particle about.

Let's follow, to see the end of this ado. Shakespeare.

All this ado about Adam's fatherhood, and the greatness of its power, helps nothing to establish the power of those that govern. Locke.

3. It has a light and ludicrous sense, implying more tumult and shew of business, than the affair is worth: in this sense it is of late generally used.

I made no more ado, but took all their seven points in my target, thus. Shakespeare's Henry IV.

We'll keep no great ado—a friend or two—
It may be thought we held him carelessly,

Being our kinsman, if we revel much. Shakespeare.

Come, says Puff, without any more ado, 'tis time to go to breakfast; cats don't live upon dialogues. L'Estrange.

ADOLESCENCE. n. f. [adolescencia, Lat.] The ADULESCENCY. Age succeeding childhood, and succeeded by puberty; more largely, that part of life in which the body has not yet reached its full perfection.

He was so far from a boy, that he was a man born, and at his full stature, if we believe Josephus, who places him in the last adolescence, and makes him twenty-five years old. Brown.

The sons must have a tedious time of childhood and adolescence, before they can either themselves assist their parents, or encourage them with new hopes of posterity. Bentley.

To ADOPT. v. a. [adopto, Lat.]

1. To take a son by choice; to make him a son who was not so by birth.

Were none of all my father's sisters left;

Nay, were I of my mother's kin bereft;

None by an uncle's or a grandame's side,

Yet I could some adopted heir provide. Dryden.

2. To place any person or thing in a nearer relation, than they have by nature, to something else.

Whether, adopted to some neighb'ring star,

Thou roll'st above us, in thy wand'ring race,

Or, in procession fix'd and regular,

Mov'd with the heav'n's majestic pace;

Or call'd to more celestial bliss,

Thou tread'st, with seraphims, the vast abyss. Dryden.

We are seldom at ease from the solicitation of our natural or adopted desires; but a constant succession of uneasinesses, out of that stock, which natural wants, or acquired habits, have heaped up, take the will in their turns. Locke.

ADOPTEDLY. adv. [from adopted.] After the manner of something adopted.

Adoptedly, as school maids change their names, By vain, though apt, affection. Shakespeare.

ADOPTER. n. f. [from adopt.] He that gives some one by choice the rights of a son.

ADoption. n. f. [adoptio, Lat.]

1. The act of adopting, or taking to one's self what is not native.

2. The state of being adopted.

My bed shall be abused, my reputation gnawn at; and I shall not only receive this villainous wrong, but stand under the adoption of abominable terms, and by him that does me the wrong. Shakespeare.

She purpos'd,

When she had fitted you with her craft, to work Her son into the adoption of the crown. Shakespeare.

In every act of our Christian worship, we are taught to call upon him under the endearing character of our Father, to remind us of our adoption, that we are made heirs of God, and joint heirs of Christ. Rogers's Sermons.

ADOPITIVE. adj. [adoptivus, Lat.]

1. He that is adopted by another, and made his son.

It is impossible an elective monarch should be so free and absolute as an hereditary; no more than it is possible for a father to have so full power and interest in an adoptive son, as in a natural. Bacon.

2. He that adopts another, and makes him his son.

An adopted son cannot cite his adoptive father into court, without his leave. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ADORABLE. adj. [adorable, Fr.] That which ought to be adored; that which is worthy of divine honours.

On these two, the love of God, and our neighbour, hang both the law and the prophets, says the adorable Author of Christianity; and the Apostle says, the end of the law is charity. Chrys.

ADORABLENESS. n. f. [from adorable.] The quality of being adorable; worthiness of divine honours.

ADORABLY. adv. [from adorable.] In a manner worthy of adoration.

ADORATION. n. f. [adoratio, Lat.]

1. The external homage paid to the divinity, distinct from mental reverence.

Solemn and serviceable worship we name, for distinction sake, whatsoever belongeth to the church, or publick society, of God, by way of external adoration. Hooker.

It is possible to suppose, that those who believe a supreme excellent Being, may yet give him no external adoration at all. Stillington.

2. Homage paid to persons in high place or esteem.

O ceremony, shew me but thy worth:

What is thy toll, O adoration!

Art thou nought else but place, degree, and form,

Creating awe and fear on other men?

Wherein thou art less happy, being fear'd,

Than they in fearing.

What drink'st thou oft, instead of homage sweet,
But poison'd flattery? Shakespeare's Henry V.

To ADORE. v. a. [adoro, Lat.]

1. To worship with external homage; to pay divine honours.

The mountain nymphs and Themis they adore,
And from her oracles relief implore. Dryden.

2. It is used, popularly, to denote a high degree of reverence or regard; to reverence; to honour; to love.

The people appear adoring their prince, and their prince adoring God. Taylor, N. 57.

Make future times thy equal act adore,

And be what brave Orestes was before. Pope's Odyssey.

ADOREMENT. n. f. [from adore.] Adoration; worship; a word scarcely used.

The priests of elder times deluded their apprehensions with sooth-saying, and such oblique idolatries, and won their credulities to the literal and downright adoration of cats, lizards, and beetles. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ADORER. n. f. [from adore.]

1. He that adores; a worshipper; a term generally used in a low sense; as, by lovers, or admirers.

Being so far provoked as I was in France, I would abate her nothing; though I profess myself her adorer, not her friend. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

Whilst as the approaching pageant does appear,
And echoing crowds speak mighty Venus near;

I, her adorer, too devoutly stand
Fast on the utmost margin of the land. Prior.

2. A worshipper; in a serious sense.

He was so severe an adorer of truth, as not to dissemble; or to suffer any man to think that he would do any thing, which he resolved not to do. Clarendon.

To ADORN. v. a. [adorno, Latin.]

1. To dress; to deck the person with ornaments.

He hath clothed me with the garments of salvation, he hath covered me with the robe of righteousness, as a bridegroom decketh himself with ornaments, and as a bride adorneth herself with her jewels. Isaiah, lxi. 10.

Yet 'tis not to adorn and gild each part,

That shews more cost than art;

Jewels at nose and lips, but ill appear. Cowley.

2. To set out any place or thing with decorations.

A gallery adorned with the pictures or statues of the invention of things useful to human life. Cowley.

3. To embellish with oratory or elegance of language.

Cowley.

This

This will supply men's tongues with many new things, to be named, adorned, and described, in their discourse. Sprat.

Thousands there are in darker fame that dwell, Whose names some nobler poem shall adorn; For, tho' unknown to me, they sure fought well. Dryden.

ADORN. adj. [from the verb.] Adorned; decorated: a word peculiar to Milton.

She'll to realities yield all her shows, Made to adorn for thy delight the more. Milton.
ADORNMENT. n. f. [from adorn.] Ornament; embellishment; elegance: not now in use.

This attribute was not given to the earth, while it was confused; nor to the heavens, before they had motion and adornment.

Raleigh's History of the World.
She held the very garment of Posthumus in more respect than my noble and natural person, together with the adornment of my qualities. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

ADOWN. adv. [from a and down.] Down; on the ground.

Thrice did the sink adown in deadly sound, And thrice he her reviv'd with busy pain. Fairy Queen.

ADOWN. prep. Down; towards the ground; from a higher situation towards a lower.

In this remembrance Emily ere day Arose, and dress'd herself in rich array, Fresh as the month, and as the morning fair, Adown her shoulders fell her length of hair. Dryden.

ADREAR. adv. [from a and dread; as, afide, astid, astep.] In a state of fear, frighted; terrified; now obsolete.

And thinking to make all men adread to such a one an enemy, who would not spare, nor fear to kill to great a prince. Sidney.

ADRIFF. adv. [from a and drift, from drive.] Floating at random; as any impulse may drive.

Then, shall this mount Of paradise, by might of waves, be mov'd Out of his place, push'd by the horned flood; With all his verdure spoil'd, and trees adrift Down the great river, to the opening gulf, And there take root. Milton.

It seem'd a corps adrift to distant fight; But at a distance who could judge aright? Dryden.

The custom of frequent reflection will keep their minds from running adrift, and call their thoughts home from useless unattentive roving. Locke on Education.

ADROIT. adj. [French.] Dextrous; active; skilful.

An adroit stout fellow would sometimes destroy a whole family, with justice apparently against him the whole time. Fervas's Don Quixote.

ADROITNESS. n. f. [from adroit.] Dexterity; readiness; activity. Neither this word, nor adroit, seem yet completely naturalized.

ADRY. adv. [from a and dry.] Athirst; thirsty; in want of drink.

He never told any of them, that he was his humble servant, but his well-wisher; and would rather be thought a malecontent, than drink the king's health when he was not adry. Spect.

ADSCITIOUS. adj. [adscitius, Lat.] That which is taken in to complete something else, though originally extrinsic; supplemental; additional.

ADSTRITION. n. f. [adstritio, Lat.] The act of binding together; and applied, generally, to medicaments and applications, which have the power of making the part contract.

TO ADVANCE. v. a. [avancer, Fr.]

1. To bring forward, in the local sense.

Now morn, her rosy steps in th' eastern clime Advancing, sow'd the earth with orient pearl. Milton.

2. To raise to preferment; to aggrandize. He hath been ever constant in his course of advancing me; from a private gentlewoman he made me a marchioness, and from a marchioness a queen; and now he intends to crown my innocence with the glory of martyrdom. Bacon.

The declaration of the greatness of Mordecai, whereunto the king advanced him. Ezber, x. 2.

3. To improve.

What laws can be advised more proper and effectual to advance the nature of man to its highest perfection, than these precepts of Christianity? Tillotson.

4. To heighten; to grace; to give lustre to.

As the calling dignifies the man, so the man much more advances his calling. As a garment, though it warms the body, has a return with an advantage, being much more warmed by it. South's Sermons.

5. To forward; to accelerate.

These three last were slower than the ordinary Indian wheat of itself; and this culture did rather retard than advance. Bacon.

6. To propose; to offer to the public; to bring to view or notice.

Phedon I hight, quoth he, and do advance My ancestry from famous Coradin. Fairy Queen.

I dare not advance my opinion against the judgment of so great an author; but I think it fair to leave the decision to the public. Dryden.

Some ne'er advance a judgment of their own, But catch the spreading notion of the town. Pope.

TO ADVANCE. v. n.

1. To come forward.

At this the youth, whose vent'rous soul No fears of magick art controul, Advanc'd in open fight. Parnel.

2. To make improvement.

They who would advance in knowledge, and not deceive and swell themselves with a little articulated air, should not take words for real entities in nature, till they can frame clear and distinct ideas of those entities. Locke.

ADVANCE. n. f. [from To advance.]

1. The act of coming forward.

All the foot were put into Abington, with a resolution to quit, or defend, the town, according to the manner of the enemy's advance towards it. Clarendon.

So, like the sun's advance, your titles grow; Which, as he rises, does the warmer grow. Waller.

2. A tendency to come forward to meet a lover; an act of invitation.

In vain are all the practis'd wiles, In vain those eyes would love impart. Not all th' advances, all the smiles, Can move one unrelenting heart. Walsh.

His genius was below

The skill of ev'ry common beau; Who, though he cannot spell, is wise Enough to read a lady's eyes; And will each accidental glance Interpret for a kind advance. Swift.

He has describ'd the unworthy passion of the goddess Calypso, and the indecent advances she made to detain him from his own country. Pope.

That prince applied himself first to the church of England, and upon their refusal to fall in with his measures, made the like advances to the Dissenters. Swift.

3. Gradual progression; rise from one point to another.

Our Saviour raised the ruler's daughter, the widow's son, and Lazarus; the first of these, when he had just expired; the second, as he was carried to the grave on his bier; and the third, after he had been some time buried. And having, by these gradual advances, manifested his divine power, he at last exerted the highest and most glorious degree of it; and raised himself also by his own all-quickenng virtue, and according to his own express prediction. Atterbury.

Men of study and thought, that reason right, and are lovers of truth, do make no great advances in their discoveries of it. Locke.

4. Improvement; progress towards perfection.

The principle and object of the greatest importance in the world to the good of mankind, and for the advance and perfecting of human nature. Hal.

ADVANCEMENT. n. f. [avancement, Fr.]

1. The act of coming forward. This refinement makes daily advancements, and, I hope, in time, will raise our language to the utmost perfection. Swift.

2. The state of being advanced; preferment.

The Percies of the North Finding his usurpation most unjust, Endeavour'd my advancement to the throne. Shakespeare.

3. The act of advancing another. In his own grace he doth exalt himself More than in your advancement. Shakespeare's King Lear.

4. Improvement; promotion to a higher state of excellence.

Nor can we conceive it unwelcome unto those worthies, who endeavour the advancement of learning. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

5. Settlement on a wife. This sense is now disused.

The jointure or advancement of the lady, was the third part of the principality of Wales. Bacon.

ADVANCER. n. f. [from advance.] He that advances any thing; a promoter; forwarder.

Soon after the death of a great officer, who was judged no advancer of the king's matters, the king said to his solicitor, Tell me truly, what say you of your cousin that is gone? Bacon.

The reporters are greater advancers of defamatory designs, than the very first contrivers. Government of the Tongue.

ADVANTAGE. n. f. [avantage, Fr.]

1. Superiority; often with of or over before a person.

In the practical prudence of managing such gifts, the laity may have some advantage over the clergy; whose experience is, and ought to be, less of this world than the other. Sprat.

All other forts and sects of men would evidently have the advantage of us, and a much surer title to happiness than we. Atterbury.

2. Superiority gained by stratagem, or unlawful means.

The common law hath left them this benefit, whereof they make advantage, and wrest it to their bad purposes. Spenser's State of Ireland.

But specially he took advantage of the night for such privy attempts, inasmuch that the bruit of his manliness was spread every where. 2 Macc. viii. 7.

Great malice, backed with a great interest; yet can have no advantage of a man, but from his own expectations of something that is without him. South's Sermons.

As soon as he was got to Sicily, they sent for him back; designing to take advantage, and prosecute him in the absence of his friends. Swift.

3. Opportunity; convenience.

Give me advantage of some brief discourse With Desdemona alone. Shakespeare.

4. Favourable circumstances.

Like jewels to advantage set, Her beauty by the shade does get. Waller.

A face, which is over-flushed, appears to advantage in the deepest scarlet, and the darkest complexion is not a little alleviated by a black hood. Addison.

True wit is nature to advantage dress'd, What oft was thought, but ne'er so well express'd. Pope.

5. Superior excellence.

A man born with such advantage of constitution, that it adulterates not the images of his mind. Glanville.

6. Gain; profit.

For thou saidst, what advantage will it be unto thee, and what profit shall I have, if I be cleansed from my sin? Job.

Certain it is, that advantage now fits in the room of conscience, and steers all. South's Sermons.

7. Overplus; something more than the mere lawful gain.

We owe thee much: within this wall of flesh There is a soul counts thee her creditor, And with advantage means to pay thy love. Shakespeare.

Yen

You said, you neither lend nor borrow
Upon advantage. Shakspeare, Merchant of Venice.
8. Preponderation on one side of the comparison.

Much more should the consideration of this pattern arm us with patience against ordinary calamities; especially if we consider his example with this advantage, that though his sufferings were wholly undeserved, and not for himself but for us, yet he bore them patiently. Tillotson.

To ADVANTAGE. v. a. [from the noun.]
1. To benefit.
Convey what I set down to my lady: it shall advantage more than ever the bearing of letter did. Shakspeare.

The trial hath endamag'd thee no way,
Rather more honour left, and more esteem;
Me naught advantag'd, missing what I aim'd. Milt.
The great business of the senses being to make us take notice of what hurts or advantages the body, it is wisely ordered by nature, that pain should accompany the reception of several ideas. Locke.

We should have pursued some other way, more effectual, for distressing the common enemy, and advantaging ourselves. Swift.
2. To promote; to bring forward; to gain ground to.

The stoics that opinioned the souls of wise men dwelt about the moon, and those of fools wandered about the earth, advantaged the conceit of this effect. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

To ennoble it with the spirit that inspires the Royal Society, were to advantage it in one of the best capacities in which it is improveable. Glanville's Sceptis Scientifica.

ADVANTAGEABLE. adj. [from advantage.]
Profitable; convenient; gainful.

As it is advantageous to a physician to be called to the cure of a declining disease, so it is for a commander to suppress a sedition which hath passed the height. Sir J. Hayward.

ADVANTAGED. adj. [from To advantage.] Possessed of advantages; commodiously situated or disposed.

In the most advantaged tempers, this disposition is but comparative; whereas the most of men labour under disadvantages, which nothing can rid them of. Glanville.

ADVANTAGE-GROUND. n. s. Ground that gives superiority, and opportunities of annoyance or resistance.

This excellent man, who stood not upon the advantage-ground before, from the time of his promotion to the arch-bishoprick, provoked, or underwent the envy, and reproach, and malice, of men of all qualities and conditions; who agreed in nothing else. Clarendon.

ADVANTAGEOUS. adj. [advantageux, Fr.]
1. Of advantage; profitable; useful; opportune; convenient.

The time of sickness, or affliction, is, like the cool of the day to Adam, a season of peculiar pro-prietty for the voice of God to be heard; and may be improved into a very advantageous opportunity of begetting or increasing spiritual life. Hammond.

Here perhaps
Some advantageous act may be achiev'd
By sudden onset, either with hell-fire
To waste his whole creation or possess
All as our own. Milton.

2. It is used with relation to persons, and followed by to.

Since every painter paints himself in his own works, 'tis advantageous to him to know himself, to the end that he may cultivate those talents which make his genius. Dryden.

ADVANTAGEOUSLY. adv. [from advantageous.]
Conveniently; opportunely; profitably.

It was advantageously situated, there being an easy passage from it to India, by sea. Arbutnot.

ADVANTAGEOUSNESS. n. s. [from advantageous.]
Quality of being advantageous; profitableness;
usefulness; convenience.

The last property, which qualifies God for the fittest object of our love, is the advantageousness of his to us, both in the present and the future life. Boyle's Seraphic Love.

To ADVENTURE. v. n. [advenio, Lat.] To accede to something; to become part of something else, without being essential; to be superadded.

A cause considered in judiature, is styled an accidental cause, and the accidental of any act, is said to be whatever adventures to the act itself already substantiated. Ayliffe's Paragon.

ADVENTIENT. adj. [adveniens, Lat.] Advent-ing; coming from outward causes; superadded.

Being thus divided from truth in themselves, they are yet further removed by adventient deception; for they are daily mocked into error by subtler devisers. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

If to suppose the soul distinct substance from the body, and extrinsically adventient, be a great error in philosophy, almost all the world hath been mistaken. Glanville's Vanity of Dogmatism.

ADVENT. n. s. [from adventus; that is, adven-tus Redemptoris.] The name of one of the holy fea-sons, signifying the coming; that is, the coming of our Saviour; which is made the subject of our devotion during the four weeks before Christmas. Common Prayer.

ADVENTINE. adj. [from adventio, adventum.]
Adventitious; that which is extrinsically added;
that which comes from outward causes: a word scarcely in use.

As for the peregrine heat, it is thus far true, that, if the proportion of the adventine heat be greatly predominant to the natural heat and spirits of the body, it tendeth to dissolution or notable alteration. Bacon.

ADVENTITIOUS. adj. [adventitius, Lat.] That which advenes; accidental; supervenient; ex-trinsically added, not essentially inherent.

Diseases of continuance get an adventitious strength from custom, besides their material cause from the humours. Bacon.

Though we may call the obvious colours natural, and the others adventitious; yet such changes of colours, from whatsoever cause they proceed, may be properly taken in. Boyle.

If his blood boil, and th' adventitious fire
Rais'd by high meats, and higher wines, require
To temper and allay the burning heat;
Waters are brought, which by decoction get
New coolness. Dryden.

In the gem-kind, of all the many sorts reckoned up by lapidaries, there are not above three or four that are original; their diversities as to lustre, colour, and hardness, arising from the different admixture of other adventitious mineral matter. Woodward.

ADVENTIVE. n. s. [from adventio, Latin.] The thing or person that comes from without: a word not now in use.

That the natives be not so many, but that there may be elbow-room enough for them, and for the adventives also. Bacon.

ADVENTUAL. adj. [from advent.] Relating to the season of advent.

I do also daily use one other collect; as, namely, the collects adventual, quadragesimal, paschal, or pentecostal, for their proper seasons. Bishop Saunderson.

ADVENTURE. n. s. [French.]

1. An accident; a chance; a hazard; an event of which we have no direction.

The general summoned three castles; one deperate of succour, and not desirous to dispute the defence, presently yielded; but two stood upon their adventure. Hayward.

2. In this sense is used the phrase, at all adventures; [à l'aventure, Fr.] By chance; without any rational scheme.

Blows flew at all adventures, wounds and deaths given and taken unexpected; many scarce knowing their enemies from their friends. Hayward.

Where the mind does not perceive probable connection, there men's opinions are the effects of chance and hazard, of a mind floating at all adventures, without choice and without direction. Locke.

3. The occasion of casual events; an enterprise in which something must be left to hazard.

For I must love, and am resolv'd, to try
My fate, or, failing in th' adventure, die. Dryden.

4. This noun, with all its derivatives, is frequently written without ad; as, venture, venture-ous.

To ADVENTURE. v. n. [adventurer, Fr.]
1. To try the chance; to dare.

Be not angry,
Most mighty prince, that I have adventur'd
To try your taking of a false report. Shakspeare.

The tender and delicate woman among you,
which would not adventure to set the sole of her foot upon the ground, for delicateness and tenderness. Deuter. xxviii. 26.

To ADVENTURE. v. a. To put into the power of chance.

For my father fought for you, and adventured his life for, and delivered you out of the hand of Midian. Judges, ix. 17.

It is often used with the reciprocal pronoun;
as, be adventured himself.

ADVENTURER. n. s. [adventurier, Fr.] He that seeks occasions of hazard; he that puts himself in the hands of chance.

He is a great adventurer, said he,
That hath his sword through hard assay foregone. Spenser.

The kings of England did not make the conquest of Ireland; it was begun by particular adventurers, and other voluntaries, who came to seek their fortunes. Sir John Davies.

He intended to hazard his own action, that so the more easily he might win adventures, who else were like to be left forward. Raleigh.

Had it not been for the British, which the late wars drew over, and adventurers or soldiers seated here, Ireland had, by the last war, and plague, been left destitute. Temple.

Their wealthy trade, from pirate's rapine free,
Our merchants shall no more advent'ers be. Dryden.

ADVENTUROUS. adj. [adventurous, Fr.]

1. He that is inclined to adventures; and, consequently, bold, daring, courageous.
At land and sea, in many a doubtful fight,
Was never known a more advent'rous knight;
Who oftner drew his sword, and always for the right. Dryden.

2. Applied to things; that which is full of hazard; which requires courage; dangerous.

But I've already troubled you too long,
Nor dare attempt a more advent'rous song.
My humble verse demands a softer theme;
A painted meadow, or a purling stream. Addison.

ADVENTUROUSLY. adv. [from adventurous.]
After an adventurous manner; boldly; daringly.

They are both hanged; and so would this be,
if he durst steal any thing advent'rously. Shakspeare's Henry V.

ADVENTURESOME. adj. [from adventure.] The same with adventurous: a low word, scarcely used in writing.

ADVENTURESOMENESS. n. s. [from adventuresome] The quality of being adventuresome. Dis?

ADVERB. n. s. [adverbium, Lat.]

A word joined to a verb or adjective, and solely applied to the use of qualifying and restraining the latitude of their signification, by the intimation of some circumstance thereof; as, of quality, manner, degree. Clarke's Latin Grammar.

Thus we say, he runs swiftly; the bird flies aloft; he lives virtuously.

ADVERBIAL. adj. [adverbialis, Lat.] That which has the quality or structure of an adverb.

ADVERBIALLY. adv. [adverbialiter, Lat.] Like an adverb; in the manner of an adverb.

I should think alta was joined adverbially with tremis, did Virgil make use of so equivocal a syntax. Addison.

ADVERSABLE. adj. [from adverſe.] Contrary to; opposita to. Dis?

ADVERSARIA. n. s. [Lat. a book, as it should seem, in which Debtor and Creditor were set in opposition.] A common-place; a book to note in.

These parchments are supposed to have been
St. Paul's adversaria. Bull's Sermons.

ADVERSARY. n. s. [adversaire, Fr. adversarius, Lat.] An opponent; antagonist; enemy; generally applied to those that have verbal or judicial quarrels; as, controvertists or litigants: sometimes

times to an opponent in single combat. It may sometimes imply an open profession of enmity; as we say, a secret enemy is worse than an open adversary.

Yet am I noble as the adversary
I come to cope. Shakespeare's King Lear.

Those rites and ceremonies of the church, therefore, which were the self-same now that they were, when holy and virtuous men maintained them against profane and deriding adversaries, her own children have in derision. Hooker.

Mean while th' adversary of God and man, Satan, with thoughts inflam'd, of highest design, Puts on swift wings. Milton.

An adversary makes a stricter search into us, and discovers every flaw and imperfection in our tempers. A friend exaggerates a man's virtues; an enemy inflames his crimes. Addison.

ADVERSATIVE. adj. [adversativus, Lat.] A term of grammar, applied to a word which makes some opposition or variety: as, in this sentence: This diamond is orient, but it is rough. But is an adversative conjunction.

ADVERSE. adj. [adversus, Lat.] In prose it has now the accent on the first syllable; in verse it is accented on the first by Shakespeare; on either, indifferently, by Milton; on the last by Dryden; on the first, by Roscommon.

1. Acting with contrary directions; as, two bodies in collision.

Was I for this high wreckt upon the sea,
And twice, by adverse winds, from England's bank

Drove back again unto my native clime? Shakespeare.
As when two polar winds blowing adverse,
Upon the Cronian sea together drive
Mountains of ice. Milton.

With adverse blast up turns them from the South, Notus and Afer. Milton.

A cloud of smoke envelopes either host,
And all at once the combatants are lost;
Darkling they join adverse, and shock unseen;
Courfers with courfers jostling, men with men. Dryden.

2. Figuratively, contrary to the wish or desire; thence, calamitous; afflictive; pernicious. It is opposed to prosperous.

What if he hath decreed, that I shall first
Be try'd in humble state, and things adverse;
By tribulations, injuries, insults,
Contempts, and scorns, and snares, and violence. Milton.

Some the prevailing malice of the great,
Unhappy men, or adverse fate,
Sunk deep into the gulfs of an afflicted state. Roscommon.

3. Personally opponent; the person that counteracts another, or contests anything.

Well the law her father was grown her adverse party; and yet her fortune such, as she must favour her rivals. Sidney.

ADVERSITY. n. f. [adversitas, Fr.] Affliction; calamity; that is, opposition to our wishes.

1. The cause of our sorrow; affliction; misfortune. In this sense it may have a plural.

Let me embrace these four adversities,
For wife men say, it is the wisest course. Shakespeare's Henry VI.

2. The state of unhappiness; misery.

Concerning deliverance itself from all adversity, we use not to say men are in adversity, whensoever they feel any small hinderance of their welfare in this world, but when some notable affliction or cross, some great calamity or trouble befalleth them. Hooker.

Sweet are the uses of adversity,
Which like the toad, ugly and venomous,
Wears yet a precious jewel in his head. Shakespeare.

A remembrance of the good use he had made of prosperity, contributed to support his mind under the heavy weight of adversity, which then lay upon him. Atterbury.

ADVERSELY. adv. [from adverse.] In an adverse manner; oppositely; unfortunately.

What I think, I utter, and spend my malice in my breath. If the drink you give me touch my palate adversely, I make a crooked face at it. Shakespeare.

TO ADVERT. v. n. [adverto, Lat.] To attend to; to regard; to observe: with the particle to before the object of regard.

The mind of man being not capable at once to advert to more than one thing, a particular view and examination of such an innumerable number of vast bodies, will afford matter of admiration. Ray on the Creation.

Now to the universal whole advert;
The earth regard as of that whole a part;
In which wide frame more noble worlds abound;
Witness, ye glorious orbs, which hang around. Blackmore.

We sometimes say, To advert the mind to an object.

ADVERTENCE. n. f. [from advert.] Attention to; regard to; consideration.

Christianity may make Archimides his challenge; give it but where it may set its foot; allow but a sober advertence to its proposals, and it will move the whole world. Decay of Piety.

ADVERTENCY. n. f. [from advert.] The fame with advertence. Attention; regard; heedfulness. Too much advertency is not your talent; or else you had fled from that text, as from a rock. Swift.

ADVERTENT. adj. [from advert.] Attentive; vigilant; heedful.

This requires choice parts, great attention of mind, sequestration from the importunity of secular employments, and a long advertent and deliberate connexing of consequents. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

TO ADVERTISE. v. a. [advertis, Fr.] It is now spoken with the accent upon the last syllable; but appears to have been anciently accented on the second.]

1. To inform another; to give intelligence; with an accusative of the person informed.

The bishop did require a respite,
Wherein he might the king his lord advertise,
Whether our daughter were legitimate. Shakespeare.
As I by friends am well advertised,
Sir Edmund Courtney, and the haughty prelate,
With many more confederates are in arms. Shakespeare.

The king was not so shallow, nor so ill advertised, as not to perceive the intention of the French king. Bacon.

I hope ye will advertise me fairly of what they dislike. Digby.

2. To inform; to give notice; with of before the subject of information.

Perhates, understanding that Solymán expected more assured advertisement, unto the other Bassas declared the death of the emperor; of which they advertised Solymán; firming those letters with all their hands and seals. Knox's History of the Turks.

They were to advertise the chief hero of the distresses of his subjects, occasioned by his absence. Dryden.

3. To give notice of anything, by means of an advertisement in the publick prints; as, He advertised his lost.

ADVERTISEMENT, or ADVERTISEMENT. n. f. [advertissement, Fr.]

1. Instruction; admonition.

'Tis all men's office to speak patience
To those, that wring under the load of sorrow;
But no man's virtue nor sufficiency,
To be so moral, when he shall endure
The like himself: therefore give me no counsel;
My griefs are louder than advertisement. Shakespeare's Much ado about Nothing.

Cyrus was once minded to have put Cræsus to death, but hearing him report the advertisement of Solon, he spared his life. Abbot's Description of the World.

2. Intelligence; information.

Then, as a cunning prince that useth spies,
If they return no news, doth nothing know;
But if they make advertisement of lies,
The prince's counsel all awry do go. Sir John Davies.

He had received advertisement, that the party which was sent for his relief, had received some bruise, which would much retard their march. Clarendon.

The drum and trumpet, by their several sounds, serve for many kinds of advertisements, in military affairs: the bells serve to proclaim a scare-fire; and, in some places, water-breaches; the departure of a man, woman, or child; time of divine service; the hour of the day; the day of the month. Holker.

3. Notice of any thing published in a paper of intelligence.

ADVERTISER. n. f. [advertiseur, Fr.]

1. He that gives intelligence or information.

2. The paper in which advertisements are published.

ADVERTISING, or ADVERTISING. part. adj. [from advertis.] Active in giving intelligence; monitory: a word not now in use.

As I was then
Advertising, and holy to your business,
Not changing heart with habit, I am still Attorned at your service. Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.

TO ADVERTISE. v. n. [advertis, Fr.] To draw towards evening. Dick.

ADVICE. n. f. [avis, avis, Fr. from avis, low Lat.]

1. Counsel; instruction: except that instruction implies superiority, and advice may be given by equals or inferiors.

Break we our watch up, and, by my advice,
Let us impart what we have seen to-night
Unto young Hamlet. Shakespeare's Hamlet.

O troubled, weak, and coward, as thou art!
Without thy poor advice, the lab'ring heart
To worse extremes with swifter steps would run;
Not sav'd by virtue, yet by vice undone. Prior.

2. Reflection; prudent consideration: as, he always acts with good advice.

What he hath won, that he hath fortified:
So hot a speed, with such advice dispos'd,
Such temperate order, in so fierce a course,
Doth want example. Shakespeare's King John.

3. Consultation; deliberation: with the particle with.

Great princes, taking advice with workmen,
With no less cost, set their things together. Bacon's Essay.

4. Intelligence: as, the merchants received advice of their loss.

This sense is somewhat low, and chiefly commercial.

ADVICE-BOAT. n. f. A vessel employed to bring intelligence.

ADVISABLE. adj. [from advise.] Prudent; fit to be advised.

Some judge it advisable for a man to account with his heart every day; and this, no doubt, is the best and surest course; for still the oftner, the better. South's Sermons.

It is not advisable to reward, where men have the tenderness not to punish. L'Estrange's Fables.

ADVISABLENESS. n. f. [from advisable.] The quality of being advisable, or fit; fitness; propriety.

TO ADVISE. v. a. [advise, Fr.]

1. To counsel: with the particle to before the thing advised.

If you do stir abroad, go arm'd —
— Arm'd, brother!

Brother I advise you to the best. Shakespeare's King Lear.

I would advise all gentlemen to learn merchants accounts, and not to think it a skill that belongs not to them. Locke.

When I consider the scruples and cautions I here lay in your way, methinks it looks as if I advised you to something which I would have offered at, but in effect not done. Locke.

2. To give information; to inform; to make acquainted with any thing: often with the particle of before the thing told.

You were advised, his flesh was capable
Of wounds and fears; and that his forward spirit,
Would

Would lift him, where most trade of danger rang'd. Shakespeare.

Such discourse bring on
As may advise him of his happy state;
Happiness in his power, left free to will. Par. Lost.
A posting messenger dispatch'd from hence,
Of this fair troop advis'd their aged prince. Dryden's Æneid.

TO ADVISE. v. n.

1. To consult; with the particle with before the person consulted; as, be advised with his compa- ny.
2. To consider; to deliberate.

Advise if this be worth
Attempting, or to fit in darkness here,
Hatching vain empires. Milton's Par. Lost. b. ii.

ADVISED. participial adj. [from advise.]

1. Acting with deliberation and design; prudent; wise.

Let his travel appear rather in his discourse, than in his apparel or gesture; and, in his discourse, let him be rather advised in his answers, than forward to tell stories. Bacon's Ess.

Th' Almighty Father where he sits
Shrin'd in his sanctuary of heav'n secure,
Consulting on the sum of things foreseen,
This tumult, and permitted all, advis'd. Par. Lost. b. vi.

2. Performed with deliberation; done on purpose; acted with design.

By that which we work naturally, as, when we breathe, sleep, and move, we set forth the glory of God, as natural agents do; albeit we have no express purpose to make that our end, nor any advised determination therein to follow a law. Hooker, b. i. p. 49.

In my school-days, when I had lost one shaft,
I shot his fellow of the self-same flight,
The self-same way, with more advised watch,
To find the other forth; by vent'ring both,
I oft found both. Shakespeare. Merch. of Venice.

ADVISEDLY. adv. [from advised.] Soberly;
heedfully; deliberately; purposely; by design;
prudently.

This book advisedly read and diligently followed but one year at home, would do more good than three years travel abroad. Ascham.

Surprize may be made by moving things, when the party is in haste, and cannot stay to consider advisedly of that which is moved. Bacon, Essay xxiii.

Thou filest second thoughts (by all allowed the best) a relapse, and accusest constancy of mischief in what is natural and advisedly undertaken. Sir John Suckling.

ADVISEDNESS. n. f. [from advised.] Deliberation; cool and prudent procedure.

While things are in agitation, private men may modestly tender their thoughts to the consideration of those that are in authority; to whose care it belongeth, in prescribing concerning indifferent things, to proceed with all just advisedness and moderation. Saunderson's Judgment in one View.

ADVISEMENT. n. f. [from advise, Fr.]

1. Counsel; information.

Mote I wote,
What strange adventure do ye now pursue?
Perhaps my succour or *advise*ment meet,
Mote stead you much. Fairy Queen.
I will, according to your *advise*ment, declare the evils which seem most hurtful. Spenser's Stat. of Ireland.

2. It is taken, likewise, in old writers, for prudence and circumspection. It is now, in both senses, antiquated.

ADVISER. n. f. [from advise.] The person that advises, or gives counsel; a counsellor.

Here, free from court-compliances, he walks,
And with himself, his best *advise*r, talks. Waller.

They never fail of their most artful and indefatigable address, to silence this impertinent *advise*r, whose severity awes their excesses. Rogers's Sermon.

ADULTATION. n. f. [from adulation, Fr. adulatio, Lat.]
Flattery; high compliment.

O be sick, great Greatness!
And bid thy ceremony give thee cure.
Thinkst thou the fiery fever will go out
With titles blown from adulation? Shakespeare. Hen. V.

They who flattered him most before, mentioned him now with the greatest bitterness, without imputing the least crime to him, committed since the time of that exalted adulation, or that was not then as much known to them, as it could be now. Clarendon.

ADULTATOR. n. f. [from adulator, Lat.] A flatterer.

ADULTATORY. adj. [from adulatorius, Lat.] Flattering; full of compliments.

ADULT. adj. [from adultus, Lat.] Grown up; past the age of infancy and weakness.

They would appear less able to approve themselves, not only to the confessor, but even to the catechist, in their adult age than they were in their minority; as having scarce ever thought of the principles of their religion, since they conned them to avoid correction. Decay of Piety.

The earth, by these applauded schools, 'tis said,
This single crop of men and women bred;
Who grown adult, so chance, it seems, enjoin'd,
Did, male and female, propagate their kind. Blackmore.

ADULT. n. f. A person above the age of infancy, or grown to some degree of strength; sometimes full-grown: a word used chiefly by medicinal writers.

The depression of the cranium, without a fracture, can but seldom occur; and then it happens to children, whose bones are more pliable and soft than those of adults. Sharp's Surgery.

ADULTNESS. n. f. [from adult.] The state of being adult. See ADULESCENCE. DiCt.

TO ADULTER, v. a. [from adulter, Fr. adultero, Lat.] To commit adultery with another; a word not classical.

His chaste wife

He *adulter*s still: his thoughts lye with a whore. Ben Jonson.

ADULTERANT. n. f. [from adulterans, Lat.] The person or thing which adulterates.

TO ADULTERATE. v. a. [from adulter, Fr. adultero,
Lat.] To commit adultery.

1. To commit adultery.

But fortune, oh!
Adulterates hourly with thine uncle John. Shakespeare.

2. To corrupt by some foreign admixture; to contaminate.

Common pot-ashes, bought of them that sell it in shops, who are not so foolishly knavish as to adulterate them with salt-petre, which is much dearer than pot-ashes. Boyle.

Could a man be composed to such an advantage of constitution, that it should not at all adulterate
the images of his mind; yet this second nature would alter the crasis of his understanding. Glauville's Sceptis Scientifica, c. xvi.

The present war has so adulterated our tongue with strange words, that it would be impossible for one of our great grandfathers to know what his posterity have been doing. SpeLatter.

ADULTERATE. adj. [from to adulterate.]

1. Tainted with the guilt of adultery.
I am possess'd with an adulterate blot;
My blood is mingled with the grime of lust;
Being strumpeted by thy contagion. Shakespeare. Comedy of Err.

--That incestuous, that adulterate beast. Shakespeare.

2. Corrupted with some foreign mixture.

It does indeed differ no more, than the maker of adulterate wares does from the vender of them. Government of the Tongue.

They will have all their gold and silver, and may keep their adulterate copper at home. Swift's Miscellanies.

ADULTERATENESS. n. f. [from adulterate.]
The quality or state of being adulterate, or counterfeit.

ADULTERATION. n. f. [from adulterate.]

1. The act of adulterating or corrupting by foreign mixture; contamination.

To make the compound pass for the rich metal simple, is an adulteration, or counterfeiting; but if it be done avowedly, and without disguising, it may be a great saving of the richer metal. Bacon's Natural History, N° 798.

2. The state of being adulterated, or contaminated.

Such translations are like the adulteration of the noblest wines, where something of the colour, spirit, and flavour will remain. Folcon on the Glass.

ADULTERER. n. f. [from adulter, Lat.] The person guilty of adultery.

With what impatience must the muse behold
The wife by her procuring husband sold;
For tho' the law makes null the adulter's deed
Of lands to her, the cuckold may succeed. Dryden's Juvenal.

ADULTERESS. n. f. [from adulter, Lat.] A woman that commits adultery.

The Spartan lady replied, when she was asked,
What was the punishment for adulteresses? There are no such things here. Government of the Tongue, § 3.
Helen's rich attire;
From Argos by the fam'd adulter's brought;
With golden flow'rs and winding foliage wrought. Dryden's Virgil.

ADULTERINE. n. f. [from adulterine, Fr. adulterinus, Lat.] A child born of an adulteress; a term of canon law.

ADULTEROUS. adj. [from adulter, Lat.] Guilty of adultery.

Th' adulterous Antony most large

In his abominations, turns you off,
And gives his potent regiment to a trull,
That noses it against us. Shakespeare. Ant. and Cleop.

An adulterous person is tied to restitution of the injury, so far as it is reparable; and to make provision for the children, that they may not injure the legitimate. Taylor.

Think on whose faith th' adulterous youth re-ly'd;

Who promis'd, who procur'd the Spartan bride?
Dryden's Æn.

ADULTERY. n. f. [from adulterium, Lat.] The act of violating the bed of a married person.

All thy domestic griefs at home be left.
The wife's adultery, with the servant's theft;
And (the most racking thought which can intrude)
Forget false friends, and their ingratitude. Dryden's Juvenal.

ADUMBRANT. adj. [from adumbrate.] That which gives a slight resemblance.

TO ADUMBRATE. v. a. [from adumbrare, Lat.]

To shadow out; to give a slight likeness; to exhibit a faint resemblance, like that which shadows afford of the bodies which they represent.

Heaven is designed for our reward, as well as refuge; and therefore is adumbrated by all those positive excellencies, which can endear or recommend. Decay of Piety.

ADUMBRATION. n. f. [from adumbrare.]

1. The act of adumbrating, or giving a slight and imperfect representation. See ADUMBRATE.

To make some adumbration of that we mean, it is rather an impulsion or confusion of the air, than an elision or section of the same. Bacon's Nat. Hist. N° 187.

2. The slight and imperfect representation of a thing; a faint sketch.

The observers view but the backside of the hangings; the right one is on the other side the grave: and our knowledge is but like those broken ends; at best a most confused adumbration. Glauville's Sceptis Scientifica.

Those of the first sort have some adumbration of the rational nature, as vegetables have of the sen-

ADUNATION. n. f. [from adunare, Lat.]

The state of being united; union: a word of little use.

When, by glaciation, wood, straw, dust, and water, are supposed to be united into one lump, the cold does not cause any real union or aduna- tion, but only hardening the aqueous parts of the liquor into ice; the other bodies being accidentally present in that liquor, are frozen up in it, but not really united. Boyle.

ADUNCITY. n. f. [from aduncitas, Lat.] Crookedness; flexure inwards; hookedness.

There can be no question, but the aduncity of the pounces, and beaks of the hawks, is the
Vol. I. N° 2. F cause

ADU

cause of the great and habitual immorality of those animals. Arbutnot and Pope's Mart. Scrib.

ADU'QUE. adj. [aduncus, Lat.] Crooked; bending inwards; hooked.

The birds that are speakers, are parrots, pies, jays, daws, and ravens; of which parrots have an adunque bill, but the rest not.

Bacon's Natural History, N° 238.

ADVOCACY. n. f. [from advocate.] The act of pleading; vindication; defence; apology: a word in little use.

If any there are who are of opinion that there are no antipodes, or that the stars do fall, they shall not want herein the applause or advocacy of Satan. Brown's Vulgar Errors, l. i.

ADVOCATE. n. f. [advocatus, Lat.]

1. He that pleads the cause of another in a court of judicature.

An advocate, in the general import of the word, is that person who has the pleading and management of a judicial cause. In a strict way of speaking, only that person is styled advocate, who is the patron of the cause, and is often, in Latin, termed patronus, and, in English, a person of the long robe. Ayl. Par.

Learn what thou ow'st thy country and thy friend;

What's requisite to spare, and what to spend:

Learn this; and, after, envy not the store

Of the greas'd advocate that grinds the poor.

Dryden's Persius.

2. He that pleads any cause, in whatever manner, as a controvertist or vindicator.

If she dare trust me with her little babe, I'll shew't the king, and undertake to be Her advocate to th' loudest. Shakespeare's Hamlet.

Of the several forms of government that have been, or are, in the world, that cause seems commonly the better, that has the better advocate, or is advantaged by fresh experience.

Temple's Miscellanies.

3. It is used with the particle for before the person or thing, in whose favour the plea is offered.

Foes to all living worth except your own,

And advocates for folly dead and gone.

Pope's Epistles.

4. In the scriptural and sacred sense, it stands for one of the offices of our Redeemer.

Me his advocate,

And propitiation; all his works on me,

Good, or not good, ingraft. Milton's Para. Lost.

ADVOCATION. n. f. [from advocate.] The office or act of pleading; plea; apology.

My advocation is not now in tune;

My lord is not my lord; nor should I know him,

Were he in favour, as in humour, alter'd.

Shakespeare's Othello.

ADVOLATION. n. f. [advolo, advolutum, Lat.] The act of flying to something. Dict.

ADVOLUTION. n. f. [advolutio, Lat.] The act of rolling to something.

ADVO'UTRY. n. f. [avoutrie, Fr.] Adultery.

He was the most perfidious man upon the earth, and he had made a marriage compounded between an advoutry and a rape.

Bacon's Henry VII.

ADVOWE'. n. f. He that has the right of advowson. See ADVOWSON.

ADVO'WSON, or ADVO'WZEN. n. f. [In common law.]

A right to present to a benefice, and signifies as much as Jus Patronatus. In the canon law, it is so termed, because they that originally obtained the right of presenting to any church, were great benefactors thereto; and are therefore termed sometimes Patroni, sometimes Advocati. Corvel.

To ADU'RE. v. n. [aduro, Lat.] To burn up: not in use.

Such a degree of heat, which doth neither melt nor scorch, doth mellow, and not adure.

Bacon's Natural History, N° 319.

ADU'ST. adj. [adustus, Lat.]

1. Burnt up; hot as with fire, scorched.

By this means, the virtual heat of the water will enter; and such a heat as will not make the body adust, or fragile. Bacon.

AER

Which with torrid heat,
And vapours as the Libyan air adust,
Began to parch that temperate clime.

Milton's Paradise Lost.

2. It is generally now applied, in a medicinal or philosophical sense, to the complexion and humours of the body.

Such humours are adust, as, by long heat, become of a hot and fiery nature, as cholera, and the like. Quincy.

To ease the soul of one oppressive weight,
This quits an empire, that embroils a state.

The same adust complexion has impell'd
Charles to the convent, Philip to the field. Pope.

ADU'STED. adj. [See ADUST.]

1. Burnt; scorched; dried with fire.

Sulphurous and nitrous foam
They found, they mingled, and with subtle art,
Concocted, and adusted, they reduced
To blackest grain, and into store convey'd.

Paradise Lost.

2. Hot, as the complexion.

They are but the fruits of adusted cholera, and the evaporations of a vindictive spirit. Howell.

ADU'STIBLE. adj. [from adust.] That which may be adust, or burnt up. Dict.

ADUSTION. n. f. [from adust.] The act of burning up, or drying, as by fire.

This is ordinarily a consequent of a burning colliquate fever; the softer parts being melted away, the heat continuing its adustion, upon the drier and fleshy parts, changes into a marcid fever. Harvey on Consumptions.

ADZ. n. f. See ADDICE.

AE, or Æ. A diphthong of very frequent use in the Latin language, which seems not properly to have any place in the English; since the æ of the Saxons has been long out of use, being changed to e simple, to which, in words frequently occurring, the æ of the Romans is, in the same manner, altered, as in æquator, æquinoxial, and even in Eneas.

ÆGLOGUE. n. f. [written instead of eclogue, from a mistaken etymology.] A pastoral; a dialogue in verse between goat-herds.

Which moved him rather in æclogues otherwise to write, doubting, perhaps, his ability, which he little needed, or minding to furnish our tongue, with this kind wherein it faulteth.

Spenser's Pastorals.

ÆGILOPS. n. f. αἰγώψ, Gr. signifying goat-eyed, the goat being subject to this ailment.

A tumour or swelling in the great corner of the eye, by the root of the nose, either with or without an inflammation: also a plant so called, for its supposed virtues against such a distemper. Quincy.

Ægilops is a tubercle in the inner canthus of the eye.

ÆGYPTIACUM. n. f. An ointment consisting only of honey, verdigrise and vinegar. Quincy.

ÆL, or EAL, or AL.

In compound names, as πᾶν in the Greek compounds, signifies all, or altogether. So Ælwin, is a complete conqueror: Albert, all illustrious: Alfred, altogether reverend: Alfred, altogether peaceful. To these Pammachius, Pancratius, Pamphilus, &c. do in some measure answer. Gibson's Camden.

ÆLF, (which, according to various dialects, is pronounced ulf, welph, bulph, kilp, helfe, and, at this day, helfe) implies assistance. So Ælfrin is victorious, and Ælfrwald, an auxiliary governor; Ælfgifa, a lender of assistance: with which Boetius, Symmachus, Epicurus, &c. bear a plain analogy. Gibson's Camden.

ÆNIGMA. See ENIGMA.

ÆRIAL. adj. [aërius, Lat.]

1. Belonging to the air, as consisting of it.

The thunder, when to roll
With terour through the dark aerial hall.

Paradise Lost.

From all that can with fins or feathers fly,
Thro' the aerial or the wat'ry sky. Prior.

I gathered the thickness of the air, or aerial interval, of the glasses at that ring. Newton's Opticks.

Vegetables abound more with aerial particles than animal substances. Arbutnot on Aliments.

AFE

2. Produced by the air.

The gifts of heav'n my foll'wing song pursues,
Aerial honey, and ambrosial dews.

Dryd. Virg. Georg.

3. Inhabiting the air.

Where those immortal shapés
Of bright aerial spirits live inspher'd,
In regions mild, of calm and serene air.

Paradise Regained.

Aerial animals may be subdivided into birds and flies. Locke.

4. Placed in the air.

Here subterranean works and cities see,
There towns aerial on the waving tree.

Pope's Essay on Man.

5. High; elevated in situation, and therefore in the air.

A spacious city stood, with firmest walls,
Sure mounded, and with numerous turrets crown'd,

Aerial spires, and citadels, the seat
Of kings and heroes resolute in war. Phillips.

ÆRIE. n. f. [aërie, Fr.]

The proper word in hawks and other birds of prey for that which we generally call a nest in other birds. Corvel.

ÆRO'LOGY. n. f. [ἀῖρ and λόγος, Gr.] The doctrine of the air.

ÆRO'SCOPY. n. f. [ἀῖρ and σκόπος, Gr.] The observation of the air. Dict.

ÆTHIOPS-MINERAL. n. f.

A medicine so called, from its dark colour, prepared of quicksilver and sulphur, ground together in a marble mortar to a black powder. Such as have used it most, think its virtues not very great. Quincy.

ÆTITES. n. f. [ἀἴτης, an eagle.] Eagle-stone.

It is about the bigness of a chestnut, and hollow, with somewhat in it that rattles upon shaking. Quincy.

ÆFA'R. adv. [from a for at, and far.] See FARA.

1. At a great distance.

So shaken as we are, so wan with care,
Find we a time for frightened peace to pant,
And breathe short-winded accents of new broils,

To be commenc'd in strouds æfar remote? Shakespeare's Henry IV.

We hear better when we hold our breath than contrary; inso much as in listening to attain a sound æfar off, men hold their breath.

Bacon's Natural History, N° 284.

2. To or from a great distance.

Hector hastened to relieve his boy;
Dismiss'd his burnish'd helm that shone æfar,
The pride of warriors, and the pomp of war.

Dryden.

3. From æfar; from a distant place.

The rough Vultur, furious in its course,
With rapid streams divides the fruitful grounds,
And from æfar in hollow murmur sounds.

Addison on Italy.

4. Æfar off; remotely distant.

Much suspecting his secret ends, he entertained a treaty of peace with France, but secretly and æfar off, and to be governed as occasions should vary. Sir John Hayward.

ÆFE'ARD. participial adj. [from to fear, for to fright, with a redundant.]

1. Frighted; terrified; afraid.

He loudly bray'd, that like was never heard,
And from his wide devouring oven sent
A flake of fire, that flashing in his beard,
Him all amaz'd, and almost made æfeard.

Fairy Queen.

But tell me, Hal, art thou not horribly æfeard?
Thou being heir apparent, could the world pick thee out three such enemies again?

Shakespeare's Henry IV.

Till he cherish too much beard,
And make Love, or me æfeard.

Ben Jonson's Underwoods.

2. It has the particle of before the object of fear.

Fear

Fear is described by Spenser to ride in armour, at the clashing whereof he looks afraid of himself. Peacbam.

It is now obsolete; the last authour whom I have found using it, is Sedley.

AFFER. n. f. [Lat.] The south-west wind. With adverse blasts upturns them from the south, Notus and Affer, black with thund'rous clouds. Milton's Paradise Lost, b. x.

AFFABILITY. n. f. [affabilitas, Fr. affabilité, Lat.] See AFFABLE.

The quality of being affable; easiness of manners; courteousness; civility; condescension. It is commonly used of superiors.

Hearing of her beauty and her wit,
Her affability and bashful modesty,
Her wond'rous qualities, and mild behaviour. Shakespeare.

He was of a most flowing courtesy and affability to all men, and so desirous to oblige them, that he did not enough consider the value of the obligation, or the merit of the person. Clarendon.

All instances of charity, sweetness of conversation, affability, admonition, all significations of tenderness, care and watchfulness, must be expressed towards children. Taylor.

It is impossible for a public minister to be so open and easy to all his old friends, as he was in his private condition; but this may be helped out by an affability of address. L'Estrange.

AFFABLE. adj. [affable, Fr. affable, Lat.]

1. Easy of manners; accessible; courteous; complaisant. It is used of superiors.

He was affable, and both well and fair spoken, and would use strange sweetness and blandishment of words, where he desired to affect or persuade any thing that he took to heart. Bacon.

Her father is
An affable and courteous gentleman. Shakespeare. Tam. Shrew.

Gentle to me, and affable hath been
Thy condescension, and shall be honour'd ever
With grateful memory. Milt. Par. Lost, b. viii.
2. It is applied to the external appearance; benign; mild; favourable.

Augustus appeared, looking round him with a serene and affable countenance upon all the writers of his age. Tatler.

AFFABLY. adv. [from affable.] In an affable manner; courteously; civilly.

AFFABROUS. adj. [affabre, Fr.] Skillfully made; complete; finished in a workman-like manner. Dict.

AFFABULATION. n. f. [affabulatio, Lat.] The moral of a fable. Dict.

AFFAIR. n. f. [affaire, Fr.] Business; something to be managed or transacted. It is used for both private and public matters.

I was not born for courts or great affairs;
I pay my debts, believe, and say my prayers. Pope.
A good acquaintance with method will greatly assist every one in ranging, disposing, and managing all human affairs. Watts's Logic.

What St. John's skill in state affairs,
What Ormond's valour, Oxford's cares,
To aid their sinking country lent,
Was all destroy'd by one event. Swift.

To AFFAIR. v. n. [from affier, Fr.] To confirm; to give a sanction to; to establish: an old term of law.

Bleed, bleed, poor country!
Great tyranny, lay thou thy basis sure;
For goodness dares not check thee!
His title is affair'd. Shakespeare. Macbeth.

AFFECT. n. f. [from the verb affect.]

1. Affect; passion; sensation.
It seemeth that as the feet have a sympathy with the head; so the wrists have a sympathy with the heart; we see the affects and passions of the heart and spirits are notably disclosed by the pulse. Bacon's Natural History, N° 97.

2. Quality; circumstance.
I find it difficult to make out one single ulcer, as authors describe it, without other symptoms or affects joined to it. Wifeman.

This is only the antiquated word for affectation. To AFFECT. v. a. [affecter, Fr. affectio, affectum, Lat.]

1. To act upon; to produce effects in any other thing.

The sun
Had first his precept so to move, so shine
As might affect the earth with cold and heat, Scarce tolerable. Milt. Par. Lost, b. x.

The generality of men are wholly governed by names, in matters of good and evil; so far as these qualities relate to, and affect, the actions of men. South's Sermons.

Yet even these two particles do reciprocally affect each other with the same force and vigour, as they would do at the same distance in any other situation imaginable. Bentley's Sermons.

2. To move the passions.

As a thinking man cannot but be very much affected with the idea of his appearing in the presence of that Being, whom none can see and live; he must be much more affected, when he considers, that this Being whom he appears before, will examine the actions of his life, and reward or punish him accordingly. Addis. Spect. N° 513.

3. To aim at; to endeavour after: spoken of persons.

Atrides broke
His silence next, but ponder'd ere he spoke:
Wife are thy words, and glad I would obey,
But this proud man affects imperial sway. Dryden's Iliad.

4. To tend to; to endeavour after: spoken of things.

The drops of every fluid affect a round figure, by the mutual attraction of their parts; as, the globe of the earth and sea affects a round figure, by the mutual attraction of its parts by gravity. Newton's Opticks.

5. To be fond of; to be pleased with; to love; to regard with fondness.

That little which some of the heathen did chance to hear, concerning such matter as the sacred Scripture plentifully containeth, they did in wonderful sort affect. Hooker, b. i.

There is your crown;
And he that wears the crown immortally,
Long guard it yours! If I affect it more,
Than as your honour, and as your renown,
Let me no more from this obedience rise. Shakespeare. Henry IV.

Think not that wars we love, and strife affects;
Or that we hate sweet peace. Fairfax, b. ii.
None but a woman could a man direct,
To tell us women what we most affect. Dryden's Wife of Bath.

6. To make a shew of something; to study the appearance of any thing; with some degree of hypocrisy.

Another nymph, amongst the many fair,
Before the rest affected still to stand,
And watch'd my eye, preventing my command. Prior.

These often carry the humour so far, till their affected coldness and indifference quite kills all the fondness of a lover. Addison, Spectator, N° 171.

Coquet and coy at once her air,
Both studied, though both seem neglected;
Careless she is with artful care,
Affecting to seem unaffected. Congreve.

The conscious husband, whom like symptoms seize,

Charges on her the guilt of their disease;
Affecting fury, acts a madman's part,
He'll rip the fatal secret from her heart. Gran.

7. To imitate in an unnatural and constrained manner.

Spenser, in affecting the ancients, writ no language; yet I would have him read for his matter, but as Virgil read Ennius. Ben Jonson's Discoveries.

8. To convict of some crime; to attain with guilt: a phrase merely juridical.

By the civil law, if a dowry with a wife be promised and not paid, the husband is not obliged to allow her alimony. But if her parents shall become insolvent by some misfortune, she shall have alimony, unless you can affect them with fraud, in promising what they knew they were not able to perform. Ayliffe's Parergon.

AFFECTATION. n. f. [affectatio, Lat.]

1. Fondness; high degree of liking; commonly with some degree of culpability.

In things of their own nature indifferent, if either councils or particular men have at any time, with sound judgment, disliked conformity between the church of God and infidels, the cause thereof hath been somewhat else than only affectation of dissimilitude. Hooker, b. iv. § 7.

2. An artificial shew; an elaborate appearance; a false pretence.

It has been, from age to age, an affectation to love the pleasure of solitude, among those who cannot possibly be supposed qualified for passing life in that manner. Spectator, N° 264.

AFFECTED. participle adj. [from affect.]

1. Moved; touched with affection; internally disposed or inclined.

No marvel then if he were ill affected. Shakespeare's King Lear.

The model they seemed affected to in their directory, was not like to any of the foreign reformed churches now in the world. Clarendon.

2. Studied with over-much care, or with hypocritical appearance.

These antic, lisping, affected phantasies, these new tuners of accents. Shakespeare. Romeo and Juliet.

3. In a personal sense, full of affectation; as, an affected lady.

AFFECTEDLY. adv. [from affected.]

1. In an affected manner; hypocritically; with more appearance than reality.

Perhaps they are affectedly ignorant; they are so willing it should be true, that they have not attempted to examine it. Govern. of the Tongue, § 5.

Some indeed have been so affectedly vain, as to counterfeit immortality, and have stolen their death, in hopes to be esteemed immortal. Brown's Vulgar Errors, b. vii. c. 10.

By talking so familiarly of one hundred and ten thousand pounds, by a tax upon a few commodities, it is plain, you are either naturally or affectedly ignorant of our condition. Swift.

2. Studiously; with laboured intention.

Some misperceptions concerning the divine attributes, tend to the corrupting of men's manners, as if they were designed and affectedly chosen for that purpose. Decay of Piety.

AFFECTEDNESS. n. f. [from affected.] The quality of being affected, or of making false appearances.

AFFECTION. n. f. [affection, Fr. affectio, Lat.]

1. The state of being affected by any cause, or agent. This general sense is little in use.

Some men there are love not a gaping pig;
Some that are mad if they behold a cat;
And others, when the bag-pipe sings i' th' nose, cannot contain their urine, for affection. Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.

2. Passion of any kind.

Then gan the Palmer thus: most wretched man,
That to affections does the bridle lend;
In their beginning they are weak and wan,
But soon through sufferance grow to fearful end. Fairy Queen.

Impute it to my late solitary life, which is prone to affections. Sidney, b. i.

Affections, as joy, grief, fear, and anger, with such like, being, as it were, the sundry fashions and forms of appetite, can neither rise at the conceit of a thing indifferent, nor yet choose but rise at the sight of some things. Hooker, b. i.

To speak truth of Cæsar,
I have not known when his affections sway'd
More than his reason. Shakespeare's Julius Cæsar.

Zeal ought to be composed of the highest degrees of pious affections; of which some are milder and gentler, some sharper and more vehement. Sprat's Sermons.

I can present nothing beyond this to your affections, to excite your love and desire. Tilkinson.

3. Love; kindness; good-will to some persons: often with so or towards, before the person.

I have acquainted you
With the dear love I bear to fair Anne Page,
Who mutually hath answer'd my affection.

Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor.
My king is tangl'd in affection to
A creature of the queen's, lady Anne Bullen.

Shakespeare.
What warmth is there in your affections towards any of these princely suitors?

Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.
Make his interest depend upon mutual affection and good correspondence with others.

Collier on General Kindness.
Nor at first sight, like most, admires the fair;
For you he lives, and you alone shall share
His last affection, as his early care.

Pope.
4. Good-will to any object; zeal; passionate regard.

I have reason to distrust mine own judgment, as that which may be overborn by my zeal and affection to this cause.

Bacon.
Set your affection upon my words; desire them,
and ye shall be instructed.

Wisdom, vi. 11.
His integrity to the king was without blemish, and his affection to the church so notorious, that he never deserted it.

Clarendon.
All the precepts of christianity command us to moderate our passions, to temper our affections towards all things below.

Temple.
Let not the mind of a student be under the influence of warm affection to things of sense, when he comes to the search of truth.

Wat's Improvement of the Mind.
5. State of the mind, in general.

There grows,
In my most ill compos'd affection, such
A stanchless avarice, that, were I king,
I should cut off the nobles for their lands.

Shakespeare's Macbeth.
The man that hath no music in himself,
Nor is not mov'd with concord of sweet sounds,
Is fit for treasons, stratagems, and spoils;
The motions of his spirit are dull as night,
And his affections dark as Erebus:
Let no such man be trusted.

Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.
6. Quality; property.

The certainty and accurateness which is attributed to what mathematicians deliver, must be restrained to what they teach, concerning those purely mathematical disciplines, arithmetic and geometry, where the affections of quantity are abstractedly considered.

Boyle.
The mouth being necessary to conduct the voice to the shape of its cavity, necessarily gives the voice some particular affection of sound in its passage before it come to the lips.

Holder's Elements of Speech.
God may have joined immaterial souls to other kinds of bodies, and in other laws of union; and,
from those different laws of union, there will arise quite different affections, and natures, and species of the compound beings.

Bentley's Sermon.
7. State of the body, as acted upon by any cause.

It seem'd to me a venereal gonorrhæa, and others thought it arose from some scorbutical affection.

Wisehead's Surgery.
8. Lively representation in painting.

Affection is the lively representation of any passion whatsoever, as if the figures stood not upon a cloth or board, but as if they were acting upon a stage.

Wotton's Architecture.
9. It is used by Shakespeare sometimes for affection.

There was nothing in it that could indite the author of affection.

Shakespeare.
AFFECTIONATE. adj. [affectionné, Fr. from affection.]

1. Full of affection; strongly moved: warm;
zealous.

In their love of God, and desire to please him, men can never be too affectionate; and it is as true, that in their hatred of sin, men may be sometimes too passionate.

Sprat's Sermons.
2. Strongly inclined to; disposed to; with the particle to.

As for the parliament, it presently took fire;
being affectionate, of old, to the war of France.

Bacon's Henry VII.
3. Fond; tender.

He found me sitting, beholding this picture, I know not with how affectionate countenance, but,
I am sure, with a most affectionate mind.

Sidney.
Away they fly
Affectionate, and undesiring bear
The most delicious morsel to their young.

Thomson's Spring.
4. Benevolent; tender.

When we reflect on all this affectionate care of Providence for our happiness, with what wonder must we observe the little effect it has on men.

Rogers's Sermons.
AFFECTIONATELY. adv. [from affectionate.]
In an affectionate manner; fondly; tenderly; benevolently.

AFFECTIONATENESS. n. f. [from affectionate.]
The quality or state of being affectionate; fondness; tenderness; good-will; benevolence.

AFFECTIONED. adj. [from affection.]
1. Affected, conceited. This sense is now obsolete.

and utters it by great swaths.

Shakespeare's Twelfth Night.
2. Inclined; mentally disposed.

Be kindly affectioned one to another. Rom. xii. 10.

AFFECTIONUSLY. adv. [from affect.] In an affecting manner.

AFFECTIVE. adj. [from affect.] That which affects; that which strongly touches. It is generally used for painful.

Pain is so uneasy a sentiment, that very little of it is enough to corrupt every enjoyment; and the effect God intends this variety of ungrateful and affective sentiments should have on us, is to reclaim our affections from this valley of tears.

Rogers.
AFFECTUOSITY. n. f. [from affectuous. Passionateness.

AFFECTUOUS. adj. [from affect.] Full of passion; as, an affectuous speech: a word little used.

Such as are appointed in court-leets, &c. upon oath, to mulct such as have committed faults arbitrarily punishable, and have no express penalty set down by statute.

Cowel.
AFFIANCE. n. f. [affiance, from affier, Fr.]

1. A marriage-contract.

At last such grace I found, and means I wrought,
That I that lady to my spouse had won,
Accord of friends, consent of parents fought,
Affiance made, my happiness begun.

Fairy Queen, b. ii.
2. Trust in general; confidence; secure reliance.

The duke is virtuous, mild, and too well given
To dream on evil, or to work my downfall.--- —Ah! what's more dangerous than this fond affiance?

Seems he a dove? his feathers are but borrowed.

Shakespeare's Henry VI.
3. Trust in the divine promises and protection.

To this sense it is now almost confined.

Religion receives man into a covenant of grace,
where there is pardon reached out to all truly penitent sinners, and assistance promised, and engaged, and bestowed upon very easy conditions,
viz. humility, prayer, and affiance in him.

Hammond's Fundamentals.
There can be no surer way to success, than by disclaiming all confidence in ourselves, and referring the events of things to God with an implicit affiance.

Atterbury's Sermons.
TO AFFI'ANCE. v. a. [from the noun affiance.]

1. To betroth; to bind any one by promise to marriage.

To me, sad maid, or rather widow sad,
He was affianced long time before,

And sacred pledges he both gave and had;
False, errant knight, infamous and forewore.

Fairy Queen.
Her should Angelo have married; was affianced to her by oath, and the nuptial appointed; between which time of the contract, and limit of the solemnity, his brother was wrecked, having,

in that vessel the dowry of his sister.

Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.
2. To give confidence.

Stranger! whose'er thou art, securely rest,
Affianc'd in my faith, a friendly guest. Pope's Ody.

AFFIDAVIT. n. f. [affidavit signifies, in the language of the common law, be made oath.] A declaration upon oath.

You said, if I return'd next 'size in Lent,
I should be in remitter of your grace;
In th' interim my letters should take place
Of affidavits.

Donne.
Count Rechteren should have made affidavit, that his servants had been affronted, and then
Monsieur Mefnager would have done him justice.

Spektor, N.º 481.
AFFI'ED. participial adj. [from the verb affi, derived from affido, Lat. Bracton using the phrase affidare mulieres.] Joined by contract; affianced.

Be we affi'd, and such assurance ta'en,
As shall with either part's agreement stand.

Shakespeare.

fining metals by the cupel.

Dict.
AFFI'NED. adj. [from affinis, Lat.] Joined by affinity to another; related to another.

If partially affi'd, or leagu'd in office,
Thou dost deliver more or less than truth,
Thou art no soldier.

Shakespeare's Othello.
AFFI'NITY. n. f. [affinité, Fr. from affinis,
Lat.]

1. Relation by marriage; relation contracted by the husband to the kindred of the wife, and by the wife to those of the husband. It is opposied to consanguinity, or relation by birth.

In this sense it has sometimes the particle with,
and sometimes to, before the person to whom the relation is contracted.

They had left none alive, by the blindness of rage killing many guiltless persons, either for affinity to the tyrant, or enmity to the tyrant-killers.

Sidney, b. ii.
And Solomon made affinity with Pharaoh king of Egypt, and took Pharaoh's daughter.

1 Kings, iii. 1.
A breach was made with France itself, notwithstanding so strait an affinity, so lately accomplished; as if, indeed (according to that pleasant maxim of state) kingdoms were never married.

Watson.
2. Relation to; connexion with; resemblance to: spoken of things.

The British tongue, or Welsh, was in use only in this island, having great affinity with the old Gallick.

Camden.
All things that have affinity with the heavens, move upon the center of another, which they benefit.

Bacon, Essay xxiv.
The art of painting hath wonderful affinity with that of poetry.

Dryden, Dufresnoy, Pref.
Man is more distinguished by devotion than by reason, as several brute creatures discover something like reason, though they betray not any thing that bears the least affinity to devotion.

Addison, Spectator, N.º 201.
TO AFFI'RM. v. n. [affirmo, Lat.] To declare;
to tell confidently: opposed to the word deny.

Yet their own authors faithfully affirm,
That the land Salike lies in Germany,
Between the floods of Sala and of Elbe.

Shakespeare's Henry V.
TO AFFI'RM, v. a.

1. To declare positively; as, to affirm a fact.

2. To ratify or approve a former law, or judgment: opposed to reverse or repeal.

The

AFF

The house of peers hath a power of judicature in some cases, properly to examine, and then to affirm; or, if there be cause, to reverse the judgments which have been given in the court of king's bench. Bacon's Advice to Sir G. Villiers.

In this sense we say, to affirm the truth.
AFFIRMABLE. adj. [from affirm.] That which may be affirmed.

Those attributes and conceptions that were applicable and affirmable of him when present, are now affirmable and applicable to him though past. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

AFFIRMANCE. n. f. [from affirm.] Confirmation: opposed to repeal.

This statute did but restore an ancient statute, which was itself also made but in affirmance of the common law. Bacon.

AFFIRMANT. n. f. [from affirm.] The person that affirms; a declarer. Di.

AFFIRMATION. n. f. [affirmatio, Lat.]

1. The act of affirming or declaring; opposed to negation or denial.

This gentleman vouches, upon warrant of bloody affirmation, his to be more virtuous, and less attemptable, than any of our ladies. Shakespeare, Cymbel.

2. The position affirmed.

That he shall receive no benefit from Christ, is the affirmation whereon his despair is founded; and one way of removing this dismal apprehension, is, to convince him, that Christ's death, if he perform the condition required, shall certainly belong to him. Hammond's Fundamentals.

3. Confirmation: opposed to repeal.

The learned in the laws of our land observe, that our statutes sometimes are only the affirmation, or ratification, of that which, by common law, was held before. Hooker.

AFFIRMATIVE. adj. [from affirm.]

1. That which affirms, opposed to negative; in which sense we use the affirmative absolutely, that is, the affirmative position.

For the affirmative, we are now to answer such proofs of theirs as have been before alleged. Hooker.

Whether there are such beings or not, 'tis sufficient for my purpose, that many have believed the affirmative. Dryden.

2. That which can or may be affirmed: a sense used chiefly in science.

As in algebra, where affirmative quantities vanish or cease, their negative ones begin: so in mechanics, where attraction ceases, there a repulsive virtue ought to succeed. Newt. Opt.

3. Applied to persons; he who has the habit of affirming with vehemence; positive; dogmatical.

Be not confident and affirmative in an uncertain matter, but report things modestly and temperately, according to the degree of that persuasion, which is, or ought to be, begotten by the efficacy of the authority, or the reason, inducing thee. Taylor.

AFFIRMATIVELY. adv. [from affirmative] In an affirmative manner; on the positive side; not negatively.

The reason of man hath no such restraint: concluding not only affirmatively, but negatively; not only affirming, there is no magnitude beyond the last heavens, but also denying, there is any vacuity within them. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

AFFIRMER. n. f. [from affirm.] The person that affirms.

If by the word virtue, the affirmer intends our whole duty to God and man, and the denier, by the word virtue, means only courage, or, at most, our duty toward our neighbour, without including, in the idea of it, the duty which we owe to God. Watts's Logic.

To AFFIX. v. a. [affigo, affixum, Lat.]

1. To unite to the end, or a posteriori; to subjoin.

He that has settled in his mind determined ideas, with names affixed to them, will be able to discern their differences one from another. Locke.

If men constantly affixed applause and disgrace where they ought, the principle of shame would have a very good influence on public conduct; though on secret villainies it lays no restraint. Rogers's Sermons.

AFF

2. To connect consequentially.

The doctrine of irresistibility of grace, in working whatsoever it works, if it be acknowledged, there is nothing to be affixed to gratitude. Hammond's Fundamentals.

3. Simply to fasten or fix. Obsolete.

Her modest eyes, abashed to behold
So many gazers, as on her do stare
Upon the lowly ground affixed are. Sponser.

AFFIX. n. f. [affixum, Lat.] A term of grammar. Something united to the end of a word.

In the Hebrew language the noun has its affixa, to denote the pronouns possessive or relative. Clarke's Latin Grammar.

AFFIXION. n. f. [from affix.]

1. The act of affixing.

2. The state of being affixed. Di.

AFFLATION. n. f. [affio, afflatum, Lat.] The act of breathing upon anything. Di.

AFFLATUS. n. f. [Lat.] Communication of the power of prophecy.

The poet writing against his genius will be like a prophet without his afflatus. Spenser on the Odyssey.

To AFFLICT. v. a. [affligo, afflictum, Lat.]

1. To put to pain; to grieve; to torment.

It teacheth us, how God thought fit to plague and afflict them, it doth not appoint in what form and manner we ought to punish the sin of idolatry in others. Hooker, b. v. § 17.

O coward conscience! how dost thou afflict me?
The lights burn blue---Is it not dead midnight?
Cold fearful drops stand on my trembling flesh. Shakespeare, Rich. III.

Give not over thy mind to heaviness, and afflict not thyself in thine own counsel. Eccles. xxx. 21.

A father afflicted with untimely mourning, when he hath made an image of his child soon taken away, now honoured him as a God, which was then a dead man, and delivered to those that were under him ceremonies and sacrifices. Wisdom.

A melancholy tear afflicts my eye,
And my heart labours with a sudden sigh. Prior.

2. The passive to be afflicted, has often at before the causal noun; by is likewise proper.

The mother was so afflicted at the loss of a fine boy, who was her only son, that she died for grief of it. Addison, Spectator.

AFFLICTEDNESS. n. f. [from afflicted.] The state of affliction, or of being afflicted; sorrowfulness; grief.

AFFLICTER. n. f. [from afflict.] The person that afflicts.

AFFLICTION. n. f. [afflictio, Lat.]

1. The cause of pain or sorrow; calamity.

To the flesh, as the apostle himself granteth, all affliction is naturally grievous: therefore nature, which causeth fear, teacheth to pray against all adversity. Hooker, b. v. § 43.

We'll bring you to one that you have cozened of money; I think to repay that money will be a biting affliction. Shakespeare.

2. The state of sorrowfulness; misery: opposed to prosperity.

Besides you know,
Prosperity's the very bond of love,
Whose fresh complexion, and whose heart together Affliction alters. Shakespeare, Winter's Tale.

Where shall we find the man that bears affliction,
Great and majestic in his griefs like Cato? Addison's Cato.

Some virtues are only seen in affliction, and some in prosperity. Addison, Spectator, No. 257.

AFFLICTIVE. adj. [from afflict.] That which causes affliction; painful; tormenting.

They found martyrdom a duty dressed up indeed with all that was terrible and afflictive to human nature, yet not at all the less a duty. South.

AFF

Nor can they find
Where to retire themselves, or where appease
Th' afflictive keen desire of food, expos'd
To winds, and storms, and jaws of savage death. Philipi.

Restless Proserpine---

---On the spacious land and liquid main,
Spreads, slow disease, and darts afflictive pain. Prior.

AFFLUENCE. n. f. [affluence, Fr. affluentia, Lat.]

1. The act of flowing to any place; concurrence. It is almost always used figuratively.

I shall not relate the affluence of young nobles from hence into Spain, after the voice of our prince being there had been noised. Wotton.

2. Exuberance of riches; stream of wealth; plenty.

Those degrees of fortune, which give fulness and affluence to one station, may be want and penury in another. Rogers.

Let joy or ease, let affluence or content,
And the gay conscience of a life well spent,
Calm ev'ry thought, inspire ev'ry grace. Pope.

AFFLUENCY. n. f. The same with affluence.

AFFLUENT. adj. [affluent, Fr. affluent, Lat.]

1. Flowing to any part.

These parts are no more than foundation-piles of the ensuing body; which are afterwards to be increased and raised to a greater bulk; by the affluent blood that is transmitted out of the mother's body. Harvey on Consumptions.

2. Abundant; exuberant; wealthy.

I see thee, Lord and end of my desire,
Loaded and blest with all the affluent store,
Which human vows at smoking shrines implore. Prior.

AFFLUENTNESS. n. f. [from affluent.] The quality of being affluent. Di.

AFFLUX. n. f. [affluxus, Lat.]

1. The act of flowing to some place; affluence.

2. That which flows to another place.

The cause hereof cannot be a supply by procreations; ergo, it must be by new affluxes to London out of the country. Graunt.

The infant grows bigger out of the womb, by agglutinating one afflux of blood to another. Harvey on Consumptions.

An animal that must lie still, receives the afflux of colder or warmer, clean or foul water, as it happens to come to it. Locke.

AFFLUXION. n. f. [affluxio, Lat.]

1. The act of flowing to a particular place.

2. That which flows from one place to another.

An inflammation either simple, consisting of an hot and sanguineous affluxion, or else denominated from other humours, according unto the predominancy of melancholy, phlegm or choler. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

To AFFORD. v. a. [affourer, affourager, Fr.]

1. To yield or produce; as, the soil affords grain; the trees afford fruits. This seems to be the primitive signification.

2. To grant, or confer any thing; generally in a good sense, and sometimes in a bad, but less properly.

So soon as Maurmon there arrived, the door
To him did open, and afforded way. Fairy Queen.

This is the consolation of all good men, unto whom his ubiquity affordeth continual comfort and security; and this is the affliction of hell, to whom it affordeth despair and remediless calamity. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

3. To be able to sell. It is used always with reference to some certain price; as, I can afford this for less than the other.

They fill their magazines in times of the greatest plenty, that so they may afford cheaper, and increase the public revenue at a small expence of its members. Addison on Italy.

4. To be able to bear expences; as, traders can afford more finery in peace than war.

The same errors run through all families, where there is wealth enough to afford that their sons may be good for nothing. Swift on Modern Education.

To

To AFFOREST. v. a. [afforestare, Lat.] To turn ground into forest.
It appeareth, by Charta de Foresta, that he afforested many woods and wastes, to the grievance of the subject, which by that law were disafforested. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

AFFORESTATION. n. f. [from afforest.] The charter of Foresta was to reform the encroachments made in the time of Richard I. and Henry II. who had made new afforestations, and much extended the rigour of the forest laws. Hale's Common Law of England.

To AFFRANCHISE. v. a. [affrancher, Fr.] To make free.

To AFFRAY. v. a. [affrayer, or effriger, Fr. which Menage derives from frager; perhaps it comes from frigus.] To fright; to terrify; to strike with fear. This word is not now in use.

The fame to wight he never would disclose,
But when as monsters huge he would dismay,
Or daunt unequal armies of his foes,
Or when the flying heavens he would affray.

AFFRAY, or AFFRAYMENT. n. f. [from the verb.]

1. A tumultuous assault of one or more persons upon others; a law term. A battle: in this sense is written fray.

2. Tumult; confusion: out of use.
Let the night be calm and quiet some,
Without tempestuous storms or sad affray. Spenser.

AFFRICTION. n. f. [affriccio, Lat.] The act of rubbing one thing upon another.

I have divers times observed, in wearing silver-hilted swords, that, if they rubbed upon my cloaths, if they were of a light-coloured cloth, the affriccio would quickly blacken them; and, congruously hereunto, I have found pens blacked almost all over, when I had a while carried them about me in a silver case. Boyle.

To AFFRIGHT. v. a. [See FRIGHT.]

1. To affect with fear; to terrify. It generally implies a sudden impression of fear.

Thy name affrights me, whose sound is death.

Shakespeare's Henry VI.

Godlike his courage seem'd, whom nor delight

Could soften, nor the face of death affright. Waller.

He, when his country (threatened with alarm)

Requires his courage and his conqu'ring arm,

Shall, more than once, the Punic bands affright. Dryden's Æneid.

2. It is used in the passive, sometimes with at before the thing feared.

Thou shalt not be affrighted at them: for the Lord thy God is among you. Deut. vii. 21.

3. Sometimes with the particle with before the thing feared.

As one affright

With bellish fiends, or furies mad uproar,

He then uprose. Fairy Queen, b. ii. cant. 5.

AFFRIGHT. n. f. [from the verb.]

1. Terror; fear. This word is chiefly poetical.

As the moon, clothed with cloudy night,

Does shew to him that walks in fear and sad

Wide was his parish, not contracted close

In streets, but here and there a straggling house;

Yet still he was at hand, without request,

To serve the sick; to succour the distressed:

Tempting, on foot, alone, without affright,

The dangers of a dark tempestuous night. Dryden's Fables.

2. The cause of fear; a terrible object; dreadful appearance.

I see the gods

Upraid our suff'rings, and would humble them,

By sending these affrights, while we are here,

That we might laugh at their ridiculous fear. Ben Jonson's Catil.

The war at hand appears with more affright,

And rises ev'ry moment to the sight. Dryden's Æn.

AFFRIGHTFUL. adj. [from affright.] Full of affright or terror; terrible; dreadful.

There is an absence of all that is destructive or affrightful to human nature. Decay of Piety.

AFFRIGHTMENT. n. f. [from affright.]

1. The impression of fear; terror.

She awaked with the affrightment of a dream. Wotton.

Passionate words or blows from the tutor, fill the child's mind with terror and affrightment;

which immediately takes it wholly up, and leaves no room for other impression. Locke.

2. The state of fearfulness.

Whether those that, under any anguish of mind, return to affrightments or doubtings, have not been hypocrites. Hammond.

To AFFRONT. v. a. [affronter, Fr. that is, ad

frontem stare, ad frontem contumeliam allidere, to insult a man to his face.]

1. To meet face to face; to encounter. This seems the genuine and original sense of the word, which was formerly indifferent to good or ill.

We have closely sent for Hamlet hither,

That he, as 'twere by accident, may here

affront Ophelia. Shakespeare's Hamlet.

The seditious, the next day, affronted the king's forces at the entrance of a highway; whom when they found both ready and resolute to fight, they desired enterparlance. Sir John Hayward.

2. To meet, in an hostile manner, front to front.

His holy rites and solemn feasts profan'd,

And with their darknefs durst affront his light. Paradise Lost.

3. To offer an open insult; to offend avowedly.

With respect to this sense, it is observed by Cervantes, that, if a man strikes another on the back, and then runs away, the person so struck is injured, but not affronted; an affront always implying a justification of the act.

Did not this fatal war affront thy coast,

Yet fatest thou an idle looker on. Fairfax, i. 51.

But harm precedes not sin, only our foe,

Tempting, affronts us with his foul esteem

Of our integrity. Milton's Paradise Lost, b. ix.

I would learn the cause, why Torrifmond,

Within my palace walls, within my hearing,

Almost within my sight, affronts a prince,

Who shortly shall command him. Dryden's Spanish Friar.

This brings to mind Faustina's fondness for the gladiator, and is interpreted as satire. But how can one imagine, that the Fathers would have dared to affront the wife of Aurelius. Addison.

AFFRONT. n. f. [from the verb affront.]

1. Insult offered to the face; contemptuous or rude treatment; contumely.

He would often maintain Plantianus, in doing affronts to his son. Bacon's Essays.

You've done enough; for you design'd my chains:

The grace is vanish'd, but th' affront remains. Dryden's Aurengzebe.

He that is found reasonable in one thing, is concluded to be so in all; and to think or say otherwise, is thought so unjust an affront, and so senseless a censure, that nobody ventures to do it. Locke.

There is nothing which we receive with so much reluctance as advice: we look upon the man who gives it us, as offering an affront to our understanding, and treating us like children or idiots. Addison, Spectator, N^o. 512.

2. Outrage; act of contempt, in a more general sense.

Of have they violated

The temple, oft the law with foul affronts,

Abominations rather. Milton's Para. Regained.

3. Open opposition; encounter: a sense not frequent, though regularly deducible from the derivation.

Fearless of danger, like a petty god

I walk'd about admir'd of all, and dreaded

On hostile ground, none daring my affront. Samson Agonist.

4. Disgrace; shame. This sense is rather peculiar to the Scottish dialect.

Antonius attack'd the pirates of Crete, and, by his too great presumption, was defeated; upon the sense of which affront he died with grief. Arbutnot on Coins.

AFFRONT. n. f. [from affront.] The person that affronts.

AFFRONTING. participial adj. [from affront.] That which has the quality of affronting; contumelious.

Among words which signify the same principal ideas, some are clean and decent, others unclean;

some are kind, others are affronting and re-proachful, because of the secondary idea which custom has affixed to them. Watts's Logic.

To AFFUSE. v. a. [affundo, affusum, Lat.] To pour one thing upon another.

I poured acid liquors, to try if they contained any volatile salt or spirit, which would probably have discovered itself, by making an ebullition with the affused liquor. Boyle.

AFFUSION. n. f. [affusio, Lat.] The act of pouring one thing upon another.

Upon the affusion of a tincture of galls, it immediately became as black as ink. Grew's Mus.

To AFFY. v. a. [affir, Fr. affidare, mulierem,

Bracton.] To betroth in order to marriage.

Wedded be thou to the hags of hell,

For daring to affy a mighty lord

Unto the daughter of a worthless king. Shakespeare's Henry VI.

To AFFY. v. n. To put confidence in; to put trust in; to confide. Not in use.

Marcus Andronicus, so I do affy

In thy uprightness and integrity,

That I will here dismiss my loving friends. Shakespeare's Tit. Andr.

AFFIELD. adv. [from a and field. See FIELD.]

To the field.

We drove afield, and both together heard.

What time the grey fly winds her sultry horn,

Batt'ring our flocks with the fresh dews of night. Milton.

Afield I went, amid the morning dew,

To milk my kine, for so should housewives do. Gay.

AFFLAT. adv. [from a and flat. See FLAT.]

Level with the ground.

When you would have many new roots of fruit-trees, take a low tree, and bow it, and lay all his branches aflat upon the ground, and cast earth upon them; and every twig will take root. Bacon's Natural History.

AFFLOAT. adv. [from a and float. See FLOAT.]

Floating; born up in the water; not sinking;

in a figurative sense, within view; in motion.

There is a tide in the affairs of men,

Which taken at the flood, leads on to fortune;

Omitted, all the voyage of their life

Is bound in shallows and in miseries.

On such a full sea are we now afloat;

And we must take the current when it serves,

Or lose our ventures. Shakespeare's Julius Caesar.

Take any passion of the soul of man, while it is predominant and afloat, and, just in the critical height of it, nick it with some lucky or unlucky word, and you may as certainly over-rule it to your own purpose, as a spark of fire falling upon gun-powder, will infallibly blow it up. South.

There are generally several hundred loads of timber afloat, for they cut above twenty-five leagues up the river; and other rivers bring in their contributions. Addison's Italy.

AFOOT. adv. [from a and foot.]

1. On foot; not on horseback.

He thought it best to return, for that day, to a village not far off; and dispatching his horse in some fort, the next day early, to come afoot thither. Shakespeare.

2. In action; as, a design is afoot.

I pry'thee, when thou seest that act afoot,

Ev'n with the very comment of thy soul

Observe mine uncle. Shakespeare.

3. In motion.

Of Albany's and Cornwall's pow'rs you heard not—

'Tis said they are afoot. Shakesp. King Lear.

AFORE. prep. [from a and fore. See BEFORE.]

1. Not behind; as he held the shield afore: not in use.

2. Before; nearer in place to any thing; as, he stood afore him.

3. Sooner in time.

If your diligence be not speedy, I shall be ere afore you. Shakespeare's King Lear.

AFORE. adv.

1. In time foregone or past.

Whoever should make light of any thing afore spoken or written, out of his own house a tree should be taken, and he thereon be hanged.

Ezra's, vi. 22.

If he never drank wine afore, it will go near to remove his fit. Shakespeare's Tempest.

2. First in the way.

Æmilia, run you to the citadel,

And tell my lord and lady what hath hap'd; Will you go on afore? Shakespeare's Othello.

3. In front; in the fore part.

Approaching nigh, he reared high afore His body monstrous, horrible and vast.

Fairy Queen.

AFOREGOING. participial adj. [from afore and going.] Going before.

AFOREHAND. adv. [from afore and hand.]

1. By a previous provision.

Many of the particular subjects of discourse are occasional, and such as cannot aforehand be reduced to any certain account. Government of the Tongue.

2. Provided; prepared; previously fitted.

For it will be said, that in the former times, whereof we have spoken, Spain was not so mighty as now it is; and England, on the other side, was more aforehand in all matters of power.

Bacon's Considerations on War with Spain.

AFOREMENTIONED. adj. [from afore and mentioned.] Mentioned before.

Among the nine other parts, five are not in a condition to give alms or relief to those aforementioned; being very near reduced themselves to the same miserable condition. Addison.

AFORENAMED. adj. [from afore and named.] Named before.

Imitate something of circular form, in which, as in all other aforenamed proportions, you shall help yourself by the diameter. Peachment on Draw.

AFORESAID. adj. [from afore and said.] Said before.

It need not go for repetition, if we resume again that which we said in the aforesaid experiment.

Bacon's Natural History, N^o. 771.

AFORETIME. adv. [from afore and time.] In time past.

O thou that art waxen old in wickedness, now thy sins which thou hast committed aforetime, are come to light. Susannah.

AFFRAY. participial adj. [from the verb affray.] It should therefore properly be written with ff.

1. Struck with fear; terrified; fearful.

So persecute them with thy tempest, and make them afraid with thy storm. Psalms lxxxiii. 15.

2. It has the particle of before the object of fear.

There, loathing life, and yet of death afraid, In anguish of her spirit thus she pray'd. Dry. Fab.

If, while this wearied flesh draws fleeting breath, Not satisfy'd with life, afraid of death,

It haply be thy will, that I should know Glimpse of delight, or pause from anxious woe;

From now, from instant now, great Sire, dispel The clouds that prefs my soul. Prior.

AFFRESH. adv. [from a and fresh. See FRESH.] Anew; again, after intermission.

The Germans serving upon great horses, and charged with heavy armour, received great hurt by light skirmishes; the Turks, with their light horses, easily shunning their charge, and again, at their pleasure, charging them afresh, when they saw the heavy horses almost weary.

Knolles's History of the Turks.

When once we have attained these ideas, they may be excited afresh by the use of words.

Watts's Logic.

AFFRONT. adv. [from a and front.] In front; in direct opposition to the face.

These four came all afront, and mainly thrust at me. Shakespeare's Henry IV. p. i.

AFTER. prep. [æftɜː, Sax.]

1. Following in place. After is commonly applied to words of motion; as, he came after, and stood behind him. It is opposed to before.

What says Lord Warwick, shall we after them?—

—After them! nay, before them, if we can.

Shakespeare's Henry VI.

2. In pursuit of.

After whom is the king of Israel come out? After whom dost thou pursue? After a dead dog, after a flea. I Sam. xxiv. 14.

3. Behind. This is not a common use.

Sometimes I placed a third prism after a second, and sometimes also a fourth after a third, by all which the image might be often refracted sideways.

Newton's Opticks.

4. Posterior in time.

Good after ill, and after pain delight; Alternate, like the scenes of day and night.

Dryden's Fables.

We shall examine the ways of conveyance of the sovereignty of Adam to princes that were to reign after him.

Locke.

5. According to.

He that thinketh Spain our over-match, is no good mintman, but takes greatness of kingdoms according to bulk and currency, and not after their intrinsic value.

Bacon.

6. In imitation of.

There are, among the old Roman statues, several of Venus, in different postures and habits; as there are many particular figures of her made after the same design.

Addison's Italy.

This allusion is after the oriental manner: thus in the Philms, how frequently are persons compared to cedars.

Pope's Odyssey, notes.

AFTER. adv.

1. In succeeding time. It is used of time mentioned as succeeding some other. So we cannot say, I shall be happy after, but hereafter; but we say, I was first made miserable by the loss, but was after happier.

Far be it from me, to justify the cruelties which were at first used towards them, which had their reward soon after.

Bacon.

Those who, from the pit of hell

Roaming to seek their prey on earth, durst fix Their seats long after next the seat of God.

Paradise Lost.

2. Following another.

Let go thy hold, when a great wheel runs down a hill, lest it break thy neck with following it; but the great one that goes upward, let him draw thee after.

Shakespeare's King Lear.

AFTER is compounded with many words, but almost always in its genuine and primitive signification; some, which occurred, will follow, by which others may be explained.

AFTER ACCEPTATION. [from after and acceptation.] A sense afterwards, not at first admitted.

'Tis true, some doctors in a scantier space, I mean, in each apart, contract the place:

Some, who to greater length extend the line, The church's after acceptation join. Dry. Hind and Pan.

AFTERAGES. n. f. [from after and ages.] Successive times; posterity. Of this word I have found no singular; but see not why it might not be said, This will be done in some afterage.

Not the whole land, which the Chusites should, or might in future time, conquer; seeing, in afterages, they became lords of many nations.

Raleigh's History of the World.

Nor to philosophers is praise deny'd, Whose wise instructions afterages guide.

Sir John Denham.

What an opinion will after ages entertain of their religion, who bid fair for a gibbet, to bring in a superstition, which their forefathers perished in flames to keep out.

Addison.

AFTER ALL. When all has been taken into the view; when there remains nothing more to be added; at last; in fine; in conclusion; upon the whole; at the most.

They have given no good proof in asserting this extravagant principle; for which, after all, they have no ground or colour; but a passage or two of scripture, miserably perverted, in opposition to many express texts.

Atterbury's Sermons.

But, after all, if they have any merit it is to be attributed to some good old authors, whose works

Pope on Pastoral Poetry.

AFTERBIRTH. n. f. [from after and birth.] The membrane in which the birth was involved which is brought away after; the secundine.

The exorbitances or degenerations, whether from a hurt in labour, or from part of the after-birth left behind, produce such virulent distempers of the blood as make it cast out a tumour.

Wise man's Surgery.

AFTERCLAP. n. f. [from after and clap.] Unexpected events happening after an affair is supposed to be at an end.

For the next morrow's meed they closely went, For fear of afterclaps to prevent. Spens. Hub. Tale.

It is commonly taken in an ill sense.

AFTERCOST. n. f. [from after and cost.] The latter charges; the expence incurred after the original plan is executed.

You must take care to carry off the land-floods and streams, before you attempt draining; lest your aftercost and labour prove unsuccessful.

Mortimer's Husbandry.

AFTERCROP. n. f. [from after and crop.] The second crop or harvest of the same year.

Aftercrops I think neither good for the land, nor yet the hay good for the cattle. Mortimer's Husbandry.

AFTER-DINNER. n. f. [from after and dinner.] The hour passing just after dinner, which is generally allowed to indulgence and amusement.

Thou hast nor youth nor age, But, as it were, an after-dinner's sleep, Dreaming on both. Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.

AFTER-ENDEAVOUR. n. f. [from after and endeavour.] Endeavours made after the first effort or endeavour.

There is no reason why the found of a pipe should leave traces in their brains, which, not first, but by their after-endeavours, should produce the like founds.

Locke.

AFTER-ENQUIRY. n. f. [from after and enquiry.] Enquiry made after the fact committed, or after life.

You must either be directed by some that take upon them to know, or to take upon yourself that, which I am sure, you do not know, or lump the after-enquiry on your peril. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

AFTEREYE. v. a. [from after and eye.] To keep one in view; to follow in view. This is not in use.

Thou shouldst have made him As little as a crow, or less, ere left To aftereye him. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

AFTERGAME. n. f. [from after and game.] The scheme which may be laid, or the expedients which are practised after the original design has miscarried; methods taken after the first turn of affairs.

This earl, like certain vegetables, did bud and open slowly; nature sometimes delighting to play an aftergame, as well as fortune, which had both their turns and tides in course. Wotton.

The fables of the ax-handle and the wedge, serve to precaution us not to put ourselves needlessly upon an aftergame, but to weigh beforehand what we say and do. L'Estrange's Fab.

Our first design, my friend, has proved abortive; Still there remains an aftergame to play. Addison's Cato.

AFTERHOURS. n. f. [from after and hours.] The hours that succeed.

So smile the heav'ns upon this holy act, That afterhours with sorrow chide us not. Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet.

AFTER-LIVER. n. f. [from after and live.] He that lives in succeeding times.

By thee my promise sent Unto myself, let after-livers know. Sidney's b. ii.

AFTERLOVE. n. f. [from after and love.] The second or later love.

Intended, or committed, was this fault? If but the first, how heinous ere it be, To win thy after-love, I pardon thee. Shakespeare's Richard II.

AFTERMATH. n. f. [from after and math, from now.] The latter math; the second crop of grass mown in autumn. See AFTERCROP.

AFTER-

AFTERNOON. n. f. [from after and noon.] The time from the meridian to the evening.

A beauty-waning and distressed widow,
Ev'n in the afternoon of her best days,
Made prize and purchase of his wanton eye.

Shakspeare, Rich. III.

However, keep the lively taste you hold
Of God; and love him now, but fear him more;
And, in your afternoons, think what you told
And promis'd him at morning-prayer before.

Donne.

Such, all the morning, to the pleadings run;
But when the business of the day is done,
On dice, and drink, and drabs, they spend the afternoon.

Dryden's Persius, Sat. i.

AFTERPAINS. n. f. [from after and pain.]

The pains after birth, by which women are delivered of the secundine.

AFTERPART. n. f. [from after and part.] The latter part.

The flexibility of the former part of a man's age, not yet grown up to be headstrong, makes it more governable and safe; and, in the afterpart, reason and foresight begin a little to take place, and mind a man of his safety and improvement.

Locke.

AFTERPROOF. n. f. [from after and proof.]

1. Evidence posterior to the thing in question.
2. Qualities known by subsequent experience.

All know, that he likewise at first was much under the expectation of his afterproof; such a solar influence there is in the solar aspect.

Wotton.

AFTERTASTE. n. f. [from after and taste.] A taste remaining upon the tongue after the draught, which was not perceived in the act of drinking.

AFTERTHOUGHT. n. f. [from after and thought.] Reflections after the act; expedients formed too late. It is not properly to be used for second-thought.

Expence, and afterthought, and idle care,
And doubts of motley hue, and dark despair;
Suspicious, and fantastical surmise,
And jealousy suffus'd with jaundice in her eyes,
Discolouring all she view'd, in tawny dress'd,
Downlook'd, and with a cuckoo on her fit.

Dryden's Fables.

AFTER-TIMES. n. f. [from after and time.] Succeeding times. See AFTERAGES.

You promis'd once a progeny divine
Of Romans, rising from the Trojan line,
In aftertimes should hold the world in awe,
And to the land and ocean give the law.

Dryden's Virgil.

AFTERTOSSING. n. f. [from after and toss.] The motion of the sea after a storm.

Confusions and tumults are only the impotent remains of an unnatural rebellion, and are no more than the aftertossings of a sea, when the storm is laid.

Addison's Freeholder.

AFTERWARD. adv. [from after and peard, Sax.] In succeeding time; sometimes written afterwards, but less properly.

Uses not thought upon before, may afterward spring up, and be reasonable causes of retaining that, which former considerations did formerly procure to be instituted.

Hooker.

An anxious distrust of the divine goodness, makes a man more and more unworthy of it; and miserable beforehand, for fear of being so afterward.

L'Estrange.

AFTERWIT. n. f. [from after and wit.] The contrivance of expedients after the occasion of using them is past. See AFTERTHOUGHT.

There is no recalling what's gone and past; so that afterwit comes too late when the mischief is done.

L'Estrange.

AFTER-WRATH. n. f. [from after and wrath.] Anger when the provocation seems past.

I hear him mock

The luck of Cæsar, which the gods give men
To excuse their after-wrath.

Shakspeare, Antony and Cleopatra.

AGA. n. f. The title of a Turkish military officer.

AGAIN. adv. [agen, Sax.]

1. A second time; once more; marking the repetition of the same thing.

The poor remnant of human seed, which remained in their mountains, peopled their country again slowly, by little and little.

Bacon's New Atlantis.

Should Nature's self invade the world again,
And o'er the centre spread the liquid main,
Thy pow'r were safe.

Waller.

Go now, deluded man, and seek again

New toils, new dangers, on the dusty plain.

Dryden's Aeneid.

Some are already retired into foreign countries; and the rest, who possess lands, are determined never to hazard them again, for the sake of establishing their superintition.

Swift.

2. On the other hand; marking some opposition or contrariety.

His wit encreased upon the occasion; and so much the more, if the occasion were sharpened with danger. Again, whether it were the shortness of his foresight, or the strength of his will, certain it is, that the perpetual trouble of his fortunes could not have been without defects in his nature.

Bacon.

Those things that we know not what to do withal, if we had them, and those things, again, which another cannot part with, but to his own loss and shame.

L'Estrange's Fables.

3. On another part; marking a transition to some new consideration.

Behold yon mountain's hoary height,
Made higher with new mounts of snow;
Again, behold the winter's weight
Oppress the lab'ring woods below.

Dryden.

4. In return, noting re-action, or reciprocal action; as, his fortune worked upon his nature, and his nature again upon his fortune.

5. Back; in restitution.

When your head did but ache,
I knit my handkerchief about your brows;
The best I had, a prince's wrought it me,
And I did never ask it you again.

Shakspeare's King John.

6. In return for any thing; in recompence.
That he hath given will he pay again.

Prov. xix. 27.

7. In order of rank or succession; marking distribution.

Question was asked of Demosthenes, What was the chief part of an orator? He answered, Action. What next? Action. What next, again? Action.

Bacon's Essays.

The cause of the holding green, is the close and compact substance of their leaves, and the pedicles of them: and the cause of that again is either the tough and viscous juice of the plant, or the strength and heat thereof.

Bacon's Natu. Hist.

8. Besides; in any other time or place.

They have the Walloons, who are tall soldiers; yet that is but a spot of ground. But, on the other side, there is not in the world again such a spring and seminary of brave military people, as in England, Scotland, and Ireland.

Bacon.

9. Twice as much; marking the same quantity once repeated.

There are whom heav'n has blest with store of wit,

Yet want as much again to manage it;
For wit and judgment ever are at strife,

Tho' meant each other's aid, like man and wife.

Pope.

I should not be sorry to see a chorus on a theatre, more than as large and as deep again as ours, built and adorned at a king's charges.

Dryden's Dufresnoy.

10. Again and again; with frequent repetition; often.

This is not to be obtained by one or two hasty readings; it must be repeated again and again, with a close attention to the tenour of the discourse.

Locke.

11. In opposition; by way of resistance.

Who art thou that answerest again? Rom. ix. 20.

12. Back; as, returning from some message.

Bring us word again which way we shall go.

Deut. i. 22.

AGAINST. prep. [angeon, ongeonb, Sax.]

1. In opposition to any person.

And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him.

Gen. xvi. 12.

2. Contrary; opposite, in general.

That authority of men should prevail with men either against or above reason, is no part of our belief.

Hooker.

He is melancholy without cause, and merry against the hair.

Shakspeare, Troilus and Cressida.

We might work any effect without and against matter; and this not holpen by the co-operation of angels or spirits, but only by the unity and harmony of nature.

Bacon's Natural Hist.

The preventing goodness of God does even wrest him from himself, and save him, as it were, against his will.

Souls.

The god, uneasy till he slept again,
Resolv'd, at once, to rid himself of pain;
And, tho' against his custom, call'd aloud.

Dryden.

Men often say a thing is against their conscience, when really it is not.

Swift's Miscellanies.

3. In contradiction to any opinion.

After all that can be said against a thing, this will still be true, that many things possibly are, which we know not of; and that many more things may be than are: and if so, after all our arguments against a thing, it will be uncertain whether it be or not.

Tillotson.

The church-clergy have written the best collection of tracts against popery that ever appeared in England.

Swift.

4. With contrary motion or tendency: used of material action.

Boils and plagues

Plaister you o'er, that one infect another
Against the wind a mile.

Shakspeare, Coriolanus.

The kite being a bird of prey, and therefore hot, delighteth in the fresh air; and many times flieth against the wind, as trouts and salmon swim against the stream.

Bacon.

5. Contrary to rule or law.

If aught against my life]

Thy country fought of thee, it fought unjustly,
Against the law of nature, law of nations. Milton.

Against the public sanctions of the peace,
Against all omens of their ill success;
With fates averse, the rout in arms resort,
To force their monarch, and insult the court.

Dryden.

6. Opposite to, in place.

Against the Tiber's mouth, but far away. Dryden.

7. To the hurt of another. See sense 5.

And when thou think'st of her eternity,
Think not that death against her nature is;

Think it a birth: and when thou go'st to die,
Sing like a swan, as if thou went'st to bliss.

Sir J. Davis.

8. In provision for; in expectation of.

This mode of speaking probably had its original from the idea of making provision against, or in opposition to, a time of misfortune, but by degrees acquired a neutral sense. It sometimes has the case elliptically suppressed, as, against he comes, that is, against the time when he comes.

Thence the them brought into a stately hall,
Wherein were many tables fair dispred,

And ready dight with drapets festival,
Against the viands should be ministrd.

Fairy Queen.

The like charge was given them against the time they should come to settle themselves in the land promised unto their fathers.

Hooker.

Some say that ever against that season comes,
Wherein our Saviour's birth is celebrated,

The bird of dawning singeth all night long:
And then they say no spirit walks abroad;

The nights are wholesome, then no planets strike,
No fairy tales, no witch hath power to charm;

So hallow'd and so gracious is the time.

Shakspeare, Hamlet.

To that purpose he made haste to Bristol, that all things might be ready against the prince came thither.

Clarendon.

Against the promis'd time provides with care,

And

And hastens in the woof, the robes he was to wear. Dryden.

All which I grant to be reasonably and truly said, and only desire they may be remembered against another day. Stillington.

AGALAXY, n. f. [from a and galeos, Gr.] Want of milk. Diet.

AGAPHE, adv. [from a and gape.] Staring with eagerness; as a bird gapes for meat.

In himself was all his state;
More solemn than the tedious pomp that waits
On princes, when their rich retinue long
Of horses led, and grooms besmeared with gold.
Dazzles the crowd, and sets them all agape. Philips.

Dazzle the crowd, and set them all agape. Philips.
The whole crowd stood agape, and ready to take the doctor at his word. Spectator, No 572.

AGARICK, n. f. [agaricum, Lat.] A drug of use in physick, and the dying trade. It is divided into male and female; the male is used only in dying, the female in medicine: the male grows on oaks, the female on larches.

There are two excrescences which grow upon trees; both of them in the nature of mushrooms; the one the Romans call toletus, which groweth upon the roots of oaks, and was one of the dainties of their table; the other is medicinal, that is called agarick, which groweth upon the tops of oaks; though it be affirmed by some, that it groweth also at the roots. Bacon.

AGAST, adv. [This word, which is usually, by later authors, written agast, is, not improbably, the true word derived from agaze, which has been written agast, from a mistaken etymology. See AGHAST.] Struck with terror; amazed; frightened to astonishment.

Thus roving on
In confus'd march forlorn, th' advent'rous bands,
With shudd'ring horror pale, and eyes agast,
View'd first their lamentable lot, and found
No rest. Milton's Par. Lost.

AGATE, n. f. [agate, Fr. achates, Lat.] a precious stone of the lowest class, often clouded with beautiful variegations.

In shape no bigger than an agate stone,
On the forefinger of an alderman. Shak. Romeo and Juliet.

Agates are only varieties of the flint kind: they have a grey honey ground, clouded, lineated, or spotted with different colours, chiefly dusky, black, brown, red, and sometimes blue. Woodward.

AGATY, adv. [from agate.] Partaking of the nature of agate.

An agaty flint was above two inches in diameter; the whole covered over with a friable cretaceous crust. Woodward.

To AGAZE, v. a. [from a and gaze, to set a gazing; as, amaz, avast, and others.] To strike with amazement; to stupify with sudden terror. The verb is now out of use.

So as they travell'd, so they gan espy
An armed knight toward them gallop fast,
That seem'd from some feared foe to fly,
Or other grisly thing that him agast. Fairy Queen.

AGAZED, participial adj. [from agaze; which see.] Struck with amazement; terrified to stupidity.

Hundreds he sent to hell, and none durst stand him;

Here, there, and every where, enrag'd he flew:
The French exclaim'd; "The devil was in arms!"
All the whole army stood agazed on him. Shak. Henry VI.

AGE, n. f. [age, Fr. antiently eage, or aage; it is deduced by Ménage, from actation, of actas; by Junius, from aa, which, in the Teutonic dialects, signified long duration.]

1. Any period of time attributed to something as the whole, or part, of its duration: in this sense, we say, the age of man, the several ages of the world, the golden or iron age.

One man in his time plays many parts,
His life being seven ages. Shak. Henry VI.

And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years: so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years. Gen. xlviii. 28.

2. A succession or generation of men.

Hence, lastly, springs care of posterities,
For things their kind would everlasting make.
Hence is it that old men do plant young trees,
The fruit whereof another age shall take. Sir J. Davis.

Next, to the Son,
Destin'd Restorer of mankind, by whom
New heav'n, and earth, shall to the age rise,
Or down from heav'n descend. Milton's Paradise Lost.

No declining age
E'er felt the raptures of poetic rage. Polsonman.

3. The time in which any particular man, or race of men, lived, or shall live; as, the age of heroes.

No longer now the golden age appears
When patriarchs wits surviv'd a thousand years. Pope.

4. The space of a hundred years; a secular period; a century.

5. The latter part of life; old-age; oldness.
You see how full of change his age is: the observation we have made of it hath not been little: he always loved our sister most, and with what poor judgment he hath now cast her off. Shak. Lear.

Boys must not have the ambitious care of men,
Nor men the weak anxieties of age. Recommon.
And on this forehead, where your verse has said,
The loves delighted, and the graces play'd;
Insulting age will trace his cruel way,
And leave sad marks of his destructive sway. Prior.

6. Maturity; ripeness; years of discretion; full strength of life.

A solemn admission of profelytes, all that either, being of age, desire that admission for themselves, or that, in infancy, are by others presented to that charity of the church. Hammond.

We thought our fires, not with their own content,
Had, ere we came to age, our portion spent. Dryden.

7. In law.

In a man, the age of fourteen years is the age of discretion; and twenty-one years is the full age: In a woman, at seven years of age, the lord her father may distrain his tenants for aid to marry her; at the age of nine years she is dowable; at twelve years, she is able finally to ratify and confirm her former consent given to matrimony; at fourteen, she is enabled to receive her land into her own hands, and shall be out of ward at the death of her ancestor: at sixteen, she shall be out of her ward, though, at the death of her ancestor, she was within the age of fourteen years; at twenty-one, she is able to alienate her lands and tenements. At the age of fourteen, a stripling is enabled to choose his own guardian; at the age of fourteen a man may consent to marriage. Cowell.

AGED, adj. [from age.] It makes two syllables in poetry.]

1. Old; stricken in years; applied generally to animate beings.

If the comparison do stand between man and man, the aged, for the most part, are best experienced, least subject to rash and unadvised passions. Hooker.

Novelty is only in request; and it is as dangerous to be aged in any kind of course, as it is virtuous to be constant in any undertaking.

Shak. Measure for Measure.
Kindness itself too weak a charm will prove,
To raise the feeble fires of aged love. Prior.

2. Old; applied to inanimate things. This use is rare, and commonly with some tendency to the prophetic.]

The people did not more worship the images of gold and ivory, than they did the groves; and the same Quintilian faith of the aged oaks.

Stillington's Defence of Dis. on Rom. Idolatry.
AGEDLY, adv. [from aged.] After the manner of an aged person.

AGE'S, adv. [agen, Sax.] Again; in return. See AGAIN.

This word is only written in this manner, though it be in reality the true orthography, for the sake of rhyme.

Thus Venus: Thus her son reply'd agen;
None of your sisters have we heard or seen. Dryd.
AGENCY, n. f. [from agent.]

1. The quality of acting; the state of being in action; action.

A few advances there are in the following papers, tending to assert the superintendence and agency of Providence in the natural world. Woodward's Preface to Natural History.

2. The office of an agent or factor for another; business performed by an agent.

Some of the purchasers themselves may be content to live cheap in a worse country, rather than be at the charge of exchange and agencies. Swift.

AGENT, adj. [agens, Lat.] That which acts; opposed to patient, or that which is acted upon.

This success is oft truly ascribed unto the force of imagination upon the body agent; and then, by a secondary means, it may upon a diverse body: as, for example, if a man carry a ring, or some part of a beast, believing strongly that it will help him to obtain his love, it may make him more industrious, and again more confident and persisting than otherwise he would be. Bacon's Natural History.

AGENT, n. f.

1. An actor; he that acts; he that possesses the faculty of action.

Where there is no doubt, deliberation is not excluded as impertinent unto the thing, but as need less in regard of the agent, which seeth already what to resolve upon. Hooker.

To whom nor agent, from the instrument,
Nor pow'r of working, from the work is known. Darwin.

Heav'n made us agents, free to good or ill,
And forc'd it not, tho' he foresaw the will.
Freedom was first bestow'd on human race,
And prescience only held the second place. Dryd.

A miracle is a work exceeding the power of any created agent, consequently being an effect of the divine omnipotence. South's Sermons.

2. A substitute; a deputy; a factor; a person employed to transact the business of another.

—All hearts in love, use your own tongues;
Let every eye negotiate for itself,
And trust no agent. Shak. Henry VI.

They had not the wit to send to them, in any orderly fashion, agents or chosen men, to tempt them, and to treat with them. Bacon's Henry VII.

Remember, Sir, your fury of a wife,
Who, not content to be reveng'd on you,
The agents of your passion will pursue. Dryden's Aureng.

That which has the power of operating, or producing effects upon another thing.

They produced wonderful effects, by the proper application of agents to patients. Temple.

AGGELATION, n. f. [Lat. gela.] Concretion of ice.

It is round in hail and figured in its guttulous descent from the air, growing greater or lesser according to the accretion or pluvius aggregation about the fundamental atoms thereof.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

AGGENERATION, n. f. [from ad and generatio, Lat.] The state of growing or uniting to another body.

To make a perfect nutrition, there is required a transmutation of nutriment; now where this conversion or aggeneration is made, there is also required, in the aliment, a similarity of matter. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

To AGGERATE, v. a. [from agger, Lat.] To heap up.

AGGEROSE, adj. [from agger, Lat.] Full of heaps.

To AGGLOMERATE, v. a. [agglomerare, Lat.]

1. To gather up in a ball, as thread.

2. To gather together.

To AGGLOMERATE, v. n.

Besides, the hard agglomerating salts,
The spoil of ages would impervious choke
Their secret channels. Thomson's Autumn.

VOL. I. N^o. 2. G AG-

AGGLUTINANTS. n. f. [from agglutinate.] Those medicines or applications which have the power of uniting parts together.

AGGLUTINATE. v. n. [from ad and gluten, glue, Lat.] To unite one part to another; to join together, so as not to fall asunder. It is a word almost appropriated to medicine.

The body has got room enough to grow into its full dimensions, which is performed by the daily ingestion of food that is digested into blood; which being diffused through the body, is agglutinated to those parts that were immediately agglutinated to the foundation parts of the womb.

AGGLUTINATION. n. f. [from agglutinate.] Union; cohesion; the act of agglutinating; the state of being agglutinated.

The occasion of its not healing by agglutination, as the other did, was from the alteration the ichor had begun to make in the bottom of the wound.

AGGLUTINATIVE. adj. [from agglutinate.] That which has the power of procuring agglutination.

Rowl up the member with the agglutinative rowler.

AGGRANDIZE. v. a. [from aggrandire, Fr.] To make great; to enlarge; to exalt; to improve in power, honour, or rank. It is applied to persons generally, sometimes to things.

If the king should use it no better than the pope did, only to aggrandize covetous churchmen, it cannot be called a jewel in his crown.

These furnish us with glorious springs and mediums, to raise and aggrandize our conceptions, to warm our souls, to awaken the better passions, and to elevate them even to a divine pitch, and that for devotional purposes.

AGGRANDIZEMENT. n. f. [from aggrandire, Fr.] The state of being aggrandized; the act of aggrandizing.

AGGRANDIZER. n. f. [from aggrandize.] The person that aggrandizes or makes great another.

AGGRATE. v. a. [from aggrare, Ital.] To please; to treat with civilities: a word not now in use.

And in the midst thereof, upon the floor,
A lovely bevy of fair ladies fate,
Court of many a jolly paramour;
The which them did in modest wife amate,
And each one fought his lady to aggrate.

AGGRAVATE. v. a. [from aggravare, Lat.] 1. To make heavy; used only in a metaphorical sense; as, to aggravate an accusation, or a punishment.

A grove hard by, sprung up with this their change,
His will who reigns above! to aggravate
Their penance, laden with fruit, like that
Which grew in paradise, the bait of Eve
Used by the tempter.

Ambitious Turnus in the press appears,
And aggravating crimes augments their fears.

2. To make any thing worse, by the addition of some particular circumstance, not essential.

This offence, in itself so heinous, was yet in him aggravated by the motive thereof, which was not malice or discontent, but an aspiring mind to the papacy.

AGGRAVATION. n. f. [from aggravare.] 1. The act of aggravating, or making heavy.

2. The act of enlarging to enormity.

A painter added a pair of whiskers to the face, and by a little aggravation of the features changed it into the Saracen's head.

3. The extrinsecal circumstances or accidents, which encrease the guilt of a crime, or the misery of a calamity.

He, to the sins which he commits, hath the aggravation superadded of committing them against knowledge, against conscience, against sight of the contrary law.

If it be weigh'd
By itself, with aggravations not furcharg'd,
Or else with just allowance counterpois'd,

I may, if possible, thy pardon find
The easier towards me, or thy hatred less.

AGGREGATE. adj. [from aggregatus, Lat.] Framed by the collection of any particular parts into one mass, body, or system.

The solid reason of one man with unprejudicate apprehensions, begets as firm a belief as the authority or aggregate testimony of many hundreds.

They had, for a long time together, produced many other inept combinations, or aggregate forms of particular things, and nonsensical systems of the whole.

AGGREGATE. n. f. [from the verb.] The complex, or collective result of the conjunction or acervation of many particulars.

The reason of the far greatest part of mankind, is but an aggregate of mistaken phantasms, and, in things not sensible, a constant delusion.

A great number of living and thinking particles could not possibly, by their mutual contact, and pressing, and striking, compose one greater individual animal, with one mind and understanding, and a vital consension of the whole body; any more than a swarm of bees, or a crowd of men and women, can be conceived to make up one particular living creature, compounded and constituted of the aggregate of them all.

AGGREGATE. v. a. [from aggrego, Lat.] To collect together; to accumulate; to heap many particulars into one mass.

The aggregated soil
Death, with his mace petrified, cold and dry,
As with a trident, smote.

AGGREGATION. n. f. [from aggregatus.] 1. Collection, or state of being collected.

Their individual imperfections being great, they are moreover enlarged by their aggregation; and being erroneous in their single numbers, once huddled together, they will be error itself.

2. The collection, or act of collecting many particulars into one whole.

The water resident in the abyss is, in all parts of it, stored with a considerable quantity of heat, and more especially in those where these extraordinary aggregations of this fire happen.

3. The whole composed by the coacervation of many particulars; an aggregate.

AGGRESSED. v. n. [from aggressor, Lat.] To commit the first act of violence; to begin the quarrel.

The glorious pair advance
With mingled anger, and collected might,
To turn the war, and tell aggressing France,
How Britain's sons, and Britain's friends can fight.

AGGRESSION. n. f. [from aggressio, Lat.] The first act of injury; commencement of a quarrel by some act of iniquity.

There is no resisting of a common enemy, without an union for a mutual defence; and there may be also, on the other hand, a conspiracy of common enmity and aggression.

AGGRESSOR. n. f. [from aggressus.] The person that first commences hostility; the assaulter or invader, opposed to the defendant.

Fly in nature's face?
But how, if nature fly in my face first?
Then nature's the aggressor: Let her look to't.

It is a very unlucky circumstance, to be obliged to retaliate the injuries of such authours, whose works are so soon forgotten, that we are in danger already of appearing the first aggressors.

AGGRIEVANCE. n. f. [See GRIEVANCE.] Injury; hardship inflicted; wrong endured.

AGGRIEVE. v. a. [from gravis, Lat. See To grieve.] 1. To give sorrow; to cause grief; to vex.

It is not improbable, that to grieve was originally neuter, and aggrieve the active.

But while therein I took my chief delight,
I saw, alas! the gaping earth devour

The spring, the place, and all clean out of sight,
Which yet aggrieves my heart even to this hour.

2. To impose some hardships upon; to harass; to hurt in one's right. This is a kind of juridical sense; and whenever it is used now, it seems to bear some allusion to forms of law.

Sewall, archbishop of York, much aggrieved with some practices of the pope's collectors, took all patiently.

The landed man finds himself aggrieved, by the falling of his rents, and the frightening of his fortune; whilst the monied man keeps up his gain, and the merchant thrives and grows rich by trade.

Of injur'd fame, and mighty wrongs receiv'd,
Chloe complains, and wond'rously's aggrieved.

To AGGROUPE. v. a. [from agropare, Ital.] To bring together into one figure; to crowd together: a term of painting.

Bodies of divers natures, which are aggrouped (or combined) together, are agreeable and pleasant to the sight.

AGHAST. adj. [either the participle of agaze, (see AGAZE.) and then to be written agazed, or agast, or from a and gast, a ghost, which the present orthography favours; perhaps they were originally different words.] Struck with horror, as at the sight of a spectre; stupified with terror.

She fighting fore, as if her heart in twaine
Had riven been, and all her heart-strings braut,
With dreary drooping eyne look'd up like one agbaf.

The aged earth agbaf,
With terror of that blast,
Shall from the surface to the centre shake.

Agbaf he wak'd, and starting from his bed,
Cold sweat in clammy drops his limbs o'erspread.

I laugh to think how your unshaken Cato
Will look agbaf, while unforeseen destruction
Pours in upon him thus from every side.

AGILE. adj. [from agilis, Lat.] Nimble; ready; having the quality of being speedily put in motion; active.

With that he gave his able horse the head,
And bending forward struck his agile heels
Against the panting sides of his poor jade,
Up to the rowel-head.

The immediate and agile subservience of the spirits to the empire of the mind or soul.

To guide its actions with informing care,
In peace to judge, to conquer in the war,
Render it agile, witty, valiant, sage,
As fits the various course of human age.

AGILENESS. n. f. [from agile.] The quality of being agile; nimbleness; readiness for motion; quickness; activity; agility.

AGILITY. n. f. [from agilis, Lat. from agilis, agile.] Nimbleness; readiness to move; quickness; activity.

A limb over-strained by lifting a weight above its power, may never recover its former agility and vigour.

AGILLOCHUM. n. f. Aloes-wood. A tree in the East Indies, brought to us in small bits, of a very fragrant scent. It is hot, drying, and accounted a strengthener of the nerves in general. The best is of a blackish purple colour, and so light as to swim upon water.

AGIO. n. f. [An Italian word, signifying ease or convenience.]

A mercantile term, used chiefly in Holland and Venice, for the difference between the value of bank-notes, and the current money.

AGIST. v. a. [from agiste, Fr. a bed or resting-place, or from agiste, i. e. stabulari.] To take in and feed the cattle of strangers in the king's forest, and to gather the money. The officers that do this, are called agisters, in English guest or gift-takers. Their function is termed agistment; as, agistment upon the sea-banks.

This word agist is also used, for the taking in of other men's cattle into any man's ground, at a certain rate per week. Blount.

AGISTMENT. n. f. [See AGIST.]

It is taken by the canon lawyers in another sense than is mentioned under agist. They seem to intend by it, a modus or composition, or mean rate, at which some right or due may be reckoned: perhaps it is corrupted from addouissement, or adjustment.

AGISTOR. n. f. [from agist.] An officer of the king's forest. See AGIST.

AGITABLE. adj. [from agitate; agitabilis. Lat.] That which may be agitated, or put in motion; perhaps that which may be disputed. See AGITATE, and AGITATION.

TO AGITATE. v. a. [from agito, Lat.]

1. To put in motion; to shake; to move nimbly; as, the surface of the waters is agitated by the wind; the vessel was broken by agitating the liquor.

2. To be the cause of motion; to actuate; to move.

Where dwells this foreign arbitrary soul,
Which does the human animal controul,
Inform each part, and agitate the whole?

Blackmore.

3. To affect with perturbation; as, the mind of man is agitated by various passions.

4. To stir; to bandy from one to another; to discuss; to controvert; as, to agitate a question.

Though this controversy be revived, and botly agitated among the moderns; yet I doubt whether it be not, in a great part, a nominal dispute.

Boyle on Colours.

5. To contrive; to revolve; to form by laborious thought.

Formalities of extraordinary zeal and piety are never more studied and elaborate, than when politicians most agitate desperate designs. K. Charles.

AGITATION. n. f. [from agitate, agitatio, Lat.]

1. The act of moving or shaking any thing.

Putrefaction asketh rest: for the subtle motion which putrefaction requireth, is disturbed by any agitation.

Bacon.

2. The state of being moved or agitated; as, the waters, after a storm, are sometime in a violent agitation.

3. Discussion; controversial examination.

A kind of a school question is started in this fable, upon reason and instinct: this deliberative proceeding of the crow, was rather a logical agitation of the matter.

L'Estrange's Fab.

4. Violent motion of the mind; perturbation; disturbance of the thoughts.

A great perturbation in nature! to receive at once the benefit of sleep, and do the effects of watching. In this slumbry agitation, besides her walking, and other actual performances, what have you heard her say?

Shakespeare's Macbeth.

His mother could no longer bear the agitations of so many passions as thronged upon her.

Tatler, No. 55.

5. Deliberation; contrivance; the state of being consulted upon.

The project now in agitation for repealing of the test act, and yet leaving the name of an establishment to the present national church, is inconsistent.

Swift's Miscellanies.

AGITATOR. n. f. [from agitate.] He that agitates any thing; he who manages affairs: in which sense seems to be used the agitators of the army.

AGILET. n. f. [Some derive it from αἴλη, splendour; but it is apparently to be deduced from aigulette, Fr.] a tag to a point, and that from aigu, sharp.]

1. A tag of a point curved into some representation of an animal, generally of a man.

He thereupon gave for the garter a chain worth 200l. and his gown address'd with aglets, esteemed worth 25l.

Hayward.

Why, give him gold enough, and marry him to a puppet, or an aglet baby, or an old trot, and ne'er a tooth in her head.

Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew.

2. The pendants at the ends of the chieftes of flowers, as in tulips.

AGOMINAL. adj. [from agmen, Lat.] Belonging to a troop. Dict.

AGNAIL. adj. [from ange, grieved, and nagle, a nail.] A disease of the nails; a whitlow; an inflammation round the nails.

AGNATION. n. f. [from agnatus, Lat.] Descent from the same father, in a direct male line, distinct from cognition, or consanguinity, which includes descendants from females.

AGNITION. n. f. [from agnitio, Lat.] Acknowledgment.

TO AGNIZE. v. n. [from agnosco, Lat.] To acknowledge; to own; to avow. This word is now obsolete.

I do agnize

A natural and prompt alacrity

I find in hardness.

Shakes. Othello.

AGNOMINATION. n. f. [from agnominatio, Lat.] Allusion of one word to another, by resemblance of sound.

The British continueth yet in Wales, and some villages of Cornwall, intermingled with provincial Latin, being very significative, copious, and pleasantly running upon agnominations, although harsh in aspirations.

Cand. n.

AGNUS CASTUS. n. f. [Lat.] The name of the tree commonly called the Chaste Tree, from an imaginary virtue of preserving chastity.

Of laurel some, of woodbine many more,

And wreathes of agnus castus others bore.

Dryden.

AGO. adj. [from agan, Sax. past or gone; whence writers formerly used, and in some provinces the people still use, agone for ago.] Past; as, long ago; that is, long time has past since. Reckoning time towards the present, we use since; as, it is a year since it happened: reckoning from the present, we use ago; as it happened a year ago. This is not, perhaps, always observed.

The great supply,

Are wreck'd three nights ago on Godwin sands.

Shakespeare.

This both by others and myself I know,

For I have serv'd their sovereign long ago;

Of have been caught within the winding train.

Dryden's Fables.

I shall set down an account of a discourse I chanced to have with one of them some time ago.

Addison's Freeholder.

AGO. adv. [a word of uncertain etymology; the French have the term à gogo, in low language; as, ils vivent à gogo, they live to their wish: from this phrase our word may be, perhaps, derived.]

1. In a state of desire; in a state of warm imagination; heated with the notion of some enjoyment; longing; strongly excited.

As for the sense and reason of it, that has little or nothing to do here; only let it found full and round, and chime right to the humour, which is at present agog (just as a big, long, rattling name is said to command even adoration from a Spaniard), and, no doubt, with this powerful, senseless engine, the rabble driver shall be able to carry all before him.

South's Sermons.

2. It is used with the verbs to be, or to set; as, he is agog, or you may set him agog.

The gawdy gossip, when she's set agog,

In jewels drest, and at each ear a bob,

Goes flaunting out, and, in her trim of pride,

Thinks all she says or does is justify'd.

Dryden's Fiv. Sat. 6.

This maggot has no sooner set him agog, but he gets him a ship, freights her, builds castles in the air, and conceits both the Indies in his coffers.

L'Estrange.

3. It has the particles on, or for, before the object of desire.

On which the saints are all agog,

And all this for a bear and dog. Hudib. cant. ii.

Gypsies generally straggle into these parts, and set the heads of our servant maids so agog for husbands, that we do not expect to have any business done as it should be, whilst they are in the country.

Addison's Spectator.

AGO. adv. [from agan, Sax.] Ago; past. See AGO.

Is he such a princely one,
As you speak him long agone?

Ben Jonson's Fairy Prince.

AGONISM. n. f. [from ἀγωνισμός, Gr.] Contention for a prize. Dict.

AGONING. participial adj. [from a and going.] In action; into action.

Their first movement, and impressed motions, demanded the impulse of an almighty hand to set them first agoning.

Tatler.

AGONIST. n. f. [from ἀγωνιστής, Gr.] A contender for prizes. Dict.

AGONISTES. n. f. [from ἀγωνιστής, Gr.] A prize-fighter; one that contends at any public solemnity for a prize. Milton has so styled his tragedy, because Samson was called out to divert the Philistines with feats of strength.

AGONISTICAL. adj. [from agonistes.] Relating to prize-fighting. Dict.

TO AGONIZE. v. n. [from agonizo, low Latin, ἀγωνίζω, Gr. agonizer, Fr.] To feel agonies; to be in excessive pain.

Do'st thou behold my poor distracted heart,

Thus rent with agonizing love and rage,

And ask me what it means? Art thou not false?

Rowe's Jane Shore.

Or touch, if, tremblingly alive all o'er,

To smart and agonize at ev'ry pore?

Pope's Essay on Man.

AGONOTHE'TICK. adj. [from ἀγών and ἵκναι, Gr.] Proposing public contentions for prizes; giving prizes; presiding at public games. Dict.

AGONY. n. f. [from ἀγών, Gr. agon, low Lat. agonie, Fr.]

1. The pangs of death; properly the last contest between life and death.

Never was there more pity in saving any than in ending me, because therein my agony shall end.

Sidney.

Thou who for me did feel such pain,

Whose precious blood the cross did stain,

Let not those agonies be vain.

Roscommon.

2. Any violent or excessive pain of body or mind.

Betwixt them both, they have me done to dy,

Through wounds and strokes, and stubborn handling.

That death were better than such agony,
As grief and fury unto me did bring. Fairy Queen.

Thee I have mis'd, and thought it long, deprived

Thy presence, agony of love! till now
Not felt, nor shall be twice. Milt. Parad. Lost.

3. It is particularly used in devotions for our Redeemer's conflict in the garden.

To propose our desires, which cannot take such effect as we specify, shall, notwithstanding, otherwise procure us his heavenly grace, even as this very prayer of Christ obtained angels to be sent him as comforters in his agony.

Hooker.

AGO. adv. [a and good.] In earnest; not fictitiously. Not in use.

At that time I made her weep agood,

For I did play a lamentable part.

Shakespeare. Two Gentlemen of Verona.

AGOUTY. n. f. An animal of the Antilles, of the bigness of a rabbit, with bright red hair, and a little tail without hair. He has but two teeth in each jaw, holds his meat in his forepaws like a squirrel, and has a very remarkable cry. When he is angry, his hair stands on end, and he strikes the earth with his hindfeet, and, when chafed, he flies to a hollow tree, whence he is expelled by smoke.

Trevoux.

TO AGRA'CE. v. a. [from a and grace.] To grant favours to; to confer benefits upon: a word not now in use.

She granted, and that knight so much agrac'd,
That she him taught celestial discipline.

Fairy Queen.

AGRAMMATIST. n. f. [from priv. and ἡγάρματις, Gr.] An illiterate man. Dict.

AGRA'RIAN. adj. [from agrarius, Lat.] Relating to fields or grounds; a word seldom used but in the Roman history, where there is mention of the agrarian law.

To AGREESE. v. a. [from a and grease.] To daub; to grease; to pollute with filth.

The waves thereof so flow and sluggish were, Engrofs'd with mud, which did them foul agree.

To AGRE'E. v. n. [agree, Fr. from gré, liking or good-will; gratia and gratus, Lat.]

1. To be in concord; to live without contention; not to differ.

The more you agree together, the less hurt can your enemies do you. Brown's View of Epic Poetry.

2. To grant; to yield to; to admit; with the particles to or upon.

And persuaded them to agree to all reasonable conditions. 2 Maccabees, xi. 14.

We do not prove the origin of the earth from a chaos; seeing that is agreed on by all that give it any origin. Burnet.

3. To settle amicably.

A form of words were quickly agreed on between them for a perfect combination. Clarendon.

4. To settle terms by stipulation; to accord; followed by with.

Agree with thine adversary quickly, whilst thou art in the way with him; lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Matt. v. 25.

5. To settle a price between buyer and seller.

Friend, I do thee no wrong: didst not thou agree with me for a penny. Matt. xx. 13.

6. To be of the same mind or opinion.

He exceedingly provoked, or underwent the envy, and reproach, and malice of men of all qualities and conditions, who agreed in nothing else. Clarendon.

Milton is a noble genius, and the world agrees to confess it. Watts's Improvement of the Mind.

7. To concur; to co-operate.

Must the whole man, amazing thought! return To the cold marble and contracted urn? And never shall those particles agree, That were in life this individual he? Prior.

8. To settle some point among many, with upon before a noun.

Strifes and troubles would be endless, except they gave their common consent all to be ordered by some whom they should agree upon. Hooker.

If men, skilled in chymical affairs, shall agree to write clearly, and keep men from being stunned by dark or empty words, they will be reduced either to write nothing, or books that may teach us something. Boyle.

9. To be consistent; not to contradict; with to or with.

For many bare false witnesses against him, but their witnesses agreed not together. Mark, xiv. 56.

They that stood by said again to Peter, surely thou art one of them: for thou art a Galilean; and thy speech agreeth thereto. Mark, xiv. 70.

Which testimony I the less scruple to alledge, because it agrees very well with what has been affirmed to me. Boyle.

10. To suit with; to be accommodated to: with to or with.

Thou feedest thine own people with angels food, and didst send them from heaven bread agreeing to every taste. Wisdom.

His principles could not be made to agree with that constitution and order which God had settled in the world; and, therefore, must needs clash with common sense and experience. Locke.

11. To cause no disturbance in the body.

I have often thought, that our prescribing asses milk in such small quantities, is injudicious; for, undoubtedly, with such as it agrees with, it would perform much greater and quicker effects, in greater quantities. Arbutnot on Allments.

To AGREE. v. a.

1. To put an end to a variance.

He saw from far, or seemed for to see, Some troublesome uproar, or contentious fray, Whereto he drew in haste it to agree. Fairy Queen, b. ii.

2. To make friends; to reconcile.

The mighty rivals, whose destructive rage

Did the whole world in civil arms engage,

Are now agreed. Rafcommon.

AGREEABLE. adj. [agréable, Fr.]

1. Suitable to; consistent with; conformable to. It has the particle to, or with.

This paucity of blood is agreeable to many other animals, as frogs, lizards, and other fishes. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

The delight which men have in popularity, fame, submission, and subjection of other men's minds, seemeth to be a thing, in itself, without contemplation of consequence, agreeable and grateful to the nature of man. Bacon's Natural History.

What you do, is not at all agreeable either with so good a christian, or so reasonable and so great a person. Temple.

That which is agreeable to the nature of one thing, is many times contrary to the nature of another. L'Estrange.

As the practice of all piety and virtue is agreeable to our reason, so is it likewise the interest both of private persons and of public societies. Tillotson.

2. In the following passage the adjective is used by a familiar corruption for the adverb agreeably.

Agreeable breunts, perhaps it might not be amiss, to make children, as soon as they are capable of it, often to tell a story. Locke on Education.

3. Pleasing: that is suitable to the inclination, faculties, or temper. It is used in this sense both of persons and things.

And while the face of outward things we find Pleasing and fair, agreeable and sweet, These things transport. Sir J. Davies.

I recollect in my mind the discourses which have passed between us, and call to mind a thousand agreeable remarks, which he has made on these occasions. Addison, Spectator, N^o. 241.

AGREEABLENESS. n. f. [from agreeable.]

1. Consistency with; suitableness to: with the particle to.

Pleasant tastes depend not on the things themselves, but their agreeableness to this or that particular palate, wherein there is great variety. Locke.

2. The quality of pleasing. It is used in an inferior sense, to mark the production of satisfaction, calm and lasting, but below rapture or admiration.

There will be occasion for largeness of mind and agreeableness of temper. Collier of Friendship.

It is very much an image of that author's writing, who has an agreeableness that charms us without correctness; like a mistress, whose faults we see, but love her with them all. Pope.

3. Resemblance; likeness; sometimes with the particle between.

This relation is likewise seen in the agreeableness between man and the other parts of the universe. Grew's Cosmologia Sacra.

AGREEABLY. adv. [from agreeable.]

1. Consistently with; in a manner suitable to. They may look into the affairs of Judea and Jerusalem, agreeably to that which is in the law of the Lord. 1 Efd. xviii. 12.

2. Pleasingly.

I did never imagine, that so many excellent rules could be produced so advantageously and agreeably. Swift.

AGREED. participial adj. [from agree.] Settled by consent.

When they had got known and agreed names, to signify those internal operations of their own minds, they were sufficiently furnished to make known by words all their ideas. Locke.

AGREINGNESS. n. f. [from agree.] Consistence; suitableness.

AGREEMENT. n. f. [agreement, Fr. in law Latin agrementum, which Coke would willingly derive from aggratio mentium.]

1. Concord.

What agreement is there between the hyena and the dog? and what peace between the rich and the poor? Eccles. xiii. 18.

2. Resemblance of one thing to another.

The division and quivering which please so much in music, have an agreement with the glittering of light, as the moon-beams playing upon a wave. Bacon.

Expansion and duration have this farther agreement, that though they are both considered by us as having parts, yet their parts are not separable one from another. Locke.

3. Compact; bargain; conclusion of controversy; stipulation.

And your covenant with death shall be disannulled, and your agreement with hell shall not stand; when the overflowing scourge shall pass through, then ye shall be trodden down by it. Isaiah xxviii. 18.

Make an agreement with me by a present, and come out to me, and then eat ye every man of his own vine, and every one of his fig-tree. 2 Kings xviii. 31.

Frog had given his word, that he would meet the company to talk of this agreement. Arbutnot's History of John Bull.

AGRESTICK. OR AGRESTICAL. adj. [from agrestis, Lat.] Having relation to the country; rude; rustic. Dick.

AGRICOLA'TION. n. f. [from agricola, Lat.] Culture of the ground. Dick.

AGRICULTURE. n. f. [agricultura, Lat.] The art of cultivating the ground; tillage; husbandry, as distinct from pasturage.

He strictly advieth not to begin to sow before the setting of the stars; which, notwithstanding, without injury to agriculture, cannot be observed in England. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

That there was tillage bestowed upon the antediluvian ground, Moses does indeed intimate in general; what sort of tillage that was, is not expressed; I hope to show that their agriculture was nothing near so laborious and troublesome, nor did it take up so much time as ours doth. Woodward's Natural History.

The disposition of Ulysses inclined him to war, rather than the more lucrative, but more secure, method of life, by agriculture and husbandry. Brown's Notes on the Odyssey.

AGRIMONY. n. f. [agrimonia, Lat.] The name of a plant.

The leaves are rough, hairy, pennated, and grow alternately on the branches; the flower-cup consists of one leaf, which is divided into five segments; the flowers have five or six leaves, and are formed into a long spike, which expand in form of a rose; the fruit is oblong, dry, and prickly, like the burdock; in each of which are contained two kernels. Miller.

To AGRISE. v. n. [agrisan, Sax.] to look terrible. Out of use. Spenser.

To AGRISE. v. a. To terrify. Spenser.

AGROUND. adv. [from a and ground.]

1. Stranded; hindered by the ground from passing farther.

With our great ships we durst not approach the coast, we having been all of us aground. Sir W. Raleigh's Essays.

Say what you seek, and whether were you bound?

Were you, by stress of weather cast aground? Bryden's Fm.

2. It is likewise figuratively used, for being hindered in the progress of affairs; as, the negotiators were aground at that objection.

AGUE. n. f. [aigu, Fr. acute.] An intermitting fever, with cold fits succeeded by hot. The cold fit is, in popular language, more particularly called the ague, and the hot the fever.

Our cattle's strength

Will laugh a siege to scorn. Here let them lie. Till famine and the ague eat them up. Shakespeare.

Though

He feels the heats of youth, and colds of age, Yet neither tempers nor corrects the other; As if there were an ague in his nature,

That still inclines to one extreme. Denham's Sophy.

AGUED. adj. [from ague.] Struck with an ague; shivering; chill; cold: a word in little use.

All hurt behind, backs red, and faces pale, With slight and agued fear! Shakesf. Coriolanus.

AGUE.

AID

A'GUE-FIT. n. f. [from ague and fit.] The paroxysm of the ague.

This ague fit of fear is overblown.

Shakespeare's Richard II.

A'GUE-PROOF. adj. [from ague and proof.] Proof against agues; able to resist the causes which produce agues, without being affected.

When the rain came to wet me once, and the wind to make me chatter; when the thunder would not peace at my bidding; there I found 'em, there I smelt 'em out. They told me I was every thing: 'tis a lie; I am not ague proof.

Shakespeare's King Lear.

A'GUE-TREE. n. f. [from ague and tree.] A name sometimes given to cassia.

To AGUISE. v. a. [from a and guise. See GUISE.] To dress; to adorn; to deck: a word now not in use.

As her fantastic wit did most delight,
Sometimes her head she fondly would aguise
With gaudy garlands, or fresh flowers dight
About her neck, or rings of rushes plight.

Fairy Queen.

A'GUISH. adj. [from ague.] Having the qualities of an ague.

So calm, and so serene, but now,
What means this change on Myra's brow?
Her aguish love now glows and burns,
Then chills and shakes, and the cold fit returns.

Granville.

A'GUISINESS. n. f. [from aguish.] The quality of resembling an ague.

1. A word noting sometimes dislike and censure.

Ab! sinful nation, a people laden with iniquity, a seed of evil doers, children that are corrupters, they have forsaken the Lord.

Isaiah, i. 4.

2. Sometimes contempt and exultation.

Let them not say in their hearts, Ab! so we would have it: let them not say, we have swallowed him up.

Isaiah, xxxv. 25.

Sometimes, and most frequently, compassion and complaint.

In youth alone, unhappy mortals live;
But, ab! the mighty bliss is fugitive:
Discolour'd sickness, anxious labour come,
And age and death's inexorable doom.

Dryden's Virg. Georg. iii.

Ab me! the blooming pride of May,
And that of beauty are but one:
At morn both flourish bright and gay,
Both fade at evening, pale, and gone.

Prior.

4. When it is followed by that, it expresses vehement desire.

In goodness, as in greatness, they excell;
Ab that! we loved ourselves but half so well.

Dryden's Juvenal.

AHA', AHA! interjection. A word intimating triumph and contempt.

They opened their mouth wide against me,
and said, aha, aha! our eye hath seen it.

Psalms, xxxv. 21.

AHE'AD. adv. [from a and head.]

1. Farther onward than another: a sea term.

And now the mighty Centaur seems to lead,
And now the speedy Dolphin gets ahead.

Dryden's Aeneid.

2. Headlong; precipitantly: used of animals, and figuratively of men.

It is mightily the fault of parents, guardians, tutors, and governors, that so many men miscarry. They suffer them at first to run ahead, and, when perverse inclinations are advanced into habits, there is no dealing with them.

L'Estrange's Fall.

AHE'IGHT. adv. [from a and height.] Aloft; on high.

But have I fall'n or no?—
—From the dread summit of this chalky bourn!
Look up abeight, the thrill gorg'd lark so far
Cannot be seen or heard.

Shakespeare's King Lear.

AIOU'AI. n. f. The name of a poisonous plant.

To AID. v. a. [aid, Fr. from adjutare, Lat.] To help; to support; to succour.

AID

Into the lake he leapt, his lord to aid,
And of him catching hold, him strongly staid
From drowning.

Fairy Queen.

Neither shall they give any thing unto them that make war upon them, or aid them with victuals, weapons, money, or ships.

Maccabees, viii. 26.

By the loud trumpet, which our courage aid,
We learn that found as well as sense persuades.

Recommen.

AID. n. f. [from To aid.]

1. Help; support.

The memory of useful things may receive considerable aid if they are thrown into verse.

Watts's Improvement of the Mind.

Your patrimonial stores in peace possess;
Undoubted all your filial claim confess:
Your private right should impious power invade,
The peers of Ithaca would arm in aid.

Pope's Odyssey.

2. The person that gives help or support; a helper; auxiliary.

Thou hast said, it is not good that man should be alone; let us make unto him an aid, like unto himself.

Genesis, i. 6.

Great aids came in to him, partly upon misfires, and partly volunteers from many parts.

Bacon's Henry VII.

3. In law.

A subsidy. Aid is also particularly used in matter of pleading, for a petition made in court, for the calling in of help from another, that hath an interest in the cause in question; and is likewise both to give strength to the party that prays in aid of him, and also to avoid a prejudice accruing towards his own right, except it be prevented: as, when a tenant for term of life, courtesy, &c. being impleaded touching his estate, he may pray in aid of him in the reversion; that is, entreat the court, that he may be called in by writ, to allege what he thinks good for the maintenance both of his right and his own.

Cowell.

AIDANCE. n. f. [from aid.] Help; support; a word little used.

Off have I seen a timely parted ghost,
Of airy semblance, meagre, pale, and bloodless,
Being all descended to the lab'ring heart,
who, in the conflict that it holds with death,
Attracts the same for aidance against the enemy.

Shakespeare's Henry VI.

AIDANT. adj. [aidant, Fr.] Helping; helpful: not in use.

All you unpublish'd virtues of the earth,
Spring with my tears; be aidant and remediate
In the good man's distresses.

Shakespeare's King Lear.

AID'ER. n. f. [from aid.] He that brings aid or help: a helper; an ally.

All along as he went, were punished the adherents and aiders of the late rebels.

Bacon's Hen. VII.

AIDLESS. adj. [from aid and less, an inseparable particle.] Helpless; unsupported; unfenced.

Alone he enter'd

The mortal gate o' the city, which he painted
With shunless destiny: aidless came off,
And, with a sudden re-enforcement, struck
Corioli, like a planet.

Shakespeare's Coriolanus.

He had met
Already, ere my best speed could prevent,
The aidless innocent lady, his wish'd prey.

Milton's Comus.

AIGU'ET. n. f. [aiguilet, Fr.] A point with tags; points of gold at the end of the fringes.

It all above besprinkled was throughout
With golden aigüets: that glister'd bright,
Like twinkling stars, and all the skirt about
Was hemm'd with golden fringes.

Fairy Queen.

To AIL. v. a. [exlan, Sax. to be troublesome.]

1. To pain; to trouble; to give pain.

And the Angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, what ailth thee, Hagar? fear not, for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is.

Gen. xxi. 17.

AIM

2. It is used in a sense less determinate, for so affect in any manner; as, something ails me that I cannot fit still; what ails the man that he laughs without reason?

Love smil'd, and thus said, Want join'd to desire is unhappy; but if he nought do desire, what can Heraclitus ail?

Sidney.

What ails me, that I cannot lose thy thought! Command the empress hither to be brought, I, in her death shall some diversion find, And rid my thoughts at once of woman-kind.

Dryden's Tyrannick Love.

3. To feel pain; to be incommode.

4. It is remarkable, that this word is never used but with some indefinite term, or the word nothing; as, What ails him? What does he ail? He ails something; he ails nothing. Something ails him; nothing ails him. Thus we never say, a fever ails him, or he ails a fever, or fine definite terms with this verb.

AIL. n. f. [from the verb.] A disease.

Or heal, O Nerves, thy officer ail.

Pope.

A'ILMENT. n. f. [from ail.] Pain; disease.

Little ailments oft attend the fair,

Not decent for a husband's eye or ear.

Gran.

I am never ill, but I think of your ailments, and repine that they mutually hinder our being together.

Scott's Letters.

AILING. participial adj. [from To ail.] Sickly; full of complaints.

To AIM. v. a. [It is derived by Skinner from smere, to point at; a word which I have not found.]

1. To endeavour to strike with a missile weapon; to direct towards; with the particle at.

Aim! thou at princes, all amaz'd they said,

The last of games?

Pope's Odyssey.

2. To point the view; or direct the steps towards any thing; to tend towards; to endeavour to reach or obtain: with to formerly, now only with at.

Lo, here the world is bliss; so here the end

To which all men do aim, rich to be made,
Such grace now to be happy is before thee laid.

Fairy Queen.

Another kind there is, which although we desire for itself, as health, and virtue, and knowledge, nevertheless they are not the last mark whereat we aim, but have their further end whereunto they are referred.

Hooker.

Sworn with applause, and aiming still at more,
He now provokes the sea gods from the shore.

Dryden's Aeneid.

Religion tends to the ease and pleasure, the peace and tranquility of our minds, which all the wisdom of the world did always aim at, as the utmost felicity of this life.

Tillotson.

3. To direct the missile weapon; more particularly taken for the act of pointing the weapon by the eye, before its dismissal from the hand.

And proud Ideus, Priam's charioteer,
Who shakes his empty reins, and aims his airy spear.

Dryden.

4. To guess.

AIM. n. f. [from the verb.]

1. The direction of a missile weapon.

Africanus, young and eager of his game,
Soon bent his bow, uncertain of his aim;
But the dire fiend the fatal arrow guides,
Which pierc'd his bowels through his panting sides.

Dryden's Aeneid, vii. l. 691.

2. The point to which the thing thrown is directed.

That arrows fled not swifter toward their aim,
Than did our soldiers, aiming at their safety,
Fly from the field.

Shakespeare's Henry IV. p. ii.

3. In a figurative sense, a purpose; a scheme; an intention; a design.

He trusted to have equal'd the most High,
If he oppos'd: and, with ambitious aim
Against the throne and monarchy of God,
Rais'd impious war.

Milton's Paradise Lost, b. i. l. 47.

But see how oft ambitious aims are cross'd,
And chiefs contend till all the prize is lost.

Pope.

4. The

4. The object of a design; the thing after which any one endeavours.

The safest way is to suppose, that the epistle has but one aim, till, by a frequent perusal of it, you are forced to see there are distinct independent parts. Locke's Essay on St. Paul's Epistles.

5. Conjecture; guess.

It is impossible, by aim, to tell it; and, for experience and knowledge thereof, I do not think that there was ever any of the particulars thereof.

Spenser on Ireland.

There is a history in all men's lives,
Figuring the nature of the times decess'd;
The which observ'd, a man may prophesy
With a near aim, of the main chance of things,
As yet not come to life, which, in their feeds
And weak beginnings, lie intreatur'd.

Shakespeare Henry IV.

AIR. n. f. [air, Fr. air, Lat.]

1. The element encompassing the terraqueous globe.

If I were to tell what I mean by the word air, I may say, it is that fine matter which we breathe in and breathe out continually; or it is that thin fluid body, in which the birds fly; a little above the earth; or it is that invisible matter, which fills all places near the earth, or which immediately encompasses the globe of earth and water.

Watts's Logick.

2. The state of the air; or the air considered with regard to health.

There be many good and healthful airs, that do appear by habitation and other proofs, that differ not in smell from other airs.

Bacon's Nat. Hist. N° 904.

3. Air in motion; a small gentle wind.

Fresh gales, and gentle airs,

Whisper'd it to the woods, and from their wings
Flung rose, flung odours from the spicy shrub Disporting! Milton's Par. Lost, l. viii. l. 515.

But safe repose, without an air of breath,
Dwells here, and a dumb quiet next to death.

Dryden.

Let vernal airs through trembling oaks play,
And Albion's cliffs rebound the rural lay.

Pope's Pastorals.

4. Scent; vapour.

Stinks which the nostrils straight abhor are not the most pernicious; but such airs as have some similitude with man's body; and so insinuate themselves, and betray the spirits. Bacon.

5. Blast; pestilential vapour.

All the stor'd vengeance of heaven fall
On her ingrateful top! strike her young bones,
You taking airs with lameness.

Shakespeare's King Lear.

6. Any thing light or uncertain; that is as light as air.

O momentary grace of mortal men,
Which we more hunt for than the grace of God!
Who builds his hope in air of your fair looks,
Lives like a drunken sailor on a mast,
Ready with ev'ry nod, to tumble down.

Shakespeare's Richard III.

7. The open weather; air unconfined.

The garden was inclos'd within the square,
Where young Emilia took the morning air.

Dryd. Fables.

8. Vent; utterance; emission into the air.

I would have ask'd you, if I durst for shame,
If still you lov'd? You gave it air before me.
But ah! why were we not both of a sex?
For then we might have lov'd without a crime.

Dryden.

9. Publication; exposure to the public view and knowledge.

I am sorry to find it has taken air, that I have some hand in these papers. Pope's Letters.

10. Intelligence; information. This is now in use.

It grew from the airs, which the princes and states abroad received from their ambassadors and agents here. Bacon's Henry VII.

11. Musick, whether light or serious; found; air modulated.

This musick crept by me upon the waters,
Allaying both their fury and my passion.
With its sweet air.

Shakespeare's Tempest.

Call in some musick; I have heard, soft airs
Can charm our senses, and expel our cares.

Denb. Soph.

The same airs which some entertain with most delightful transports, to others are importune.

Glanville's Sceptis Scientifica.

Since we have such a treasury of words so proper for the airs of musick, I wonder that persons should give so little attention.

Addison, Spectator, N° 406.

Borne on the swelling notes, our souls aspire,
While solemn airs improve the sacred fire;
And angels lean from heav'n to hear!

Pope's St. Cecilia.

—When the soul is sunk with cares,

Exalts her in enlivening airs! Pope's St. Cecilia.

12. Poetry; a song.

The repeated air

Of sad Electra's poet, had the pow'r
To save th' Athenian walls from ruin bare.

Parad. Regain.

13. The mien, or manner, of the person; the look.

Her graceful innocence, her ev'ry air,
Of gesture, or least action, over-aw'd
His malice. Milton's Par. Lost.

For the air of youth

Hopeful and cheerful, in thy blood shall reign
A melancholy damp of cold and dry,
To weigh thy spirits down; and last consume
The balm of life. Milton's Par. Lost.

But, having the life before us, besides the experience of all they knew, it is no wonder to hit some airs and features, which they have misfed.

Dryden on Dramatic Poetry.

There is something wonderfully divine in the airs of this picture. Addison on Italy.

Yet should the Graces all thy figures place,
And breathe an air divine on ev'ry face. Pope.

14. An affected or laboured manner or gesture; as, a lofty air, a gay air.

Whom Ancus follows with a fawning air;
But vain within, and proudly popular.

Dryden's Aeneid, vi.

There are of these sort of beauties, which last but for a moment; as, the different airs of an assembly, upon the sight of an unexpected and uncommon object, some particularity of a violent passion, some graceful action, a smile, a glance of an eye, a disdainful look, a look of gravity, and a thousand other such like things. Dryd. Discrepancy.

Their whole lives were employed in intrigues of state, and they naturally give themselves airs of kings and princes, of which the ministers of other nations are only the representatives.

Addison's Remarks on Italy.

To curl their waving hairs,
Assist their blushes, and inspire their airs. Pope.
He assumes and affects an entire set of very different airs, he conceives himself a being of a superior nature. Swift.

15. Appearance.

As it was communicated with the air of a secret, it soon found its way into the world.

Pope's Ded. to Rape of the Lock.

16. [In horsemanship.] Airs denote the artificial or practised motions of a managed horse.

Cibambers.

To AIR. v. a. [from the noun air.]

1. To expose to the air; to open to the air.

The others make it a matter of small commendation in itself, if they, who wear it, do nothing else but air the robes, which their place requireth.

Hooker, b. v. § 29.

Fleas breed principally of straw or mats, where there hath been a little moisture, or the chamber and bed-straw kept close, and not aired.

Bacon's Nat. Hist. N° 696.

We have had, in our time, experience twice or thrice, when both the judges that sat upon the jail, and numbers of those that attended the business, or were present, sickened upon it, and died. Therefore, it were good wisdom, that, in such cases, the jail were aired, before they were brought forth. Bacon's Natural History, N° 914.

As the ants were airing their provisions one winter, up comes a hungry grasshopper to them, and begs a charity. L'Estrange's Fables.

Or wicker-baskets weave, or air the corn.

Dryd. Virg.

2. To take the air, or enjoy the open air, with the reciprocal pronoun.

Nay, stay a little—

Were you but riding forth to air yourself,

Such parting were too petty. Shakespeare Cymbeline.

I ascended the highest hills of Bagdat, in order to pass the rest of the day in meditation and prayer. As I was here airing myself on the tops of the mountains, I fell into a profound contemplation on the vanity of human life. Addison, Spect.

3. To air liquors; to warm them by the fire; a term used in conversation.

4. To breed in nests. In this sense, it is derived from aery, a nest. It is now out of use.

You may add their busy, dangerous, discourteous, yea, and sometimes despicable stealing, one from another, of the eggs and young ones; who, if they were allowed to air naturally and quietly, there would be store sufficient, to kill not only the partridges, but even all the good housewives chickens in a country. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.

AIRBLADDER. n. f. [from air and bladder.]

1. Any cuticle or vesicle filled with air.

The pulmonary artery and vein pass along the surfaces of these airbladders, in an infinite number of ramifications. Arbutnot on Aliments.

2. The bladder in fishes, by the contraction and dilatation of which, they vary the properties of their weight to that of their bulk, and rise or fall.

Though the airbladder in fishes seem necessary for swimming, yet some are so formed as to swim without it. Cudworth.

AIRBUILT. adj. [from air and build.] Built in the air, without any solid foundation.

Hence the fool's paradise, the statesman's scheme,

The airbuilt castle, and the golden dream,
The maid's romantick wish, the chymist's flame,
And poet's vision of eternal fame.

Pope's Dunciad, b. iii.

AIR-DRAWN. adj. [from air and drawn.] Drawn or painted in air: a word not used.

This is the very painting of your fear,
This is the air-drawn dagger, which, you said,
Led you to Duncan. Shakespeare Macbeth.

AIRER. n. f. [from To air.] He that exposes to the air.

AIRHOLE. n. f. [from air and hole.] A hole to admit the air.

AIRINESS. n. f. [from airy.]

1. Openness; exposure to the air.

2. Lightness; gaiety; levity.

The French have indeed taken worthy pains to make classick learning speak their language; if they have not succeeded, it must be imputed to a certain talkativeness and airiness represented in their tongue, which will never agree with the sedateness of the Romans, or the solemnity of the Greeks. Felton.

AIRING. n. f. [from air.] A short journey or ramble to enjoy the free air.

This little fleet serves only to fetch them wine and corn, and to give their ladies an airing in the summer-season. Addison.

AIRLESS. adj. [from air.] Wanting communication with the free air.

Nor stony tower, nor walls of beaten brass,
Nor airless dungeon, nor strong links of iron,
Can be retentive to the strength of spirit.

Shakespeare J. Caesar.

AIRLING. n. f. [from air, for gayety.] A young, light, thoughtless, gay person.

Some more there be, slight airlings, will be won
With dogs and horses, and perhaps a whore.

B. Jonson.

AIRPUMP. n. f. [from air and pump.]

A machine by whose means the air is exhausted out of proper vessels. The principle on which it is built, is the elasticity of the air; as that on which which the waterpump is founded, is on the gravity of the air. The invention of this curious instrument is ascribed to Otto de Guericke, conful of Magdebourg, in 1654. But his machine laboured under several defects, the force necessary to work it was very great, and the progress very slow; it was to be kept under water, and allowed of no change of subjects for experiments. Mr. Boyle, with the assistance of Dr. Hooke, removed several inconveniences; though, still, the working was laborious, by reason of the pressure of the atmosphere at every exsuction. This labour has been since removed by Mr. Hawksbee; who, by adding a second barrel and piston, to rise as the other fell, and fall as it rose, made the pressure of the atmosphere on the descending one, of as much service as it was of disservice in the ascending one. Vream made a further improvement, by reducing the alternate motion of the hand and winch to a circular one. Chambers.

The air that, in exhausted receivers of air-pumps, is exhaled from minerals, and flesh, and fruits, and liquors, is as true and genuine as to elasticity and density, or rarefaction, as that we respire in; and yet this factitious air is so far from being fit to be breathed in, that it kills animals in a moment, even sooner than the absence of air, or a vacuum itself. Bentley.

AIRSHAF.T. n. f. [from air and shaft.] A passage for the air into mines and subterraneous places.

By the sinking of an airshaft, the air hath liberty to circulate, and carry out the steams both of the miners breath and the damps, which would otherwise stagnate there. Ray.

A'IRY. adj. [from air; aëreus, Lat.]

1. Composed of air.

The first is the transmission, or emission of the thinner and more airy parts of bodies: as, in odours and infections: and this is, of all the rest, the most corporeal. Bacon.

2. Relating to the air; belonging to the air.

There are fishes that have wings, that are no strangers to the airy region. Boyle.

3. High in air.

Whole rivers here forsake the fields below, And wond'ring at their height, through airy channels flow. Addison.

4. Open to the free air.

Joy'd to range abroad in fresh attire Thro' the wide compass of the airy coast. Spenser.

5. Light as air; thin; unsubstantial; without solidity.

I hold ambition of so airy and light a quality, that it is but a shadow's shadow. Shakespeare's Hamlet.

Still may the dog the wandering troops constrain

Of airy ghosts, and vex the guilty train. Dryden.

6. Wanting reality; having no steady foundation in truth or nature; vain; trifling.

Nor think with wind

Of airy threats to awe, whom yet with deeds Thou can't not. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Nor (to avoid such meanness) soaring high, With empty sound, and airy notions fly. Roscommon.

I have found a complaint concerning the scarcity of money, which occasioned many airy propositions for the remedy of it. Temple's Miscellanies.

7. Fluttering; loose; as if to catch the air; full of levity.

The painters draw their nymphs in thin and airy habits; but the weight of gold and of embroideries is reserved for queens and goddesses. Dryden.

By this name of ladies, he means all young persons, slender, finely shaped, airy, and delicate: such as are nymphs and Naiads. Dryden.

8. Gay; sprightly; full of mirth; vivacious; lively; spirited; light of heart.

He that is merry and airy at shore, when he sees a sad tempest on the sea, or dances when God thunders from heaven, regards not when God speaks to all the world. Taylor.

AISTE. n. f. [Thus the word is written by Addison, but perhaps improperly; since it seems deducible only from either aile, a wing, or a'leé, a path, and is therefore to be written aile.] The walks in a church, or wings of a quire.

The abbey is by no means so magnificent as one would expect from its endowments. The church is one huge nef, with a double aile to it; and, at each end, is a large quire. Addison.

AIR, or EYGH.T. n. f. [supposed, by Skinner, to be corrupted from ijet.] A small island in a river.

AJUTAGE. n. f. [ajutage, Fr.] An additional pipe to water-works. Di7.

TO AKE. v. n. [from agō, Gr. and therefore more grammatically written achō.]

1. To feel a lasting pain, generally of the internal parts; distinguished from smart, which is commonly used of uneasiness in the external parts; but this is no accurate account.

To sue, and be deny'd, such common grace. My wounds ake at you! Shakespeare.

Let our finger ake, and it endues Our other healthful members with a sense

Of pain. Shakespeare.

Were the pleasure of drinking accompanied, the very moment, with that sick stomach and aking head, which, in some men, are sure to follow, I think, no body would ever let wine touch his lips. Locke.

His limbs must ake, with daily toils oppress, Ere long with'd night brings necessary rest. Prior.

2. It is frequently applied, in an improper sense, to the heart; as, the heart akes; to imply grief or fear. Shakespeare has used it, still more licentiously, of the soul.

My soul akes

To know when two authorities are up, Neither supreme, how soon confusion

May enter. Shakespeare. Coriolanus.

Here shame dissuades him, there his fear prevails, And each, by turns, his aking heart affails. Addison.

AKIN. adj. [from a and kin.]

1. Related to; allied by blood: used of persons.

I do not envy thee, Pamela; only I wish, that, being thy sister in nature, I were not so far off akin in fortune. Sidney.

2. Allied to by nature; partaking of the same properties: used of things.

The cankered passion of envy is nothing akin to the silly envy of the ass. L'Estrange's Fables.

Some limbs again in bulk or stature Unlike, and not akin by nature,

In concert act, like modern friends. Because one serves the other's ends. Prior.

He separates it from questions with which it may have been complicated, and distinguishes it from questions which may be akin to it.

Watts's Improvement of the Mind.

AL, ATTLE, ADLE, do all seem to be corruptions of the Saxon Æpel, noble, famous; as also, Alling and Adding, are corruptions of Æpling, noble, splendid, famous.

Al, Ald, being initials, are derived from the Saxon Eald, ancient; and so, oftentimes, the initial all, being melted by the Normans, from the Saxon eald. Gibson's Camden.

ALABASTER. n. f. [alabaster.]

A kind of soft marble, easier to cut, and less durable, than the other kinds; some is white, which is most common; some of the colour of horn, and transparent; some yellow, like honey, marked with veins. The ancients used it to make boxes for perfumes. Savary.

Yet I'll not shed her blood, Nor fear that whiter skin of hers than snow, And smooth as monumental alabaster. Shakespeare.

ALABASTER, adj. Made of alabaster.

I cannot forbear mentioning part of an alabaster column, found in the ruins of Livia's portico.

It is of the colour of fire, that may be seen over the high altar of St. Maria in Campitello; for they have cut it into two pieces, and fixed it, in the shape of a cross, in a hole of the wall; so that the light passing through it, makes it look to those in the church, like a huge transparent cross of amber. Addison on Italy.

ALACK. interj. [This word seems only the corruption of alas.]

Alas; an expression of sorrow.

Alack! when once our grace we have forgot, Nothing goes right; we would, and we would not. Shakespeare. Measure for Measure.

At thunder now no more I start, Than at the rumbling of a cart:

Nay, what's incredible, alack! I hardly hear a woman's clack. Swift.

ALACKADAY. interj. [This, like the former, is for alas the day.] A word noting sorrow and melancholy.

ALACRIOUSLY. adv. [from alacris, supposed to be formed from alacris; but of alacris I have found no example.] Cheerfully; without dejection.

Epaminondas alacrisly expired, in confidence that he left behind him a perpetual memory of the victories he had achieved for his country. Government of the Tongue.

ALACRITY. n. f. [alacritas, Lat.] Cheerfulness, expressed by some outward token; sprightliness; gayety; liveliness; cheerful willingness.

These orders were, on all sides, yielded unto with no less alacrity of mind, than cities, unable to hold out any longer, are wont to shew when they take conditions, such as it liketh him to offer them, which hath them in the narrow straits of advantage. Hooker.

Give me a bowl of wine; I have not that alacrity of spirit,

Nor cheer of mind, that I was wont to have. Shakespeare.

He glad, that now his sea should find a shore, With fresh alacrity, and force renew'd, Springs upward. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Never did men more joyfully obey, Or sooner understood the sign to fly:

With such alacrity they bore away, As if, to praise them, all the states stood by. Dryden.

ALAMPRE. n. f. The lowest note but one in Guido Aretine's scale of music.

ALAMO'DE. adv. [à la mode, Fr.] According to the fashion: a low word. It is used likewise by shopkeepers for a kind of thin filken manufacture.

ALAND. adv. [from a for at, and land.] At land; landed; on the dry ground.

He only, with the prince his cousin, were cast aland, far off from the place whither their desires would have guided them. Sidney.

Three more, fierce Eurus, in his angry mood, Dash'd on the shallows of the moving sand, And, in mid ocean, left them moor'd aland. Dryden.

ALARM. n. f. [from the French, à l'arme, to arms; as, crier à l'arme, to call to arms.]

1. A cry by which men are summoned to their arms; as, at the approach of an enemy.

When the congregation is to be gathered together, you shall blow, but you shall not sound an alarm. Numbers.

God himself is with us for our captain, and his priests with founding trumpets, to cry alarms against you. Chron. xiii. 12.

The trumpets loud clangour Excites us to arms,

With shrill notes of anger, And mortal alarms. Dryden.

Taught by this stroke, renounce the wars alarms,

And learn to tremble at the name of arms. Pope's Iliad.

2. A cry, or notice, of any danger approaching; as, an alarm of fire.

3. Any tumult or disturbance.

Crowds of rivals, for thy mother's charms, Thy palace fill with insults and alarms. Pope's Odyssey.

TO ALARM. v. a. [from alarm, the noun.]

1. To call to arms.

2. To

2. To disturb; as, with the approach of an enemy.

The wasp the hive alarms
With louder hums, and with unequal arms.

1. To surprize with the apprehension of any danger.

When rage misguides me, or when fear alarms,
When pain distresses, or when pleasure charms.

2. To disturb in general.

His son, Cupavo, bruth'd the briny flood;
Upon his stern a brawny Centaur stood,
Who heav'd a rock, and threat'ning still to throw,
With lifted hands alarm'd the seas below.

ALARM-BELL. n. f. [from alarm and bell.] The bell that is rung at the approach of an enemy.

The alarm brings from our Alhambra walls,
And, from the streets, found drums and atabales.

ALARMING. particp. adj. [from alarm.] Terrifying; awakening; surprising; as, an alarming message; an alarming pain.

ALARM-POST. n. f. [from alarm and post.] The post or place appointed to each body of men to appear at, when an alarm shall happen.

ALARM. n. f. [corrupted, as it seems, from alarm. See ALARM.]

Now are our brows bound with victorious wreaths,

Our bruised arms hung up for monuments,
Our stern alarm chang'd to merry meetings.

That Almatro might better bear,
She sets a drum at either ear;
And loud or gentle, harsh or sweet,
Are but th' alarms which they bear.

ALARM. v. a. [corrupted from To alarm.] See ALARM.

Withered murder
(Alarm'd by his sentinel the wolf, Whose howl's his watch) thus with his stealthy pace

Moves like a ghost.

ALAS. interj. [Latin, Fr. excl., Dutch.]

1. A word expressing lamentation, when we are in pain.

But yet, alas! O but yet alas! our haps be but hard haps.

Alas! how little from the grave we claim?
Thou but prefer'st a form, and I a name.

2. A word of pity, when used of other persons.

Alas! poor Proteus, thou hast entertain'd
A fox to be the shepherd of thy lambs.

3. A word of sorrow and concern, when used of things.

Thus faith the Lord God, smite with thine hand, and stamp with thy foot, and say, Alas! for all the evil abominations of the house of Israel.

Alas! both for the deed, and for the cause!

Alas! for pity of this bloody field;
Piteous indeed must be, when I, a spirit,
Can have so soft a sense of human woes.

ALAS THE DAY. interj. Ah, unhappy day!

Alas the day! I never gave him cause.

Alas a day! you have ruined my poor mistress:
you have made a gap in her reputation; and can you blame her, if she make it up with her husband?

ALAS THE WHILE. interj. Ah! unhappy time!

All as the sheep, such was the shepherd's look;
For pale and wan he was, (alas the while!)

May seem he loved, or else some care he took.

ALAT. adv. [from a and late.] Late'y; no long time ago.

ALB. n. f. [Latin, Lat.] A surplice; a white linen vestment worn by priests.

ALB. adv. [a coalition of the words all and be.] It is so. Skimmer.] Although; notwithstanding; though it should be.

Ne would he suffer sleep once thitherward
Approach, alth his drowsy den was next.

ALB. adv. [from a and late.] Late'y; no long time ago.

ALB. n. f. [Latin, Lat.] A surplice; a white linen vestment worn by priests.

ALB. adv. [a coalition of the words all and be.] It is so. Skimmer.] Although; notwithstanding; though it should be.

Ne would he suffer sleep once thitherward
Approach, alth his drowsy den was next.

This very thing is cause sufficient, why duties belonging to each kind of virtue, alth the law of reason teach them, should, notwithstanding, be prescribed even by human law.

One whose eyes,
Alth it unuse to the melting mood,
Drop tears, as fast as the Arabian trees
Their medicinal gum.

He, who has a probable belief, that he shall meet with thieves in such a road, thinks himself to have reason enough to decline it, alth he is sure to sustain some loss, though yet considerable inconvenience by his so doing.

ALBUCA. adj. [Latin, Lat.] Resembling the white of an egg.

Eggs will freeze in the albuginous part thereof.

I opened it by incision, giving vent first to an albuginous, then to white concocted matter: upon which the tumour sunk.

ALBU. n. f. [Latin, Lat.] A disease in the eye, by which the cornea contracts a whiteness. The same with leucoma.

ALBURN COLOUR. n. f. See AUBURN.

ALCAHEST. n. f. An Arabick word, to express an universal dissolvent, pretended to by Paracelsus and Helmont.

ALCAID. n. f. [from al, Arab. and قائد, the head.]

1. In Barbary, the governor of a castle.

Shuns me, and, with a grim civility,
Bows, and declines my walks.

2. In Spain, the judge of a city, first instituted by the Saracens.

ALCA. n. f. An Egyptian plant used in dyeing; the leaves making a yellow, infused in water, and a red in acid liquors.

The root of alca, though green, will give a red stain.

ALCHYMICAL. adj. [from alchymy.] Relating to alchymy; produced by alchymy.

The rose-noble, then current for six shillings and eight-pence, the alchymists do affirm as an unwritten verity, was made by projection or multiplication alchymical of Raymond Lully in the tower of London.

ALCHYMICALLY. adv. [from alchymical.] In the manner of an alchymist; by means of alchymy.

Raymond Lully would prove it alchymically.

ALCHYMIST. n. f. [from alchymy.] One who pursues or professes the science of alchymy.

To solemnize this day, the glorious sun
Stays in his course, and plays the alchymist,
Turning, with splendour of his precious eye,
The meagre cloddy earth to glittering gold.

Every alchymist knows, that gold will endure a vehement fire for a long time without any change; and after it has been divided by corrosive liquors into invisible parts, yet may presently be precipitated, so as to appear in its own form.

ALCHYMY. n. f. [of al, Arab. and كيميا.] 1. The more sublime and occult part of chymistry, which proposes for its object, the transmutation of metals, and other important operations.

There is nothing more dangerous than this deluding art, which changeth the meaning of words, as alchymy doth, or would do, the substance of metals, maketh of any thing what it listeth, and bringeth in the end, all truth to nothing.

O he fits high in all the people's hearts;
And that which would appear offence in us,
His countenance, like richest alchymy,
Will change to virtue, and to worthiness.

Compared to this,
All honours mimic, all wealth alchymy is.

2. A kind of mixed metal used for spoons, and kitchen utensils.

White alchymy is made of pan-brass one pound, and arsenicum three ounces; or alchymy is made of copper and asurpimentum.

ALCOHOL. n. f. An Arabick term used by chymists for a high rectified dephlegmated spirit of wine, or for any thing reduced into an impalpable powder.

If the same salt shall be reduced into alcohol, as the chymists speak, or an impalpable powder, the particles and intercepted spaces will be extremely lessened.

Sal volatile oleosum will coagulate the serum on account of the alcohol, or rectified spirit which it contains.

ALCOHOLIZATION. n. f. [from alcoholize.] The act of alcoholizing or rectifying spirits; or of reducing bodies to an impalpable powder.

To ALCOHOLIZE. v. a. [from alcohol.] 1. To make an alcohol; that is, to rectify spirits till they are wholly dephlegmated.

2. To comminute powder till it is wholly without roughness.

ALCORAN. n. f. [al and koran, Arab.] The book of the Mahometan precepts, and credenda.

If this would satisfy the conscience, we might not only take the present covenant, but subscribe to the council of Trent; yea, and to the Turkish alcoran; and swear to maintain and defend either of them.

ALCOVE. n. f. [from al and coram, Span.] A recess, or part of a chamber, separated by an estrade, or partition, and other correspondent ornaments; in which is placed a bed of state, and sometimes seats to entertain company.

The weary'd champion lull'd in soft alcoves,
The noblest beast of thy romantick groves.
In dreams be hail'd by heroes' mighty shades,
And hear old Chaucer warble through the glades.

Deep in a rich alcove the prince was laid,
Ane slept beneath the pompous colonnade.

ALDER. n. f. [Latin, Lat.] A tree having leaves resembling those of the hazel; the male flowers, or katkins, are produced at remote distances from the fruit, on the same tree; the fruit is squamose, and of a conical figure. The species are; 1. The common or round-leaved alder. 2. The long-leaved alder. 3. The scarlet alder. These trees delight in a very moist soil. The wood is used by turners, and will endure long under ground, or in water.

Without the grot, a various silver scene
Appeared around, and groves of living green;
Poplars and alders ever quivering play'd,
And nodding cypress form'd a fragrant shade.

ALDERLIEVE. adj. superl. [from al, Arab. and lieve, dear, beloved.] Most beloved; which has held the longest possession of the heart.

The mutual conference that my mind hath had,
In courtly company, or at my beads,
With you, mine alderlievest sovereign;
Makes me the bolder.

ALDERMAN. n. f. [from al, Arab. and man.] 1. The name as senator, Cornell. A governor or magistrate, originally, as the name imports, chosen on account of the experience which his age had given him.

Tell him, myself, the mayor, and aldermen,
Are come to have some conference with his grace.

Though my own aldermen conferr'd my bays,
To me committing their eternal praise;
Their full-fed heroes, their pacific mayors,
Their annual trophies, and their monthly wars.

2. In the following passage it is, I think, improperly used.

But if the trumpet's clangour you abhor,
And dare not be an alderman of war,
Take to a shop, behind a counter lie.

A L E

A'LDERMANLY. adv. [from alderman.] Like an alderman; belonging to an alderman.

These, and many more, suffered death, in envy to their virtues and superiour genius, which emboldened them, in exigencies (wanting an aldermanly discretion) to attempt service out of the common forms. Swift's Miscellanies.

A'LDERN. adj. [from alder.] Made of alder. Then alder boats first plow'd the ocean. May's Virgil.

A'LE. n. f. [eale, Sax.]

1. A liquor made by infusing malt in hot water, and then fermenting the liquor.

You must be seeing christenings. Do you look for ale and cakes here, you rude rascals? Shakespeare's Henry VIII.

The fertility of the soil in grain, and its being not proper for vines, put the Egyptians upon drinking ale, of which they were the inventors. Arbutnot.

2. A merry meeting up in country places.

And all the neighbourhood, from old records Of antick proverbs drawn from Whitson lords, And their authorities at wakes and ales, With country precedents, and old wives tales, We bring you now. Ben Jonson.

A'LEBERRY. n. f. [from ale and berry.] A beverage made by boiling ale with spice and sugar, and fops of bread: a word now only used in conversation.

Their aleberries, cawdles, poffets, each one, Syllibubs made at the milking pale, But what are composed of a pot of good ale. Beaumont.

A'LE-BREWER. n. f. [from ale and brewer.] One that professes to brew ale.

The summer-made malt brews ill, and is disliked by most of our ale-brewers. Mortimer's Husbandry.

A'LECONNER. n. f. [from ale and con.] An officer in the city of London, whose business is to inspect the measures of publick houses. Four of them are chosen or rechosen annually by the common-hall of the city; and whatever might be their use formerly, their places are now regarded only as sinecures for decayed citizens.

A'LECAST. n. f. [perhaps from ale and castus, Lat.] The name of an herb. Diſt.

A'LECTRYOMANCY. OR A'LECTOROMANCY. n. f. [αλεκτρων and uanſis.] Divination by a cock. Diſt.

A'LEGAR. n. f. [from ale and eager, four.] Sour ale; a kind of acid made by ale, as vinegar by wine, which has lost its spirit.

A'LEGER. adj. [alligre, Fr. alacris, Lat.] Gay; cheerful; sprightly: a word not now used.

Coffee, the root and leaf betle, and leaf tobacco, of which the Turks are great takers, do all condense the spirits, and make them strong and aleger. Bacon's Natural History.

A'LEHOOF. n. f. [from ale and hoof, head.] Groundivy, so called by our Saxon ancestors, as being their chief ingredient in ale. An herb.

Alehoof, or groundivy, is, in my opinion, of the most excellent and most general use and virtue, of any plants we have among us. Temple.

A'LEHOUSE. n. f. [from ale and house.] A house where ale is publickly sold; a tipling-house. It is distinguished from a tavern, where they sell wine.

Thou most beauteous inn, Why should hard-favour'd grief be lodg'd in thee, When triumph is become an alehouse guest? Shakespeare.

One would think it should be no easy matter to bring any man of sense in love with an alehouse; indeed of so much sense as seeing and smelling amounts to; there being such strong encounters of both, as would quickly send him packing, did not the love of good fellowship reconcile to these nuisances. South.

These shall each alehouse, these each gilhouse mourn,

And answering ginshops sower sighs return. Pope.

A'LEHOUSE-KEEPER. n. f. [from alehouse and keeper.] He that keeps ale publickly to sell.

You resemble perfectly the two alehouse-keepers in Holland, who were at the same time burgo-masters of the town, and taxed one another's bills alternately. Letter to Swift.

A'LEKNIGHT. n. f. [from ale and knight.] A pot-companion; a tippler; a word now out of use.

The old aleknights of England were well de-painted by Hanville, in the alehouse-colours of that time. C Camden.

A'LEMBICK. n. f. A vessel used in distilling, consisting of a vessel placed over a fire, in which is contained the substance to be distilled, and a concave closely fitted on, into which the fumes arise by the heat; this cover has a beak or spout, into which the vapours rise, and by which they pass into a serpentine pipe, which is kept cool by making many convolutions in a tub of water; here the vapours are condensed, and what entered the pipe in fumes, comes out in drops.

Though water may be rarefied into invisible vapours, yet it is not changed into air, but only scattered into minute parts; which meeting together in the alembick, or in the receiver, do presently return into such water as they constituted before. Boyle.

A'LENGTH. adv. [from a for at, and length.] At full length; along; stretched along the ground.

A'LEERT. adj. [alerte, Fr. perhaps from alacris, but probably from a lart, according to art or rule.]

1. In the military sense, on guard; watchful; vigilant; ready at a call.

2. In the common sense, brisk; pert; petulant; smart; implying some degree of censure and contempt.

I saw an aleert young fellow, that cocked his hat upon a friend of his, and accosted him: Well, Jack, the old prig is dead at last. Addis. Spectator.

A'LEERTNESS. n. f. [from aleert.] The quality of being alert; sprightliness; pertness.

That aleertness and unconcern for matters of common life, a campaign or two would infallibly have given him. Addis. Spectator.

A'LETASTER. n. f. [from ale and taster.] An officer appointed in every courtleet, and sworn to look to the assize and the goodness of bread and ale, or beer, within the precincts of that lordship. Cowell.

A'LEVAT. n. f. [from ale and vat.] The tub in which the ale is fermented.

A'LEW. n. f. Clamour; outcry. Not in use. Spenser.

A'LEWASHED. adj. [from ale and wash.] Steeped or soaked in ale: not now in use.

What a beard of the general's cut, and a horrid suit of the camp, will do among foaming battles and alewashed wits, is wonderful to be thought on. Shakespeare.

A'LEWIFE. n. f. [from ale and wife.] A woman that keeps an alehouse.

Perhaps he will swagger and hector, and threaten to beat and butcher an alewife, or take the goods by force, and throw them the bad halfpence. Swift's Draper's Let.

A'LEXANDERS. n. f. [synonymus, Lat.] The name of a plant.

A'LEXANDER'S-FOOT. n. f. The name of an herb.

ALEXANDRINE. n. f. A kind of verse borrowed from the French, first used in a poem called Alexander. They consist, among the French, of twelve and thirteen syllables, in alternate couplets; and, among us, of twelve.

Our numbers should, for the most part, be lyrical. For variety, or rather where the majesty of thought requires it, they may be stretched to the English heroic of five feet, and to the French Alexandrine of six. Dryden.

Then, at the last, an only couplet fraught With some unmeaning thing they call a thought, A needless Alexandrine ends the song, That, like a wounded snake, drags its flow length along. Pope's Essay on Criticism.

ALEXIPHARMICK. adj. [from αλεξω and φαρμακον.] That which drives away poison; antidotal; that which opposes infection.

A L E

Some antidotal quality it may have, since not only the bone in the heart, but the horn of a deer is alexipharmick. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ALEXITERICAL, OR ALEXITERICK. adj. [from αλεξω.] That which drives away poison; that which resists fevers.

A'LGATES. adv. [from all and gate. Skinner. Gate is the same as via; and still used for way in the Scottish dialect.] On any terms; every way: now obsolete.

Nor had the boaster ever risen more, But that Renaldo's horse ev'n then down fell, And with the fall his leg oppress'd to fore, That, for a space, there must he algates dwell. Fairfax.

A'LGEBRA. n. f. [an Arabic word of uncertain etymology; derived, by some, from Geber the philosopher; by some, from gefr, parchment; by others, from algebra, a bonefetter; by Menage, from algi, barat, the restitution of things broken.]

This is a peculiar kind of arithmetick, which takes the quantity sought, whether it be a number or a line, or any other quantity, as if it were granted, and, by means of one or more quantities given, proceeds by consequence, till the quantity at first only supposed to be known, or at least some power thereof, is found to be equal to some quantity or quantities which are known, and consequently itself is known. This art was in use among the Arabs, long before it came into this part of the world; and they are supposed to have borrowed it from the Persians, and the Persians from the Indians. The first Greek author of algebra was Diophantus, who, about the year 800, wrote thirteen books. In 1494, Lucas Pacciolus, or Lucas de-Burgos, a cordelier, printed a treatise of algebra, in Italian, at Venice. He says, that algebra came originally from the Arabs. After several improvements by Vieta, Oughtred, Harriot, Descartes, Sir Isaac Newton brought this art to the height at which it still continues. Trevoux. Chambers.

It would surely require no very profound skill in algebra, to reduce the difference of ninepence in thirty shillings. Swift.

ALGEBRA'ICK. } adj. [from algebra.]

1. Relating to algebra; as, an algebraical treatise.

2. Containing operations of algebra; as, an algebraical computation.

ALGEBRA'IST. n. f. [from algebra.] A person that understands or practises the science of algebra.

When any dead body is found in England, no algebraist or uncipherer can use more subtle suppositions, to find the demonstration or cipher, than every unconcerned person doth to find the murderers. Grant's Bills of Mortality.

Confining themselves to the synthetick and analytick methods of geometricians and algebraists, they have too much narrowed the rules of method, as though every thing were to be treated in mathematical forms. Watts's Logic.

A'LGID. adj. [algidus, Lat.] Cold; chill. Diſt.

ALGIDITY. } n. f. [from algid.] Chills; cold. Diſt.

ALGIDNESS. } n. f. [from algid.] Chills; cold. Diſt.

ALGIFIC. adj. [from algor, Lat.] That which produces cold. Diſt.

A'LGOR. n. f. [Lat.] Extreme cold; chills. Diſt.

A'LGORISM. } n. f. Arabick words, which A'LGORITHM. } are used to imply the six operations of arithmetick, or the science of numbers. Diſt.

ALGO'SE. adj. [from algor, Lat.] Extremely cold; chill. Diſt.

ALLIAS. adv. A Latin word, signifying otherwise; often used in the trials of criminals, whose danger has obliged them to change their names; as, Simson, alias Smith, alias Baker; that is, otherwise Smith, otherwise Baker.

A'LIBLE. adj. [alibilis, Lat.] Nutritive; nourishing; or that which may be nourished. Diſt.

A'LIEN. adj. [alienus, Lat.]

VOL. I. N^o. 3. H 1. Foreign

AL I

1. Foreign, or not of the same family or land. The mother plant admires the leaves unknown Of alien trees, and apples not her own. Dryden.

From native soil
Exil'd by fate, torn from the tender embrace
Of his young guiltless progeny, he seeks Inglorious shelter in an alien land. Philips.

2. Estranged from; not allied to; adverse to; with the particle from, and sometimes to, but improperly.

To declare my mind to the disciples of the fire,
by a similitude not alien from their profession. Boyle.

The sentiment that arises, is a conviction of the deplorable state of nature, to which sin reduced us; a weak, ignorant creature, alien from God and goodness, and a prey to the great destroyer. Rogers's Sermons.

They encouraged persons and principles, alien from our religion and government, in order to strengthen their faction. Swift's Miscellanies.

ALIEN. n. f. [alienus, Lat.]
1. A foreigner; not a denison; a man of another country or family; one not allied; a stranger.

In whomsoever these things are, the church doth acknowledge them for her children; them only she holdeth for aliens and strangers, in whom these things are not found. Hooker.

If it be prov'd against an alien,
He seeks the life of any citizen,
The party, 'gainst the which he doth contrive,
Shall seize on half his goods. Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.

The mere Irish were not only accounted aliens, but enemies, so as it was no capital offence to kill them. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

Thy place in council thou hast rudely lost,
Which by thy younger brother is supply'd,
And art almost an alien to the hearts
Of all the court and princes of my blood. Shakespeare.

The lawgiver condemn'd the persons, who sat idle in divisions dangerous to the government, as aliens to the community, and therefore to be cut off from it. Addison, Freeholder.

2. In law.
An alien is one born in a strange country, and never enfranchised. A man born out of the land, so it be within the limits beyond the seas, or of English parents, out of the king's obedience, so the parents, at the time of the birth, be of the king's obedience, is not alien. If one born out of the king's allegiance, come and dwell in England, his children (if he beget any here) are not aliens, but denisons. Cowell.

To ALIEN. v. a. [alienar, Fr. alieno, Lat.]
1. To make any thing the property of another. If the son alien lands, and then repurchase them again in fee, the rules of descents are to be observed, as if he were the original purchaser. Hale's History of Common Law.

2. To estrange; to turn the mind or affection; to make averse: with from.

The king was disquieted, when he found, that the prince was totally aliened from all thoughts of, or inclination to, the marriage. Clarendon.

ALIENABLE. adj. [from To alienate.] That of which the property may be transferred.

Land is alienable, and treasure is transitory, and both must pass from him, by his own voluntary act, or by the violence of others, or at least by fate. Dennis's Letters.

To ALIENATE. v. a. [alienar, Fr. alieno, Lat.]
1. To transfer the property of any thing to another.

The countries of the Turks were once Christian, and members of the church, and where the golden candlesticks did stand, though now they be utterly alienated, and no Christians left. Bacon.

2. To withdraw the heart or affections: with the particle from, where the first possessor is mentioned.

The manner of men's writing must not alienate our hearts from the truth. Hooker.

Be it never so true which we teach the world to believe, yet if once their affections begin to be alienated, a small thing persuadeth them to change their opinions. Hooker.

His eyes survey'd the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah. Milton's Paradise Lost.
Any thing that is apt to disturb the world, and to alienate the affections of men from one another, such as crofs and distasteful humours, is, either expressly, or by clear consequence and deduction, forbidden in the New Testament. Tillotson.

Her mind was quite alienated from the honest Castilian, whom she was taught to look upon as a formal old fellow. Addison, Spectator.

ALIENATE. adj. [alienatus, Lat.] Withdrawn from; stranger to: with the particle from.

The Whigs are damnably wicked; impatient for the death of the queen; ready to gratify their ambition and revenge by all desperate methods; wholly alienated from truth, law, religion, mercy, conscience, or honour. Swift's Miscellanies.

ALIENATION. n. f. [alienatio, Lat.]
1. The act of transferring property.

This ordinance was for the maintenance of their lands in their posterity, and for excluding all innovation or alienation thereof unto strangers. Spenser's State of Ireland.

God put it into the heart of one of our princes, to give a check to sacrilege. Her successor passed a law, which prevented all future alienations of the church revenues. Atterbury.

Great changes and alienations of property, have created new and great dependencies. Swift on Athens and Rome.

2. The state of being alienated; as, the state was wasted during its alienation.

3. Change of affection.
It is left but in dark memory, what was the ground of his defection, and the alienation of his heart from the king. Bacon.

4. Applied to the mind, it means disorder of the faculties.

Some things are done by man, though not through outward force and impulsion, though not against, yet without their wills; as in alienation of mind, or any like inevitable utter absence of wit and judgment. Hooker.

ALIFEROUS. adj. [from ala and fero, Lat.] Having wings.

ALIGEROUS. adj. [aliger, Lat.] Having wings; winged. Dict.

To ALIGGE. v. a. [from a and lig, to lie down.] To lay; to allay; to throw down; to subdue: an old word even in the time of Spenser, now wholly forgotten.

Thomalin, why sitten we fo,
As weren overwent with woe:

Upon so fair a morrow,
The joyous time now nigheth fast,
That shall aligge this bitter blait,
And flake the winter forrow. Spens. Past.

To ALIGHT. v. n. [alihan, Sax. af-lithen, Dutch.]

1. To come down and stop. The word implies the idea of descending; as, of a bird from the wing; a traveller from his horse or carriage, and generally of resting or stopping.

There ancient night arriving, did alight
From her high weary waine. Fairy Queen.

There is alighted at your gate
A young Venetian. Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.

Slackness breeds worms; but the sure traveller,

Though he alights sometimes, still goeth on. Herb.

When marching with his foot he walks till night;

When with his horse he never will alight. Denb.

When Dedalus, to fly the Cretan shore,
His heavy limbs on jointed pinions bore;

To the Cumean coast at length he came,
And here alighting built this costly frame. Dryden's Æneid.

When he was admonished by his subject to descend, he came down gently and circling in the air, and singing to the ground. Like a lark, melodious in her mounting, and continuing her song till she alights; still preparing for a higher flight at her next fall. Dryden.

When finish'd was the fight,
The victors from their lusty steeds alight;
Like them dismounted all the warlike train. Dryden.

Should a spirit of superiour rank, a stranger to human nature, alight upon the earth, what would his notions of us be? Addison, Spectator.

2. It is used also of any thing thrown or falling; to fall upon.

But storms of stones from the proud temple's height,
Pour down, and on our batter'd helms alight. Dryden.

ALIKE. adv. [from a and like.] With resemblance; without difference; in the same manner; in the same form. In some expressions it has the appearance of an adjective, but is always an adverb.

The darkness hideth not from thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to thee. Psalms cxxxix. 12.

With thee conversing I forget all time;
All seasons, and their change, all please alike. Paradise Lost.

Riches cannot rescue from the grave,
Which claims alike the monarch and the slave. Dryden.

Let us unite at least in an equal zeal for those capital doctrines, which we all equally embrace, and are alike concerned to maintain. Atterbury.

Two handmaids wait the throne: alike in place,
But diff'ring far in figure and in face. Pope.

ALIMENT. n. f. [alimentum, Lat.] Nourishment; that which nourishes; nutriment; food.

New parts are added to our substance; and as we die, we are born daily; nor can we give an account, how the aliment is prepared for nutrition, or by what mechanism it is distributed. Glazville's Sceptis Scientifica.

All bodies which, by the animal faculties, can be changed into the fluids and solids of our bodies, are called aliments. In the largest sense, by aliment, I understand every thing which a human creature takes in common diet; as, meat, drink; and seasoning, as salt, spice, vinegar. Arbutnot.

ALIMENTAL. adj. [from aliment.] That which has the quality of aliment; that which nourishes; that which feeds.

The sun, that light imparts to all, receives
From all his alimental recompense,
In humid exhalations. Milton's Paradise Lost.

Except they be watered from higher regions, these weeds must lose their alimental sap, and wither. Brown.

Th' industrious, when the sun in Leo rides,
Forget not, at the foot of every plant,
To sink a circling trench, and daily pour
A just supply of alimental streams,
Exhausted sap recruiting. Philips.

ALIMENTALLY. adv. [from alimental.] So as to serve for nourishment.

The substance of gold is invincible by the powerfulest heat, and that not only alimentally in a substantial mutation, but also medicamentally in any corporeal conversion. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ALIMENTARINESS. n. f. [from alimentary.] The quality of being alimentary; or of affording nourishment. Dict.

ALIMENTARY. adj. [from aliment.]

1. That which belongs or relates to aliment.

The solution of the aliment by mastication is necessary; without it, the aliment could not be disposed for the changes which it receives as it passeth through the alimentary duct. Arbutnot on Aliments.

2. That which has the quality of aliment, or the power of nourishing.

I do not think that water supplies animals, or even plants, with nourishment, but serves for a vehicle to the alimentary particles, to convey and distribute them to the several parts of the body. Ray on the Creation.

Of alimentary roots, some are pulpy and very nutritious; as, turnips and carrots. These have a fattening quality. Arbutnot on Aliments.

ALIMETA-

ALK

ALIMENTA'TION. n. f. [from aliment.]

1. The power of affording aliment; the quality of nourishing.

2. The state of being nourished by assimilation of matter received.

Plants do nourish; inanimate bodies do not: they have an accretion, but no alimentation.

Bacon's Natural History.

ALIMONIOUS. adj. [from alimony.] That which nourishes: a word very little in use.

The plethora renders us lean, by suppressing our spirits, whereby they are incapacitated of digesting the alimonious humours into flesh.

Harvey on Consumptions.

ALIMONY. n. f. [alimonia, Lat.]

Alimony signifies that legal proportion of the husband's estate, which, by the sentence of the ecclesiastical court, is allowed to the wife for her maintenance, upon the account of any separation from him, provided it be not caused by her elopement or adultery.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

Before they fettled hands and hearts,

Till Alimony or death them parts.

Hudibras.

ALIVANT. adj. [aliquantus, Lat.] Parts of a number, which, however repeated, will never make up the number exactly; as, 3 is an aliquant of 10, thrice 3 being 9, four times 3 making 12.

ALIVOT. adj. [aliquot, Lat.] Aliquot parts of any number or quantity, such as will exactly measure it without any remainder: as, 3 is an aliquot part of 12, because, being taken four times, it will just measure it.

ALISH. adj. [from ale.] Resembling ale; having qualities of ale.

Stirring it and beating down the yeast, gives it the sweet alish taste.

Mortimer's Husbandry.

ALITURE. n. f. [alitura, Lat.] Nourishment.

Dict.

ALIVE. adj. [from a and live.]

1. In the state of life; not dead.

Nor well alive, nor wholly dead they were, But some faint signs of feeble life appear.

Dry.

Not youthful kings in battle seiz'd alive, Nor scornful virgins who their charms survive.

Pope.

2. In a figurative sense, unextinguished; undestroyed; active; in full force.

Those good and learned men had reason to wish, that their proceedings might be favoured, and the good affection of such as inclined towards them, kept alive.

Hooker.

3. Cheerful; sprightly; full of alacrity.

She was not so much alive the whole day, if she slept more than six hours.

Clarissa.

4. In a popular sense, it is used only to add an emphasis, like the French du monde; as, the best man alive; that is, the best, with an emphasis. This sense has been long in use, and was once admitted into serious writings, but is now merely ludicrous.

And to those brethren said, rise, rise by-live, And unto battle do yourselves address; For yonder comes the prowdest knight alive, Prince Arthur, flower of grace and nobleness.

Fairy Queen.

The earl of Northumberland, who was the proudest man alive, could not look upon the destruction of monarchy with any pleasure.

Clarendon.

John was quick and understood business, but no man alive was more careless in looking into his accounts.

Arbutnot.

ALKAHEST. n. f. A word used first by Paracelsus, and adopted by his followers, to signify an universal dissolvent, or liquor, which has the power of resolving all things into their first principles.

ALKALES'CENT. adj. [from alkali.] That which has a tendency to the properties of an alkali.

All animal diet is alkalescent or anti-acid.

Arbutnot.

ALKALI. n. f. [The word alkali comes from an herb, called by the Egyptians kali; by us glasswort. This herb they burnt to ashes, boiled them in water, and, after having evaporated the water, there remained at the bottom a white salt; thus they called sal kali, or alkali. It is corrosive, producing putrefaction in animal substances, to which it is applied.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

Any substance, which, when mingled with acid, produces effervescence and fermentation.

AL'CKALINE. adj. [from alkali.] That which has the qualities of alkali.

Any watery liquor will keep an animal from starving very long, by diluting the fluids, and consequently keeping them from an alkaline state. People have lived twenty-four days upon nothing but water.

Arbutnot.

To ALKA'LIZATE. v. a. [from alkali.] To make bodies alkaline, by changing their nature, or by mixing alkalies with them.

ALKA'LIZATE. adj. [from alkali.] That which has the qualities of alkali; that which is impregnated with alkali.

The odour of the fixed nitre is very languid; but that, which it discovers, being dissolved in hot water, is different, being of kin to that of other alkalizable salts.

Boyle.

The colour of violets in their syrup, by acid liquors, turns red, and, by urinous and alkalizable, turns green.

Newton.

ALKALIZA'TION. n. f. [from alkali.] The act of alkalizing, or impregnating bodies with alkali.

AL'KANET. n. f. [Anchusa, Lat.] The name of a plant.

This plant is a species of bugloss, with a red root, brought from the southern parts of France, and used in medicine.

Millar.

ALKEKE'NGI. n. f. A medicinal fruit or berry, produced by a plant of the same denomination; popularly also called winter-cherry: the plant bears a near resemblance to Solanum, or Nightshade; whence it is frequently called in Latin by that name, with the addition or epithet of vesicarium.

Chambers.

ALKE'RMES. n. f. In medicine, a term borrowed from the Arabs, denoting a celebrated remedy, of the consistence of a confection; whereof the kermes berries are the basis. The other ingredients are pippin-cyder, rose-water, sugar, ambergrease, musk, cinnamon, aloes-wood, pearls, and leaf-gold; but the sweets are usually omitted. The confectio alkermes is chiefly made at Montpellier. The grain, which gives it the denomination, is no where found so plentifully as there.

Chambers.

Shaksp.peare.

ALL

The Saxons could call a comet a faxed star, which is all one with stella cincta, or cometa.

Camden's Remains.

For a large conscience is all one, And signifies the same with none.

Hudibras.

Balm, from a silver box distill'd around, Shall all bedew the roots, and scent the sacred ground.

Dryden.

I do not remember he any where mentions expressly the title of the first-born, but all along keeps himself under the shelter of the indefinite term, heir.

Locke.

Justice may be furnished out of fire, as far as her sword goes; and courage may be all over a continued blaze.

Addison.

If e'er the miser durst his farthings spare, He thinly spreads them through the public square, Where, all, beside the rail, rang'd beggars lie, And from each other catch the doleful cry.

Gay.

2. Altogether; wholly; without any other consideration.

I am of the temper of most kings who love to be in debt, are all for present money, no matter how they pay it afterward.

Dryden.

3. Only; without admission of any thing else.

When I shall wed,

That lord, whose hand must take my plight, shall carry

Half my love with him, half my care and duty. Sure I shall never marry, like my sister, Shaksp. K. Lear.

To love my father all.

4. Although. This sense is truly Teutonic, But now obsolete.

Do you not think th' accomplishment of it Sufficient work for one man's simple head, All were it as the rest but simply writ.

Spenser.

5. It is sometimes a word of emphasis; nearly the same with just.

A shepherd's swain, say, did thee bring, All as his straying flock he fed;

And, when his honour hath thee read, Crave pardon for thy hardy head.

Spens, Pastoral.

6. It was anciently in English what it is now in the other Teutonic dialects, a particle of mere enforcement.

He thought them six-pence all too dear.

Song in Shaksp.

Tell us what occasion of import Hath all so long detain'd you from your wife.

Shaksp.peare.

ALL. n. f.

1. The whole; opposed to part, or nothing. And will she yet debase her eyes on me;

On me, whose all not equals Edward's moiety?

Shaksp.peare.

Nought's had, all's spent, Where our desire is got without content.

Shaksp. Macbeth.

The youth shall study, and no more engage Their flatt'ring wishes for uncertain age;

No more with fruitless care, and cheated strife, Chase fleeting pleasure through the maze of life;

Finding the wretched all they here can have, But present food, and but a future grave.

Prior.

Our all is at stake, and irretrievably lost, if we fail of success.

Addison.

2. Every thing.

Then shall we be news-cramm'd.—All the better; we shall be the more remarkable.

Shaksp.

Up with my tent, here will I lie to-night; But where to-morrow?—Well, all's one for that.

Shaksp.peare.

All the fitter, Lentulus: our coming Is not for salutation; we have bus'ness.

Ben Jonson.

3. That is, every thing is the better, the same, the fitter.

Sceptre and pow'r, thy giving, I assume; And glad her shall resign, when in the end Thou shalt be all in all; and I in thee,

For ever; and in me all whom thou lov'st.

Milton.

They that do not keep up this indifference for all but truth, put coloured spectacles before their eyes, and look through false glasses.

Locke.

4. The phrase and all is of the same kind.

H 2 They

ALL

They all fell to work at the roots of the tree, and left it so little foothold, that the first blast of wind laid it flat upon the ground, nest, eagles, and all. L'Estrange.

A torch, snuff and all, goes out in a moment, then dipped in the vapour.

Addison's Remarks on Italy.

5. All is much used in composition; but, in most instances, it is merely arbitrary; as, all-commanding. Sometimes the words compounded with it, are fixed and classical; as, Almighty. When it is connected with a participle, it seems to be a noun; as, all-surrounding; in other cases an adverb; as, all-accomplished, or completely accomplished. Of these compounds, a small part of those which may be found is inserted.

ALL-BEARING. adj. [from all and bear.] That which bears every thing; omniparous.

Thus while he spoke, the sovereign plant he drew,
Where on th' all-bearing earth unmark'd it grew.

ALL-CHEERING. adj. [from all and cheer.] That which gives gayety and cheerfulness to all.

Soon as the all-cheering fun
Should, in the farthest east, begin to draw
The shady curtains from Aurora's bed. Shaksp.

ALL-COMMANDING. adj. [from all and command.] Having the sovereignty over all.

He now sets before them the high and shining idol of glory, the all-commanding image of bright gold. Raleigh.

ALL-COMPOSING. adj. [from all and compose.] That which quiets all men, or every thing.

Wrapt in embow'ring shades, Ulysses lies,
His woes forgot! but Pallas now address'd,
To break the bands of all-composing rest. Pope.

ALL-CONQUERING. adj. [from all and conquer.] That which subdues every thing.

Second of Satan sprung, all-conquering death!
What think'st thou of our empire now? Milton.

ALL-CONSUMING. adj. [from all and consume.] That which consumes every thing.

By age unbroke—but all-consuming care
Destroys perhaps the strength, that time would spare. Pope.

ALL-DEVOURING. adj. [from all and devour.] That which eats up every thing.

Secure from flames, from envy's fiercer rage,
Destructive war, and all-devouring age. Pope.

ALL-FOURS. n. f. [from all and four.] A low game at cards, played by two; so named from the four particulars by which it is reckoned, and which, joined in the hand of either of the parties, are said to make all-fours.

ALL HAIL. n. f. [from all and bail, for health.] All health. This is therefore not a compound, though perhaps usually reckoned among them; a term of salutation. Salve or salvete.

All hail, ye fields, where constant peace attends!
All hail, ye sacred, solitary groves!

All hail, ye books, my true, my real friends,
Whose conversation pleases and improves! Walsh.

ALL HALLOW. } n. f. [from all and hallow.]
ALL HALLOWS. } All saints day; the first of November.

ALL-HALLOWN. adj. [from all and hallow, to make holy.] The time about All saints day.

Farewell, thou latter spring! farewell,
All-hallown summer. Shaksp. Henry IV.

ALLHALLOWTIDE. n. f. [See ALL-HALLOWN.] The term near All saints, or the first of November.

Cut off the bough about Allhallowtide, in the bare place, and set it in the ground, and it will grow to be a fair tree in one year.

Bacon's Natural History.

ALL-HEAL. n. f. [Panax, Lat.] A species of ironwort; which see.

ALL-JUDGING. adj. [from all and judge.] That which has the sovereign right of judgment.

I look with horror back,
That I detest my wretched self, and curse
My past polluted life. All-judging Heav'n,
Who knows my crimes, has seen my sorrow for them. Rowe's Jane Shore.

ALL

ALL-KNOWING. adj. [from all and know.] Omniscient; all-wise.

Shall we repine at a little misplaced charity, we, who could no way foresee the effect; when an all-knowing, all-wise Being, showers down every day his benefits on the unthankful and undeserving? Atterbury's Sermons.

ALL-MAKING. adj. [from all and make.] That created all; omnifick. [See ALL-SEEING.]

ALL-POWERFUL. adj. [from all and powerful.] Almighty; omnipotent; possessed of infinite power.

O all-powerful Being! the least motion of whose will can create or destroy a world; pity us, the mournful friends of thy distressed servant. Swift.

ALL SAINTS DAY. n. f. The day on which there is a general celebration of the saints. The first of November.

ALL-SEER. n. f. [from all and see.] He that sees or beholds every thing; he whose view comprehends all things.

That high All-seer, which I dallied with,
Hath turn'd my feigned prayer on my head,
And giv'n in earnest, what I begged in jest. Shak.

ALL-SEEING. adj. [from all and see.] That beholds every thing.

The same First Mover certain bounds has plac'd,
How long those perishable forms shall last;
Nor can they last beyond the time assign'd
By that all-seeing and all-making mind. Dryden.

ALL SOULS DAY. n. f. The day on which supplications are made for all souls by the church of Rome; the second of November.

This is all souls day, fellows, is it not?—
It is, my lord.—
Why then, all souls day is my body's doomday. Shaksp. Hamlet.

ALL-SUFFICIENT. adj. [from all and sufficient.] Sufficient to every thing.

The testimonies of God are perfect, the testimonies of God are all-sufficient unto that end for which they were given. Hooker.

He can more than employ all our powers in their utmost elevation; for he is every way perfect and all-sufficient. Norris.

ALL-WISE. adj. [from all and wise.] Possess of infinite wisdom.

There is an infinite, eternal, all-wise mind governing the affairs of the world. South.

Supreme, all-wise, eternal, potentate!
Sole author, sole disposer of our fate! Prior.

ALLANTOIS, or ALLANTOIDES. n. f. [from allant, a gut, and oides, shape.] The urinary tunick placed between the amnion and chorion, which, by the navel and urachus, or passage by which the urine is conveyed from the infant in the womb, receives the urine that comes out of the bladder. Quincy.

To ALLAY. v. a. [from alloyer, Fr. to mix one metal with another in order to coinage; it is therefore derived by some from à la loi, according to law; the quantity of metals being mixed according to law; by others, from allier, to unite; perhaps from allocare, to put together.]

1. To mix one metal with another, to make it fitter for coinage. In this sense, most authors preserve the original French orthography, and write alloy. See ALLOY.

2. To join any thing to another, so as to abate its predominant qualities. It is used commonly in a sense contrary to its original meaning, and is, to make something bad, less bad. To obtrude; to repress; to abate.

Being brought into the open air,
Of that fell poison, Shaksp. Hamlet.

No friendly offices shall alter or allay that rancour, that frets in some hellish breasts, which, upon all occasions, will foam out at its foul mouth in slander and invective. South.

3. To quiet; to pacify; to repress. The word, in this sense, I think not to be derived from the French alloyer, but to be the English word lay, with a before it, according to the old form.

If by your art, you have Put the wild waters in this roar, allay them. Shaksp. Hamlet.

ALL

ALLAY. n. f. [alloy, Fr.]

1. The metal of a baser kind mixed in coins, to harden them, that they may wear less. Gold is allayed with silver and copper, two carats to a pound Troy; silver with copper only, of which eighteen pennyweight is mixed with a pound. Cowell thinks the alloy is added, to countervail the charge of coining; which might have been done only by making the coin less.

For fools are stubborn in their way,
As coins are harden'd by th' alloy. Hudibras.

2. Any thing which, being added, abates the predominant qualities of that with which it is mingled; in the same manner, as the admixture of baser metals allay the qualities of the first mass.

Dark colours easily suffer a sensible alloy, by little scattering light. Newton's Opticks.

3. Alloy being taken from baser metals, commonly implies something worse than that with which it is mixed.

The joy has no alloy of jealousy, hope and fear. Roscommon.

ALLAY'ER. n. f. [from alloy.] The person or thing which has the power or quality of allaying.

Phlegm and pure blood are reputed allayers of acrimony; and Avicen countermands letting blood in choleric bodies; because he esteems the blood a frangum bilis, or a bridge of gall, obounding its acrimony and fierceness. Harvey.

ALLAYMENT. n. f. [from alloy.] That which has the power of allaying or abating the force of another.

If I could temporize with my affection,
Or brew it to a weak and colder palate,
The like allayment would I give my grief. Shaksp. Hamlet.

ALLEGATION. n. f. [from allege.]

1. Affirmation; declaration.

2. The thing alleged or affirmed.

Hath he not twit our sovereign lady here
With ignominious words, though darkly coucht?
As if she had suborned some to swear
False allegations, to o'erthrow his state. Shaksp. Henry VI.

3. An excuse; a plea.

I omitted no means to be informed of my errors; and I expect not to be excused in any negligence on account of youth, want of leisure, or any other idle allegations. Pope.

To ALLEGATE. v. a. [allego, Lat.]

1. To affirm; to declare; to maintain.

2. To plead as an excuse, or produce as an argument.

Surely the present form of church-government is such, as no law of God, or reason of man, hath hitherto been alleged, of force sufficient to prove they do ill, who, to the utmost of their power, withstand the alteration thereof. Hooker.

If we forsake the ways of grace or goodness, we cannot allege any colour of ignorance, or want of instruction; we cannot say we have not learned them, or we could not. Sprat.

He hath a clear and full view, and there is no more to be alleged for his better information. Locke.

ALLEGABLE. adj. [from allege.] That which may be alleged.

Upon this interpretation all may be solved, that is allegable against it. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ALLEGEMENT. n. f. [from allege.] The same with allegation. Dict.

ALLEG'ER. n. f. [from allege.] He that alleges.

The narrative, if we believe it as confidently as the famous allegor of it, Pamphilio, appears to do, would argue, that there is no other principle requisite, than what may result from the lucky mixture of several bodies. Boyle.

ALLEG'ANCE. n. f. [allegiance, Fr.] The duty of subjects to the government.

I did pluck [allegiance from men's hearts,
Loud shouts and salutations from their mouths,
Even in the presence of the crowned king. Shaksp. Hamlet.

We charge you on allegiance to ourselves,
To hold your slaughtering hands, and keep the peace. Shaksp. Hamlet.

The

The house of commons, to whom every day petitions are directed by the several counties of England, professing all allegiance to them, govern absolutely; the lords concurring, or rather submitting to whatsoever is proposed. Clarendon.

ALLEG'GIANT. adj. [from allege.] Loyal; conformable to the duty of allegiance: a word not now used.

For your great graces

Heap'd upon me, poor undeserver, I

Can nothing render but allegiant thanks,

My pray'rs to heav'n for you. Shak. Hen. VIII.

ALLEGOR'ICK. adj. [from allegory.] After the manner of an allegory; not real; not literal.

A kingdom they portend thee; but what kingdom,

Real or allegorick, I discern not. Milton.

ALLEGOR'ICAL. adj. [from allegory.] In the form of an allegory; not real; not literal; mystical.

When our Saviour said, in an allegorical and mystical sense, Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of Man, and drink his blood, ye have no life in you; the hearers understood him literally and grossly. Bentley.

The epithet of Apollo for shooting, is capable of two applications; one literal, in respect of the darts and bow, the ensigns of that god; the other allegorical, in regard to the rays of the sun. Pope.

ALLEGOR'ICALLY. adv. [from allegory.] After an allegorical manner.

Virgil often makes Iris the messenger of Juno, allegorically taken for the air. Peacham.

The place is to be understood allegorically; and what is thus spoken by a Phæacian with wisdom, is, by the poet, applied to the goddesses of it. Pope.

ALLEGOR'ICALNESS. n. f. [from allegorical.] The quality of being allegorical. Dict.

TO ALLEGORIZE. v. a. [from allegory.] To turn into allegory; to form an allegory; to take in a sense not literal.

He hath very wittily allegorized this tree, allowing his supposition of the tree itself to be true. Raleigh.

As some would allegorize these signs, so others would confine them to the destruction of Jerusalem. Burnet's Theory.

An alchymist shall reduce divinity to the maxims of his laboratory, explain morality by fal, sulphur, and mercury; and allegorize the scripture itself, and the sacred mysteries thereof into the philosopher's stone. Locke.

ALLEGORY. n. f. [ἀλληγορία.] A figurative discourse, in which something other is intended, than is contained in the words literally taken; as, wealth is the daughter of diligence, and the parent of authority.

Neither must we draw out our allegory too long, lest either we make ourselves obscure, or fall into affectation, which is childish. Ben Jonson.

This word nympha meant nothing else but, by allegory, the vegetative humour or moisture that quickeneth and giveth life to trees and flowers, whereby they grow. Peacham.

ALLEGRO. n. f. A word, denoting one of the six distinctions of time. It expresses a sprightly motion, the quickest of all, except Presto. It originally means gay, as in Milton.

ALLELU'YAH. n. f. [This word is falsely written for Hallelujah, הלל יהוה and יהוה.] A word of spiritual exultation, used in hymns; it signifies Praise God.

He will set his tongue to those pious divine strains, which make a proper prelude to those allelujah's he hopes eternally to sing. Government of the Tongue.

ALLEMANDE. n. f. [Ital.] A grave kind of music. Dict.

TO ALLEVIATE. v. a. [allevio, Lat.]

1. To make light; to ease; to soften.

The pains taken in the speculative will much alleviate me in describing the practic part. Harvey.

Most of the distempers are the effects of abused plenty and luxury, and must not be charged upon our Maker; who, notwithstanding, hath provided excellent medicines to alleviate those evils which we bring upon ourselves. Bentley.

2. To extenuate, or soften; as, he alleviates his fault by an excuse.

ALLEVIATION. n. f. [from alleviate.]

1. The act of making light; of allaying or extenuating.

All apologies for, and alleviations of faults, though they are the heights of humanity, yet they are not the favours, but the duties of friendship. South.

2. That by which any pain is eased, or fault extenuated.

This loss of one fifth of their income will sit heavy on them, who shall feel it, without the alleviation of any profit. Locke.

ALLEV. n. f. [allé, Fr.]

1. A walk in a garden.

And all within were walks and alleys wide, With footing worn, and leading inward far. Spenser.

Where alleys are close gravelled, the earth putteth forth the first year knot-grafs, and after spire-grafs. Bacon's Nat. History.

Yonder alleys green, Our walk at noon, with branches overgrown. Milton.

Come, my fair love, our morning's task we lose; Some labour ev'n the easiest life would choose: Ours is not great: the dangling bows to crop,

Whose too luxuriant growth our alleys stop. Dryd.

The thriving plants ignoble broomsticks made, Now sweep those alleys they were born to shade. Pope.

2. A passage in towns narrower than a street.

A back friend, a shoulder clapper, one that commands the passages of alleys, creeks, and narrow lands. Shakespeare.

ALLIANCE. n. f. [alliance, Fr.]

1. The state of connection with another by confederacy; a league. In this sense our histories of Queen Anne mention the grand alliance.

2. Relation by marriage.

A bloody Hymen shall th' alliance join Betwixt the Trojan and th' Aufonian line. Dryd.

3. Relation by any form of kindred.

For my father's sake, And, for alliance's sake, declare the cause My father lost his head. Shakespeare. Henry VI.

Adraftus soon, with gods averfe, shall join. In dire alliance with the Theban line; Thence strife shall rise, and mortal war succeed. Pope.

4. The act of forming or contracting relation to another; the act of making a confederacy. Dorset, your son, that with a fearful soul Leads discontented steps in foreign soil This fair alliance quickly shall call home To high promotions. Shakespeare. Richard III.

5. The persons allied to each other.

I would not boast the greatness of my father, But point out new alliances to Cato. Addison.

ALLI'CIENCY. n. f. [allicio, Lat. to entice or draw.] The power of attracting anything; magnetism; attraction.

The feigned central alliciency is but a word, and the manner of it still occult. Glanville.

TO ALLIGATE. v. a. [alligo, Lat.] To tie one thing to another; to unite.

ALLIGATION. n. f. [from alligate.]

1. The act of tying together; the state of being so tied.

2. The arithmetical rule that teaches to adjust the price of compounds, formed of several ingredients of different value.

ALLIGATOR. n. f. The crocodile. This name is chiefly used for the crocodile of America, between which, and that of Africa, naturalists have laid down this difference, that one moves the upper, and the other the lower jaw; but this is now known to be chimerical, the lower jaw being equally moved by both. See CROCODILE.

In his needy shop a tortoise hung, An alligator stuff'd, and other skins

Of ill-shap'd fishes. Shakespeare.

Aloft in rows large poppy-heads were strung, And here a scaly alligator hung. Garth's Dis.

ALLIGATURE. n. f. [from alligate.] The link, or ligature, by which two things are joined together. Dict.

ALLI'SION. n. f. [allido, allisum, Lat.] The act of striking one thing against another.

There have not been any islands of note, or considerable extent, torn and cast off from the continent by earthquakes, or severed from it by the boisterous allision of the sea. Woodw.

ALLITERATION. n. f. [ad and littera, Lat.]

Of what the Critics call the alteration or beginning of several words in the same verse with the same letter, there are instances in the oldest and best writers, as Behemoth biggest born. Milton's Para. Lost.

ALLOCA'TION. n. f. [allico, Lat.]

1. The act of putting one thing to another.

2. The admission of an article in reckoning, and addition of it to the account.

3. An allowance made upon an account; a term used in the exchequer. Chambers.

ALLOCU'TION. n. f. [allocutio, Lat.] The act of speaking to another.

ALLO'DIAL. adj. [from alodium.] Held without any acknowledgment of superiority; not feudal; independent.

ALLODIUM. n. f. [A word of very uncertain derivation, but most probably of German original.] A possession held in absolute independence, without any acknowledgment of a lord paramount. It is opposed to fee, or feudum, which intimates some kind of dependence. There are no allodial lands in England, all being held either mediately or immediately of the king.

ALLO'NGE. n. f. [allonge, Fr.]

1. A pafs or thrust with a rapier, so called from the lengthening of the space taken up by the fencer.

2. It is likewise taken for a long rein, when the horse is trotted in the hand.

TO ALLO'o. v. a. [This word is generally spoke balloo, and is used to dogs, when they are incited to the chase or battle; it is commonly imagined to come from the French allons; perhaps from all lo, look all; shewing the object.] To set on; to incite a dog, by crying alloo.

Alloo thy furious mastiff; bid him vex The noxious herd, and print upon their ears A sad memorial of their past offence. Philips.

ALLOQUY. n. f. [alloguium, Lat.] The act of speaking to another; address; conversation. Dict.

TO ALLOT. v. a. [from lot.]

1. To distribute by lot.

2. To grant.

Five days we do allot thee for provision, To shield thee from disasters of the world;

And, on the sixth, to turn thy hated back Upon our kingdom. Shakespeare. King Lear.

I shall deserve my fate, if I refuse That happy hour, which heaven allots to peace. Dryden.

3. To distribute; to parcel out; to give each his share.

Since fame was the only end of all their studies, a man cannot be too scrupulous in allotting them their due portion of it. Tatler.

ALLOTMENT. n. f. [from allot.]

1. That which is allotted to any one; the part; the share, the portion granted.

There can be no thought of security or quiet in this world, but in a resignation to the allotments of God and nature. L'Estrange.

Though it is our duty to submit with patience to more scanty allotments, yet thus much we may reasonably and lawfully ask of God. Rogers's Sermons.

2. Part appropriated.

It is laid out into a grove for fruits and shade, a vineyard, and an allotment for olives and herbs. Broom.

ALLO'TTERY. n. f. [from allot.] That which is granted to any particular person in a distribution. See ALLOTMENT.

Allow me such exercises as may become a gentleman, or give me the poor allottery my father left me by testament. Shakespeare.

Shakespeare.

Shakespeare.

Shakespeare.

Shakespeare.

To ALLOW. v. a. [allure, Fr. from alludere, Lat.]

1. To admit; as, to allow a position; not to contradict; not to oppose.

The principles, which all mankind allow for true, are innate; those, that men of right reason admit, are the principles allowed by all mankind.

Locke.

The power of music all our hearts allow;
And what Timotheus was, is Dryden now. Pope.

That some of the Presbyterians declared openly against the king's murder, I allow to be true.

Swift.

2. To justify; to maintain as right.

The powers above

allow obedience.

Shakespeare.

The Lord alloweth the righteous.

Bible.

3. To grant; to yield; to own any one's title to.

We will not, in civility, allow too much sincerity to the professions of most men; but think their actions to be interpreters of their thoughts.

Locke.

I shall be ready to allow the pope as little power here as you please.

Swift.

4. To grant licence to; to permit.

Let's follow the old earl, and get the bedlam
To lead him where he would; his roguish madness

allows itself to any thing

Shakespeare.

But as we were allowed of God to be put in trist with the gospel, even so we speak, not as pleasing men, but God, which trieth our hearts.

1 Thess. ii. 4.

They referred all laws, that were to be passed in Ireland, to be considered, corrected, and allowed first by the state of England.

Davies on Ireland.

5. To give a sanction to; to authorize.

There is no slander in an allowed fool.

Shakespeare.

6. To give to; to pay to.

Ungrateful I then! if we no tears allow.
To him that gave us peace and empire too.

Waller.

7. To appoint for; to set out to a certain use;
as, he allowed his son the third part of his income.

8. To make abatement, or provision; or to settle any thing, with some concessions or cautions regarding something else.

If we consider the different occasions of ancient and modern medals, we shall find they both agree in recording the great actions and successes in war; allowing still for the different ways of making it, and the circumstances that attended it.

Addison.

ALLOWABLE. adj. [from allow.]

1. That which may be admitted without contradiction.

It is not allowable, what is observable in many pieces of Raphael, where Magdalen is represented, before our Saviour, washing his feet, on her knees; which will not consist with the text.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

2. That which is permitted or licensed; lawful; not forbidden.

In actions of this sort, the light of nature alone may discover that which is in the sight of God allowable.

Hooker.

I was, by the freedom allowable among friends, tempted to vent my thoughts with negligence.

Boyle.

Reputation becomes a signal and a very peculiar blessing to magistrates; and their pursuit of it is not only allowable; but laudable.

Atterbury's Sermons.

ALLOWABLENESS. n. f. [from allowable.]
The quality of being allowable; lawfulness;
exemption from prohibition.

Lots, as to their nature, use, and allowableness, in matters of recreation, are indeed impugned by some, though better defended by others.

South's Sermons.

ALLOWANCE. n. f. [from allow.]

1. Admission without contradiction.

That which wisdom did first begin, and hath been with good men long continued, challengeth allowance of them that succeed, although it plead for itself nothing.

Hooker.

Without the notion and allowance of spirits, our philosophy will be lame and defective in one main part of it.

Locke.

2. Sanction; licence; authority.

You sent a large commission to conclude,
Without the king's will, or the state's allowance,
A league between his highness and Ferrara.

Shakespeare.

3. Permission; freedom from restraint.

They should therefore be accustomed betimes to consult and make use of their reason, before they give allowance to their inclinations.

Locke.

4. A settled rate; or appointment for any use.

The victual in plantations ought to be expended almost as in a besieged town; that is, with certain allowance.

Bacon.

And his allowance was a continual allowance given him of the king; a daily rate for every day all his life.

2 Kings.

5. Abatement from the strict rigour of a law, or demand.

The whole poem, though written in heroic verse, is of the Pindarick nature, as well in the thought as the expression; and, as such, requires the same grains of allowance for it.

Dryden.

Parents never give allowances for an innocent passion.

Swift.

6. Established character; reputation.

His bark is stoutly timber'd, and his pilot
Of very expert and approved allowance.

Shakespeare.

ALLOW. n. f. [See ALLAY.]

1. Base metal mixed in coinage.

That precise weight and fineness, by law appropriated to the pieces of each denomination, is called the standard. Fine silver is silver without the mixture of any base metal. Alloy is base metal mixed with it.

Locke.

Let another piece be coined of the same weight,
wherein half the silver is taken out, and copper, or other alloy, put into the place, it will be worth but half as much; for the value of the alloy is so inconsiderable as not to be reckoned.

Locke.

2. Abatement; diminution.

The pleasures of sense are probably relished by beasts in more exquisite degree than they are by men; for they taste them sincere and pure without mixture or alloy.

Atterbury.

ALLUBESCENCY. n. f. [allubescencia, Lat.]
Willingness; content.

Diſt.

To ALLUDE. v. n. [alludo, Lat.] To have some reference to a thing, without the direct mention of it; to hint at; to insinuate. It is used of persons; as, he alludes to an old story; or of things, as, the lampoon alludes to his mother's faults.

These speeches of Jerom and Chrysostom do seem to allude unto such ministerial garments as were then in use.

Hooker.

True it is; that many things of this nature be alluded unto, yea, many things declared.

Hooker.

Then just proportions were taken, and every thing placed by weight and measure: and this I doubt not was that artificial structure here alluded
to.

Burnet's Theory.

ALLUMINOR. n. f. [allumer, Fr. to light.] One who colours or paints upon paper or parchment; because he gives graces, light and ornament, to the letters or figures coloured.

Cowell.

To ALLURE. v. a. [lure, Fr. luren, Dutch, beizen, Sax.] To entice to any thing whether good or bad; to draw towards any thing by enticement.

Unto laws that men make for the benefit of men, it hath seemed always needful to add rewards, which may more allure unto good, than any hardness deterreth from it, and punishments, which may more deter from evil, than any sweetness thereto allureth.

Hooker.

The gilded sun in splendour likest heav'n,
Allur'd his eye.

Milton's Par. Lost.

Each flattering hope, and each alluring joy.

Lyttleton.

ALLURE. n. f. [from the verb allure.] Something set up to entice birds, or other things, to it.

We now write lure.

The rather to train them to his allure, he told them both often, and with a vehement voice, how they were over-topped and trodden down
by gentlemen.

Hayward.

ALLUREMENT. n. f. [from allure.] That which allures, or has the force of alluring; enticement;
temptation of pleasure.

Against allurements, custom, and a world
Offended; fearless of reproach, and scorn,
Or violence.

Milton's Par. Lost.

—Adam, by his wife's allurements, fell.

Par. Regained.

To shun th' allurements is not hard

To minds resolv'd, forewarn'd, and well pre-par'd;
But wondrous difficult when once beset,
To struggle through the straits, and break th' involving net.

Dryden.

ALLURER. n. f. [from allure.] The person that allures; enticer; enveigler.

ALLURINGLY. adv. [from allure.] In an alluring manner; enticingly.

ALLURINGNESS. n. f. [from alluring.] The quality of alluring or enticing; invitation; temptation by proposing pleasure.

ALLUSION. n. f. [allusio, Lat.] That which is spoken with reference to something supposed to be already known, and therefore not expressed;
a hint; an implication. It has the particle io.

Here are manifest allusions and footsteps of the dissolution of the earth, as it was in the deluge, and will be in its last ruin.

Burnet's Theory.

This last allusion gall'd the Panther more,
Because indeed it rubb'd upon the fore.

Dryden.

Expressions now out of use, allusions to customs lost to us, and various particularities, must needs continue several passages in the dark.

Locke.

ALLUSIVE. adj. [alludo, allusum, Lat.] Hinting at something not fully expressed.

Where the expression in one place is plain,
and the sense affixed to it agreeable to the proper force of the words, and no negative objection requires us to depart from it; and the expression in the other, is figurative or allusive, and the doctrine, deduced from it, liable to great objections;
it is reasonable, in this latter place, to restrain the extent of the figure and allusion to a consistency with the former.

Rogers's Sermons.

ALLUSIVELY. adv. [from allusive.] In an al-lusive manner; by implication; by insinuation.

The Jewish nation, that rejected and crucified him, within the compass of one generation, were,
according to his prediction, destroyed by the Romans, and preyed upon by those eagles (Matt xxiv. 28.) by which, allusively, are noted the Roman armies, whose ensign was the eagle.

Haunmond.

ALLUSIVENESS. n. f. [from allusive.] The quality of being allusive.

ALLUSION. n. f. [allusio, Lat.]

1. The carrying of any thing to something else by the motion of the water.

2. The thing carried by water to something else.

The civil law gives the owner of land a right to that increase which arises from alluvion, which is defined an insensible increment, brought by the water.

Cowell.

ALLUVIOUS. adj. [from alluvion.] That which is carried by water to another place, and lodged upon something else.

To ALLY. v. a. [alio, Fr.]

1. To unite by kindred, friendship, or confederacy.

All these septes are allied to the inhabitants of the North, so as there is no hope that they will ever serve faithfully against them.

Spenser on Irish.

Wants, frailties, passions, closer still ally
The common interest, or endear the tie.

Pope.

To the sun ally'd,
From him they draw the animating fire.

Thomson.

2. To make a relation between two things, by similitude, or resemblance, or any other means.

Two lines are indeed remotely allied to Virgil's fence; but they are too like the tenderness of Ovid.

ALLY'. n. f. [allie, Fr.] One united by some means of connexion; as marriage, friendship, confederacy.

He in court stood on his own feet; for the most of his allies rather leaned upon him than shored him.

We could hinder the accession of Holland to France, either as subjects, with great immunities for the encouragement of trade, or as an inferior and dependent ally, under their protection.

ALMACANTAR. n. f. [An Arabick word, written variously by various authors; by D'Herbelot, almucantar; by others, almucantar.] A circle drawn parallel to the horizon. It is generally used in the plural, and means a series of parallel circles drawn through the several degrees of the meridian.

ALMACANTAR'S STAFF. n. f. An instrument commonly made of pear-tree or box, with an arch of fifteen degrees, used to take observations of the sun, about the time of its rising and setting, in order to find the amplitude, and consequently the variation of the compass.

ALMANACK. n. f. [Derived by some, from the Arabick, al, and manab, Heb. to count, or compute, but others, from al, Arabick, and man, a month, or manab, the course of the months; by others, from a Teutonic original, al, and man, the moon, an account of every moon, or month: all of them are probable.] A calendar; a book in which the revolutions of the seasons, with the return of feasts and fasts, is noted for the ensuing year.

It will be said, this is an almanack for the old year; all hath been well; Spain hath not assailed this kingdom.

This astrologer made his almanack give a tolerable account of the weather, by a direct inversion of the common prognosticators.

Beware the woman too, and thum her fight, Who in these studies does herself delight; By whom a greasy almanack is borne, With often handling, like chaff amber worn.

I'll have a fasting almanack printed on purpose for her use.

ALMANDINE. n. f. [Fr. almandina, Ital.] A ruby coarser and lighter than the oriental, and nearer the colour of the granate.

ALMIGHTINESS. n. f. [from almighty.] Unlimited power; omnipotence; one of the attributes of God.

It ferveth to the world for a witness of his almightiness, whom we outwardly honour with the chiefest of outward things.

In creating and making existent the world universal, by the absolute act of his own word, God shewed his power and almightiness.

In the wilderness, the bitter and the stork, the unicorn and the elk, live upon his provisions, and reverse his power, and feel the force of his almightiness.

ALMIGHTY. adj. [from all and mighty.] Of unlimited power; omnipotent.

The Lord appeared unto Abraham, and said unto him, I am the almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect.

He wills you in the name of God almighty, That you divest yourself, and lay apart The borrowed glories, that, by gift of heav'n, By law of nature and of nations, 'long, To him and to his heirs.

ALMOND. n. f. [amand, Fr. derived by Ménage from amandala, a word in low Latin; by others, from Allemand, a German; supposing that almonds come to France from Germany.] The nut of the almond tree, either sweet or bitter.

Pound an almond, and the clear white colour will be altered into a dirty one, and the sweet taste into an oily one.

ALMOND TREE. n. f. [amygdalus, Lat.] It has leaves and flowers very like those of the peach tree, but the fruit is longer and more compressed; the outer green coat is thinner and drier when ripe, and the shell is not so rugged.

Like to an almond tree mounted high On top of Green Selenis, all alone, With blossoms brave bedecked daintily, Whose tender locks do tremble every one, At every little breath that under heav'n is blown.

Mark well the flow'ring almonds in the wood, If od'rous blooms the bearing branches load, The glebe will answer to the sylvan reign; Great heats will follow, and large crops of grain.

ALMONDS OF THE THROAT, OR TONSILS, improperly called Almonds of the ears; are two round glands placed on the sides of the basis of the tongue, under the common membrane of the fauces; each of them has a large oval sinus, which opens into the fauces, and in it are a great number of lesser ones, which discharge themselves through the great sinus of a mucous and slippery matter into the fauces, larynx, and oesophagus, for the moistening and lubricating those parts. When the oesophagus muscle acts, it compresses the almonds, and they frequently are the occasion of a sore throat.

The tonsils, or Almonds of the Ears, are also frequently swelled in the king's evil; which tumour may be very well reckoned a species of it.

ALMOND-FURNACE, OR ALMAN-FURNACE, called also the Sweep, is a peculiar kind of furnace used in refining, to separate metals from cinders and other foreign substances.

ALMONER, OR ALMNER. n. f. [elemosynarius, Lat.] The officer of a prince, or other person, employed in the distribution of charity.

I enquired for an almoner; and the general fame has pointed out your reverence as the worthiest man.

ALMONRY. n. f. [from almoner.] The place where the almoner resides, or where the alms are distributed.

ALMOST. adv. [from all and most; that is, most part of all. Skinner.] Nearly; well nigh; in the next degree to the whole, or to universality.

Who is there almost, whose mind, at some time or other, love or anger, fear or grief, has not so fastened to some clog, that it could not turn itself to any other object.

There can be no such thing or notion, as an almost infinite; there can be nothing next or second to an omnipotent God.

Atlas becomes unequal to his freight, And almost faints beneath the glowing weight.

ALMS. n. f. [in Saxon, elmer, from elemosyna, Lat.] What is given gratuitously in relief of the poor. It has no singular.

My arm'd knees, Which bow'd but in my stirrup, bend like his That hath received an alms.

The poor beggar hath a just demand of an alms from the rich man; who is guilty of fraud, injustice and oppression, if he does not afford relief according to his abilities.

ALMS-BASKET. n. f. [from alms and basket.] The basket in which provisions are put to be given away.

There sweepings do as well, As the best order'd meal; For who the relish of these guests will fit, Needs set them but the alms-basket of wit.

We'll stand up for our properties, was the beggar's song that lived upon the alms-basket.

ALMSDEED. n. f. [from alms and deed.] An act of charity; a charitable gift.

This woman was full of good works, and alms-deeds which she did.

Hard favour'd Richard, where art thou? Thou art not here: murder is thy alms-deed; Petitioner for blood thou ne'er put'st back.

A'LMs-GIVER. n. f. [from alms and giver.] He that gives alms; he that supports others by his charity.

He endowed many religious foundations, and yet was he a great alms-giver in secret, which shewed that his works in publick were dedicated rather to God's glory than his own.

A'LMsHOUSE. n. f. [from alms and house.] A house devoted to the reception and support of the poor; an hospital for the poor.

The way of providing for the clergy by tithes, the device of alms-houses for the poor, and the sorting out of the people into parishes, are manifest.

And to relief of lazars, and weak age Of indigent faint souls, past corporal toil, A hundred alms-houses right well supplied.

Many penitents, after the robbing of temples and other rapine, build an hospital, or alms-house, out of the ruins of the church, and the spoils of widows and orphans.

Behold yon alms-house, neat, but void of state, Where age and want sit smiling at the gate.

A'LMsMAN. n. f. [from alms and man.] A man who lives upon alms; who is supported by charity.

I'll give my jewels for a set of beads; My gorgeous palace, for a hermitage; My gay apparel for an almsman's gown.

A'LMUG-TREE. n. f. A tree mentioned in scripture.

Of its wood were made musical instruments, and it was used also in rails, or in a staircase. The Rabbins generally render it coral, others ebony, brazil, or pine. In the Septuagint it is translated wrought wood, and in the Vulgate, Ligna Thyina. But coral could never answer the purposes of the almagum; the pine-tree is too common in Judea to be imported from Ophir; and the Thyinum, or citron-tree, much esteemed by the ancients for its fragrance and beauty, came from Mauritania. By the wood almugim, or algumim, or simply gummim, taking al for a kind of article, may be understood oily and gummy sorts of wood, and particularly the trees which produce gum ammoniac, or gum arabick; and is, perhaps, the same with the Shittim wood mentioned by Moses.

And the navy also of Hiram that brought gold from Ophir, brought in from Ophir great plenty of almagum-trees and precious trees.

A'LNAGAR, A'LNAGER, OR A'LNAGER. n. f. [from alnage.] A measurer by the ell; a sworn officer, whose business formerly was to inspect the affize of woollen cloth, and to fix the seals appointed upon it for that purpose; but there are now three officers belonging to the regulation of cloth-manufactures, the searcher, measurer, and alnager.

A'LNAGE. n. f. [from alnage, or annage, Fr.] Ell-measure, or rather the measuring by the ell or yard.

A'LNIGHT. n. f. [from all and night.] A service which they call alnigh, is a great cake of wax, with the wick in the midst; whereby it cometh to pass, that the wick fetcheth the nourishment farther off.

A'LOES. n. f. [אֶלֶס, as it is supposed.] A term applied to three different things.

1. A precious wood used, in the East, for perfumes, of which the best sort is of higher price than gold, and was the most valuable present given by the king of Siam, in 1686, to the King of France. It is called Tambac, and is the heart, or innermost part, of the aloe-tree; the next part to which is called Calambac, which is sometimes imported into Europe, and, though of inferior value to the Tambac, is much esteemed: the part next the bark is termed, by the Portuguese, Pao d'aquila, or eagle-wood; but some account of the eagle-wood not the outer part of the Tambac, but another species. Our knowledge of this wood is yet very imperfect.

2. Alaes is a tree which grows in hot countries, and even in the mountains of Spain.

3. Alaes

3. Aloe is a medicinal juice extracted not from the odoriferous, but the common aloe tree, by cutting the leaves, and exposing the juice that drops from them to the sun. It is distinguished into Socotorine and Caballine, or horse aloes; the first is so called from Socotora; the second, because, being coarser, it ought to be confined to the use of farriers. It is a warm and strong cathartick.

ALOE'ICAL. adj. [from aloes.] Consisting chiefly of aloes.

It may be excited by aloetical, scammoniate, or acrimonious medicines. Wise man's Surgery.

ALOE'TICK. n. f. [from aloes.] Any medicine is so called, which chiefly consists of aloes. Quincy.

ALO'ET. adv. [from alo, to lift up, Dan. Lofi air, Icelandish; so that aloft is, into the air.] On high; above; in the air: a word used chiefly in poetry.

For I have read in stories oft,

That love has wings, and soars aloft. Shaksp.

Upright he stood, and bore aloft his shield,

Conspicuous from afar, and overlook'd the field. Dryden.

The great luminary

Aloft the vulgar constellations thick,

That from his lordly eye keep distance due,

Dispenses light from far. Milton's Par. Lost.

ALOGY. n. f. [from alogos.] Unreasonableness; absurdity. DiG.

ALO'NE. adj. [from al, Dutch; from al and one, or one, that is single.]

1. Without another.

The quarrel toucheth none but us alone;

Betwixt ourselves let us decide it then. Shaksp.

If by a mortal hand my father's throne

Could be defended, 'twas by mine alone. Dryden.

God, by whose alone power and conservation

we all live, and move, and have our being. Bentley.

2. Without company; solitary.

Eagles we see fly alone, and they are but sheep which always herd together. Sidney.

Alone, for other creature in this place

Living or lifeless to be found was none. Milton.

I never durst in darkness be alone. Dryden.

ALO'NE. adv.

1. This word is seldom used but with the word let, if even then it be an adverb. It implies sometimes an ironical prohibition, forbidding to help a man who is able to manage the affair himself.

Let us alone to guard Corioli,

If they set down before's; 'fore they remove, Bring up your army. Shaksp.

Let you alone, cunning artificer;

See how his gorget peers above his gown, To tell the people in what danger he was. Ben Jonson.

2. To forbear; to leave undone.

His client stole it, but he had better have let it alone; for he lost his cause by his jest. Addison.

ALO'NG. adv. [from longue, Fr.]

1. At length.

Some rowl a mighty stone; some laid along. And, bound with burning wires, on spokes of wheels are hung. Dryden.

2. Through any space measured lengthwise.

A firebrand carried along, leaveth a train of light behind it. Bacon's Natural History.

Where Ufens glides along the lowly lands,

Or the black water of Pomptina stands. Dry.

3. Throughout; in the whole: with all prefixed. Solomon, all along in his Proverbs, gives the title of fool to a wicked man. Tillotson.

They were all along a cross, untoward sort of people. South.

4. Joined with the particle with; in company; joined with.

I your comm'fion will forthwith dispatch,

And he to England shall along with you. Shaksp.

Hence then! and Evil go with thee along,

Thy offspring to the place of evil, Hell. Mil.

Religious zeal is subject to an excess, and to a defect, when something is mingled with it which it should not have; or when it wants something that ought to go along with it. Sprat.

5. Sometimes with is understood.

Command thy slaves: my free-born soul disdains

A tyrant's curb; and restive breaks the reins.

Take this along; and no dispute shall rise

(Though mine the woman) for my ravish'd prize. Dryden.

6. Forward; onward. In this sense it is derived from allons, French.

Come then, my friend, my genius, come along, Thou master of the poet and the song. Pope.

ALO'NGST. adv. [a corruption, as it seems, from along.] Along; through the length.

The Turks did keep strait watch and ward in all their ports alongst the sea-coast.

Knolles's History of the Turks.

ALO'OF. adv. [all off, that is, quite off.]

1. At a distance; with the particle from. It generally implies a small distance, such as is within view or observation.

Then bade the knight this lady yede aloof, And to an hill herself withdrew aside,

From whence she might behold the battle's proof, And else be safe from danger far defied. Fairy Queen.

As next in worth,

Came singly where he stood, on the bare strand, While the promiscuous crowd stood yet aloof.

Milton's Paradise Lost.

The noise approaches, though our palace stood aloof from streets, encompass'd with a wood. Dryden.

2. Applied to persons, it often insinuates caution and circumspection.

Turn on the bloody hounds with heads of steel, And make the cowards stand aloof at bay. Shaksp.

Going northwards, aloof, as long as they had any doubt of being pursued; at last, when they were out of reach, they turned and crossed the ocean to Spain. Bacon.

The king would not, by any means, enter the city, until he had aloof seen the cross set up upon the greater tower of Grenada, whereby it became Christian ground. Bacon.

Two pots stood by a river, one of brass, the other of clay. The water carried them away; the earthen vessel kept aloof from t'other. L'Estrange's Fables.

The strong may fight aloof; Ancæus try'd His force too near, and by presuming dy'd. Dryden's Fables.

3. In a figurative sense, it is used to import art or cunning in conversation, by which a man holds the principal question at a distance.

Nor do we find him forward to be founded; But with a crafty madness keeps aloof, When we would bring him on to some confession Of his true state. Shaksp.

4. It is used metaphorically of persons that will not be seen in a design.

It is necessary the queen join; for, if she stand aloof, there will be still suspicions: it being a received opinion, that she hath a great interest in the king's favour and power. Suckling.

5. It is applied to things not properly belonging to each other.

Love's not love,

When it is mingled with regards that stand aloof from th' entire point. Shaksp.

ALO'UD. adv. [from a and loud.] Loudly; with a strong voice; with a great noise.

Strangled he lies! yet seems to cry aloud, To warn the mighty, and instruct the proud;

That of the great neglecting to be just, Heav'n in a moment makes an heap of dust. Wal.

Then heav'n's high monarch thund'ring thrice aloud.

And thrice he shook aloft a golden cloud. Dryd.

ALO'W. adv. [from a and low.] In a low place; not aloft.

And now alow, and now aloft they fly, As borne through air, and seem to touch the sky. Dryden.

ALPHA. n. f. The first letter in the Greek alphabet, answering to our A; therefore used to signify the first.

I am alpha and omega, the beginning and the ending, faith the Lord, which is, and which was, and which is to come, the Almighty. Revelations.

ALPHABET. n. f. [from alpha, alpha, and beta, the two first letters of the Greeks, the order of the letters, or elements of speech.

Thou shalt not sigh,

Nor wink, nor nod, nor kneel, nor make a sign,

But I of these will rest an alphabet, And by still practice learn to know thy meaning. Shaksp.

The letters of the alphabet, formed by the several motions of the mouth, and the great variety of syllables composed of letters, and formed with almost equal velocity, and the endless number of words capable of being framed out of the alphabet, either of more syllables, or of one, are wonderful. Holder.

Taught by their nurses, little children get This saying, sooner than the alphabet. Dryd. jun. Juv.

To ALPHABET. v. a. [from alphabet, noun.] To range in the order of their alphabet.

ALPHABET'ICAL. adj. [from alphabet; alpha-ALPHABET'ICAL. adj. betique, Fr.] In the order of the alphabet; according to the series of letters.

I have digested in an alphabetical order, all the counties, corporations, and boroughs in Great Britain, with their respective tempers. Swift.

ALPHABET'ICALLY. adv. [from alphabetical.] In an alphabetical manner; according to the order of letters.

I had once in my thoughts to contrive a grammar, more than I can now comprise in short hints; and a dictionary, alphabetically containing the words of the language, which the deaf person is to learn. Holder's Elements of Speech.

ALRE'ADV. adv. [from all and ready.] At this present time, or at some time past; opposed to futurity; as, Will he come soon? He is here already. Will it be done? It has been done already.

Touching our uniformity, that which hath been already answered, may serve for answer. Hooker.

You warn'd me still of loving two; Can I love him, already loving you? Dryden's Ind. Emp.

See, the guards, from yon far eastern hill Already move, no longer stay afford;

High in the air, they wave the flaming sword, Your signal to depart. Dryden's State of Inno.

Methods for the advancement of piety, are in the power of a prince limited like ours, by a strict execution of the laws already in force. Swift.

Methinks, already I your tears survey, Already hear the horrid things they say, Already see you a degraded toist, And all your honour in a whisper lost! Pope.

ALS. adv. [als, Dutch.] Also; likewise: a word now out of use.

Sad remembrance now the prince amoves With fresh desire his voyage to pursue;

Als Una earn'd her travel to renew. Fairy Q.

ALSO. adv. [from all and so.]

1. In the same manner; likewise.

In these two, no doubt, are contained the causes of the great deluge, as, according to Moses, so also according to necessity; for our world affords no other treasures of water. Burnet's Theory.

2. Also is sometimes nearly the same with and, and only conjoins the members of the sentence.

God do so to me, and more also. 1 Samuel xiv. 44.

ALTAR. n. f. [altare, Lat.] It is observed by Junius, that the word altar is received, with christianity, in all the European languages; and that altare is used by one of the Fathers, as appropriated to the Christian worship, in opposition to the are of gentiliism.]

1. The place where offerings to heaven are laid. The goddess of the nuptial bed,

Tir'd with her vain devotions for the dead, Resolv'd

Refolv'd the tainted hand should be repell'd,
Which incense offer'd, and her altar held. Dryden.
2. The table in Christian churches where the communion is administered.

Her grace rose, and, with modest paces,
Came to the altar, where she kneel'd, and faint-
like,
Cast her fair eyes to heav'n, and pray'd devoutly. Shakespeare.

ALTARAGE. n. f. [altarium, Lat.] An emolument arising to the priest from oblations, through the means of the altar. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ALTAR-CLOTH. n. f. [from altar and cloth.] The cloth thrown over the altar in churches.

I should set down the wealth, books, hangings, and altar-cloths, which our kings gave this abbey. Peckham on Drawing.

TO ALTER. v. a. [alter, Fr. from alter, Lat.]

1. To change; to make otherwise than it is. To alter, seems more properly to imply a change made only in some part of a thing; as, to alter a writing, may be, to blot, or interpolate it; to change it, may be, to substitute another in its place. With from and to; as, her face is altered from pale to red.

Do you note

How much her grace is alter'd on the sudden?
How long her face is drawn? how pale she looks,

And of an earthly cold? Shakef. Hen. VIII.
Acts appropriated to the worship of God by his own appointment, must continue so, till himself hath otherwise declared: for who dares alter what God hath appointed? Stillingsfleet.

2. To take off from a persuasion, practice, or sect.

For the way of writing plays in verse, I find it troublesome and flow; but I am no way altered from my opinion of it, at least with any reason which have opposed it. Dryden.

TO ALTER. v. n. To become otherwise than it was; as, the weather alters from bright to cloudy.

ALTERABLE. adj. [from alter; alter-ibilis, Fr.] That which may be altered or changed by something else; distinct from changeable, or that which changes, or may change itself.

That alterable respects are realities in nature, will never be admitted by a confidante discernment. Glanville.

Our condition in this world is mutable and uncertain, alterable by a thousand accidents, which we can neither foresee nor prevent. Rogers.

I wish they had been more clear in their directions upon that mighty point, Whether the settlement of the succession in the House of Hanover be alterable, or no? Swift.

ALTERABLENESS. n. f. [from alterable.] The quality of being alterable, or admitting change from external causes.

ALTERABLY. adv. [from alterable.] In such a manner as may be altered.

ALTERAGE. n. f. [from alibi.] The breeding, nourishing, or fostering of a child.

In Ireland they put their children to fosterers: the rich sell, the meaner sort buying the alterage of their children; and the reason is, because in the opinion of the people, fostering has always been a stronger alliance than blood. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

ALTERANT. adj. [alterant, Fr.] That which has the power of producing changes in any thing.

And whether the body be alterant or altered, evermore a perception precedeth operation; for else all bodies would be alike one to another. Bacon.

ALTERATION. n. f. [from alter; alteration, Fr.]

1. The act of altering or changing. Alteration, though it be from worse to better, hath in it inconveniences, and those weighty. Hooker.

2. The change made.

Why may we not presume, that God doth even call for such change or alteration, as the very condition of things themselves doth make necessary? Hooker.

So he with difficulty and labour hard,
Mov'd on:

But he once past, soon after, when man fell,
Strange alteration! Sin, and death, amain
Following his track (such was the will of heav'n)
Pav'd after him a broad and beaten way. Milton.

No other alteration will satisfy; nor this neither, very long, without an utter abolition of all order. South.

Appius Claudius admitted to the senate the sons of those who had been slaves; by which, and succeeding alterations, that council degenerated into a most corrupt body. Swift.

ALTERATIVE. adj. [from alter.]

Medicines called alteratives, are such as have no immediate sensible operation, but gradually gain upon the constitution, by changing the humours from a state of dittemperature to health. They are opposed to evacuants. Quincy.

When there is an eruption of humour in any part, it is not cured merely by outward applications, but by such alterative medicines as purify the blood. Government of the Tongue.

ALTERATION. n. f. [alteration, Fr. from alter, or, Lat.] Debate; controversy; wrangle.

By this hot pursuit of lower controversies amongst men professing religion, and agreeing in the principal foundations thereof, they conceive hope, that, about the higher principles themselves, time will cause alteration to grow. Hooker.

Their whole life was little else than a perpetual wrangling and altercation; and that, many times, rather for victory and ostentation of wit, than a sober and serious search of truth. Hakewill on Providence.

ALTERN. adj. [alternus, Lat.] Acting by turns, in succession each to the other.

And God made two great lights, great for their use

To man; the greater to have rule by day,
The less by night, altern. Milton.

ALTERNACY. n. f. [from alternare.] Action performed by turns.

ALTERNATE. adj. [alternus, Lat.] Being by turns; one after another; reciprocal.

Friendship consists properly in mutual offices, and a generous strife in alternate acts of kindness. South.

Hear how Timotheus' various lays surprize,
And bid alternate passions fall and rise!

While, at each change, the son of Lybian Jove
Now burns with glory, and then melts with love. Pope.

ALTERNATE ANGLES. [In geometry.] Are the internal angles made by a line cutting two parallels, and lying on the opposite sides of the cutting line; the one below the first parallel, and the other above the second.

ALTERNATE. n. f. [from alternare, adj.] That which happens alternately; vicissitude.

And rais'd in pleasure, or repos'd in ease,
Grateful alternates of substantial peace,
They blest the long nocturnal influence shed
On the crown'd goblet, and the genial bed. Prior.

TO ALTERNATE. v. a. [alternare, Lat.]

1. To perform alternately.

Those who, in their course,
Melodious hymns about the sov'reign throne
Alternate all night long. Milton.

2. To change one thing for another reciprocally.

The most high God, in all things appertaining unto this life, for sundry wise ends, alternates the disposition of good and evil. Greiv.

ALTERNATELY. adv. [from alternare.] In reciprocal succession, so that each shall be succeeded by that which it succeeds, as light follows darkness, and darkness follows light.

The prince's Meleinda, bath'd in tears,
And tof'd alternately with hopes and fears,
Would learn from you the fortunes of her lord. Dryden.

Unhappy man! whom sorrow thus and rage
To different ills alternately engage. Prior.

The rays of light are, by some cause or other, alternately disposed to be reflected or refracted for many vicissitudes. Newton.

ALTERNATENESS. n. f. [from alternare.] The quality of being alternate, or of happening in reciprocal succession. Dick.

ALTERNATION. n. f. [from alternare.] The reciprocal succession of things.

The one would be oppress'd with constant heat, the other with insufferable cold; and to the defect of alternation would utterly impugn the generation of all things. Brown.

ALTERNATIVE. n. f. [alternatif, Fr.] The choice given of two things; so that if one be rejected, the other must be taken.

A strange alternative—
Must ladies have a doctor, or a dance? Young.

ALTERNATIVELY. adv. [from alternativus.] In alternate manner; by turns; reciprocally.

An appeal alternatively made may be tolerated by the civil law as valid. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ALTERNITY. n. f. [from altern.] Reciprocal succession; vicissitude; turn; mutual change of one thing for another; reciprocation.

They imagine, that an animal of the vastest dimensions, and longest duration, should live in a continual motion, without the alternity and vicissitude of rest, whereby all other animals continue. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ALTHOUGH. conj. [from all and though. See THOUGH.] Notwithstanding; however it may be granted; however it may be that.

We all know, that many things are believed, although they be intricate, obscure, and dark; although they exceed the reach and capacity of our wits; yea, although in this world they be no way possible to be understood. Hooker.

Me the gold of France did not seduce,
Although I did admit it as a motive
The sooner to effect what I intended. Shakespeare.

The stress must be laid upon a majority; without which the laws would be of little weight, although they be good additional securities. Swift.

ALTIGRADE. adj. [from altus and gradior, Lat.] Rising on high. Dick.

ALTILOQUENCE. n. f. [altus and loquor, Lat.] High speech; pompous language.

ALTI'ONOUS. } sounding; pompous or lofty in sound. Dick.

ALTITUDE. n. f. [altitudo, Lat.]

1. Height of place; space measured upward.
Ten matts attach'd make not the altitude,
Which thou hast perpendicularly fall'n. Shakespeare.

Some define the perpendicular altitude of the highest mountains to be four miles; others but fifteen furlongs. Brown.

She shines above, we know, but in what place,
How near the throne, and heav'n's imperial face,
By our weak opticks is but vainly guess'd:
Distance and altitude conceal the rest. Dryden.

2. The elevation of any of the heavenly bodies above the horizon.

Even unto the latitude of fifty-two, the efficacy thereof is not much considerable, whether we consider its ascent, meridian, altitude, or abode above the horizon. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Has not a poet more virtues and vices within his circle, cannot he observe them and their influences in their oppositions and conjunctions, in their altitudes and depressions? Rymer.

3. Situation with regard to lower things.

Those members which are pairs, stand by one another in equal altitude, and answer on each side one to another. Ray.

4. Height of excellence; superiority.

Your altitude offends the eyes
Of those who want the power to rise. Swift.

A'LTOGETHER, adv. [from all and together.] 1. Completely; without restriction; without exception.

It is in vain to speak of planting laws, and plotting policy, till the people be altogether subdued. Spenser's State of Ireland.

We find not in the world any people that hath lived altogether without religion. Hooker.

If death and danger are things that really cannot be endured, no man could ever be obliged to suffer for his conscience, or to die for his religion; it being altogether as absurd to imagine a man obliged to suffer, as to do impossibilities. South.

I do not altogether disapprove of the manner of interweaving texts of scripture through the style of your sermon. Swift.

2. Conjointly; in company. This is rather all together.

Cousin of Somerset, join you with me, And altogether with the Duke of Suffolk, We'll quickly hoist duke Humphry from his seat. Shakespeare.

A'LUDEL. n. f. [from a and lutum; that is, without lute.

Aludels are subliming pots used in chemistry, without bottoms, and fitted into one another, as many as there is occasion for, without luting. At the bottom of the furnace is a pot that holds the matter to be sublimed; and, at the top is a head, to retain the flowers that rise up. Quincy.

A'LUM. n. f. [alumen, Lat.]

A kind of mineral salt, of an acid taste, leaving in the mouth a sense of sweetness, accompanied with a considerable degree of astringency. The ancient naturalists allow of two sorts of alum, natural and factitious. The natural is found in the island of Milo, being a kind of whitish stone, very light, friable and porous, and streaked with filaments resembling silver. England, Italy, and Flanders, are the countries where alum is principally produced; and the English rock-alum is made from a bluish mineral stone, in the hills of Yorkshire and Lancashire.

Saccharine alum is a composition of the common alum, with rose-water and whites of eggs boiled together, to the consistence of a paste, and thus moulded at pleasure. As it cools it grows hard as a stone.

Burnt alum is alum calcined over the fire.

Plumose or plume alum is a sort of saline mineral stone of various colours, most commonly white, bordering on green; it rises in threads or fibres, resembling those of a feather; whence its name from pluma, a feather. Chambers.

By long beating the white of an egg with a lump of alum, you may bring it, for the most part, into white curds. Boyle.

ALUM STONE. n. f. A stone or calx used in surgery; perhaps alum calcined, which then becomes corrosive.

She gargled with oxycerate, and was in a few days cured, by touching it with the vitriol and alum stones. W. Leman.

ALU'MINOUS. adj. [from alumi.] Relating to alum, or consisting of alum.

Nor do we reasonably conclude, because, by a cold and aluminous moisture, it is able awhile to resist the fire, that, from a peculiarity of nature, it subsisteth and liveth in it. Brown.

The tumour may have other mixture with it, to make it of a vitriolick or aluminous nature. W. Leman's Surgery.

A'WAYS. adv. [It is sometimes written alway, compounded of all and way; esalpepega, Sax. tatavia, Ital.]

1. Perpetually; throughout all time: opposed to sometimes, or to never.

That, which sometime is expedient, doth not always so continue. Hooker.

Man never is, but always to be blest. Pope.

2. Constantly; without variation: opposed to sometimes, or to now and then.

He is always great, when some great occasion is presented to him. Dryden.

A. M. Stands for artium magister, or master of arts; the second degree of our universities, which, in some foreign countries, is called doctor of philosophy.

AM. The first person of the verb to be. [See To BE.]

And God said unto Moses, I am that I am: and he said, thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I am hath sent me unto you. Exodus, iii. 14.

Come then, my soul: I call thee by that name, Thou busy thing, from whence I know I am: For knowing that I am, I know thou art; Since that must needs exist, which can impart. Prior.

AMABI'LITY. n. f. [from amabilis, Lat.] Love-fulness; the power of pleasing. No rules can make amability, our minds and apprehensions make that; and so is our felicity. Taylor.

Great lords, from Ireland am I come again, To signify that rebels there are up. Shakespeare.

What! when we fled again, pursued, and struck With heav'n's afflicting thunder, and besought The deep to shelter us? Milton.

The hills, to their supply, Vapour and exhalation, dusk and moist, Sent up again.

From hence the boar was rous'd, and sprung again, Like lightning sudden, on the warrior train, Beats down the trees before him, shakes the ground; The forest echoes to the crackling found, Shout the fierce youth, and clamours ring around. Dryden.

AMAL'GAM. n. f. [ἀμαλγμα and μεταλλή.] The AMAL'GAMA. mixture of metals procured by amalgamation. See AMALGAMATION.

The induration of the amalgam appears to proceed from the new texture resulting from the coalition of the mingled ingredients, that make up the amalgam. Boyle.

TO AMAL'GAMATE. v. a. [from amalgama.] To unite metals with quicksilver, which may be practised upon all metals, except iron and copper. The use of this operation is, to make the metal soft and ductile. Gold is, by this method, drawn over other materials by the gilders.

AMALGAMATION. n. f. [from amalgama.] The art or practice of amalgamating metals. Amalgamation is the mixing of mercury with any of the metals. The manner is thus in gold, the rest are answerable: Take six parts of mercury, mix them hot in a crucible, and pour them to one part of gold made red hot in another crucible; stir these well that they may incorporate; then cast the mass into cold water, and wash it. Bacon.

AMANDA'TION. n. f. [from amando, Lat.] The act of sending on a message or employment.

AMANUE'NSIS. n. f. [Lat.] A person who writes what another dictates.

A'MARANTH. n. f. [amaranthus, Lat. from a and μαρῖνος.] The name of a plant.

The flowers have no petals; the cup of the flower is dry and multifid; the seeds are included in membranaceous vessels, which, when come to maturity, burst open transversely or horizontally, like purslane, each of which contains one or more roundish seeds.

Among the many species, the most beautiful are, 1. The tree amaranth. 2. The long pendulous amaranth, with reddish coloured seeds, commonly called Love lies a bleeding.

2. In poetry, it is sometimes an imaginary flower, supposed, according to its name, never to fade.

Immortal amaranth! a flower which once In paradise, fast by the tree of life, Began to bloom; but soon, for man's offence, To heav'n remov'd, where first it grew, there grows,

And flow'rs aloft, shading the fount of life; And where the river of bliss, thro' midst of heav'n, Rows o'er Elysian flow'rs her amber stream: With these, that never fade, the spirits elect Bind their refulgent locks, inwreath'd with beams. Milton's Paradise Lost.

AMARA'STHINE. adj. [amaranthinus, Lat.] Relating to amaranth; consisting of *amaranth*s.

By the streams that ever flow, By the fragrant winds that blow O'er the Elysian flow'rs, By those happy souls that dwell In yellow meads of Asphodel, Or amaranthine bow'rs. Pope.

AMA'RITUDE. n. f. [amaritudo, Lat.] Bitterness.

What amaritudo or acrimony is deprehended in choler, it acquires from a commixture of melancholy, or external malign bodies. Harvey on Conf.

AMA'RULENCE. n. f. [amaritudo, Lat.] Bitterness. Dict.

AMA'SMENT. n. f. [from amasi.] A heap; an accumulation; a collection.

What is now, is but an *amasi*ment of imaginary conceptions, prejudices, ungrounded opinions, and infinite impostures. Glanville's Sceptis Scientificis.

TO AMA'SS. v. a. [amass, Fr.] 1. To collect together in one heap or mass.

The rich man is not blamed, as having made use of any unlawful means to amass riches, as having thriven by fraud and injustice. Atterbury's Sermon.

When we would think of infinite space, or duration, we, at first step, usually make some very large idea, as perhaps of millions of ages, or miles, which possibly we double and multiply several times. All that we thus amass together in our thoughts, is positive, and the assemblage of a great number of positive ideas of space or duration. Locke.

2. In a figurative sense, to add one thing to another, generally with some share of reproach, either of eagerness or indiscrimination.

Such as amass all relations, must err in some, and be unbeliever in many. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Do not content yourselves with mere words, lest your improvements only amass a heap of unintelligible phrases. Watts's Improvement of the Mind.

The life of Homer has been written, by amassing of all the traditions and hints the writers could meet with, in order to tell a story of him to the world. Pope.

AMA'SS. n. f. [amass, Fr.] An assemblage; an accumulation.

This pillar is but a medley or amass of all the precedent ornaments, making a new kind of stealth. Wotton.

TO AMA'TE. v. n. [from a and mate. See MATE.]

1. To accompany; to entertain as a companion. It is now obsolete.

A lovely bevy of fair ladies fate, Courted of many a jolly paramour, The which did them in modest wife amate, And each one fought his lady to aggrate. Fairy Queen.

2. To terrify; to strike with horror. In this sense, it is derived from the old French, matter, to crush or subdue.

AMATO'RCULIST. n. f. [amatorculus, Lat.] A little insignificant lover; a pretender to affection. Dict.

A'MATORY. adj. [amatorius, Lat.] Relating to love; causing love.

It is the same thing whether one ravish Lucretia by force, as Tarquin, or by amatory potions, not only allure her, but necessitate her to satisfy his lust, and incline her effectually, and draw her inevitably to follow him spontaneously. Bramham against Hobbes.

AMAURO'SIS. n. f. [ἀμαυρωσις.] A dimness of sight, not from any visible defect in the eye, but from from some distemperature of the inner parts, occasioning the representations of flies and dust floating before the eyes: which appearances are the parts of the retina hid and compressed by the blood vessels being too much distended; so that, in many of its parts, all sense is lost; and therefore no images can be painted upon them, whereby the eyes, continually rolling round, many parts of objects falling successively upon them, are obscure. The cure of this depends upon a removal of the stagnations in the extremities of those arteries which run over the bottom of the eye.

To AMAZE. v. a. [from a and maze, perplexity.]

1. To confuse with terror.

Yea, I will make many people amazed at thee, and their kings shall be horribly afraid for thee, when I shall brandish my sword before them, and they shall tremble at every moment; every man for his own life in the day of the fall. Ezekiel.

2. To put into confusion with wonder.

Go, heavenly pair, and with your dazzling virtues,

Your courage, truth, your innocence and love, Amaze and charm mankind. Smith.

3. To put into perplexity.

That cannot choose but amaze him. If he be not amazed, he will be mocked; if he be amazed, he will every way be mocked. Shakespeare.

AMAZE. n. f. [from the verb amaze.] Astonishment; confusion, either of fear or wonder.

Fairfax, whose name in arms thro' Europe rings, And fills all mouths with envy or with praise And all her jealous monarchs with amaze. Milton.
Meantime the Trojan cuts his wat'ry way, Fix'd on his voyage thro' the curling sea; Then casting back his eyes with dire amaze, Sees on the punick shore, the mounting blaze. Dryden.

AMAZEDLY. adv. [from amazed.] Confusedly; with amazement: with confusion.

I speak amazedly, and it becomes

My marvel, and my message. Shakespeare.
Stands Macbeth thus amazedly!

Come, sisters, cheer we up his spirits. Shakespeare.

AMAZEDNESS. n. f. [from amazed.] The state of being amazed; astonishment; wonder; confusion.

I was by at the opening of the farthel, heard the old shepherd deliver the manner how he found it; whereupon, after a little amazedness, we were all commanded out of the chamber. Shakespeare.

AMAZEMENT. n. f. [from amaze.]

1. Such a confused apprehension as does not leave reason its full force; extreme fear; horror.

He answer'd nought at all; but adding new Fear to his first amazement, staring wide, With stony eyes, and heartless hollow hue, Astonish'd stood, as one that had espied Infernal furies, with their chains untied. Fairy Queen.

But look! amazement on thy mother sits;

O step between her and her fighting soul:

Concurs in weakest bodies strongest works. Shakespeare.

2. Extreme dejection.

He ended, and his words impression left Of much amazement to th' infernal crew, Distracted and surpris'd with deep dismay At these sad tidings. Milton.

3. Height of admiration.

Had you, some ages past, this race of glory Run, with amazement we should read your story; But living virtue, all achievements past, Meets envy still to grapple with at last. Waller.

4. Astonishment; wonder at an unexpected event.

They knew that it was he which sat for alms at the Beautiful gate of the temple, and they were filled with wonder and amazement at that which had happened unto him. Acts.

AMAZING. participial adj. [from amaze.] Wonderful; astonishing.

It is an amazing thing to see the present desolation of Italy, when one considers what incredible multitudes it abounded with during the reigns of the Roman emperours. Addison.

AMAZINGLY. adv. [from amazing.] To a degree that may excite astonishment; wonderfully.

If we arise to the world of spirits, our knowledge of them must be amazingly imperfect, when there is not the least grain of sand but has too many difficulties belonging to it, for the wisest philosopher to answer. Watt's Logic.

AMAZON. n. f. [a and mazō.] The Amazons were a race of women famous for valour, who inhabited Caucasus; they are so called from their cutting off their breasts, to use their weapons better. A warlike woman; a virago.

Stay, stay thy hands, thou art an amazon, And fightest with the sword. Shakespeare.

AMBAAGES. n. f. [Lat.] A circuit of words; a circumlocutory form of speech; a multiplicity of words; an indirect manner of expression.

They gave those complex ideas names, that they might the more easily record and discourse of things they were daily conversant in, without long ambages and circumlocutions; and that the things, they were continually to give and receive information about, might be the easier and quicker understood. Locke.

AMBAIGIOUS. adj. [from ambages.] Circumlocutory; perplexed; tedious. Dea.

AMBASSADE. n. f. [ambassade, Fr.] Embassy; character or business of an ambassador: a word not now in use.

When you disgraced me in my ambassade, Then I degraded you from being king. Shakespeare.

AMBASSADOUR. n. f. [ambassadeur, Fr. ambaxador, Span.] It is written differently, as it is supposed to come from the French or Spanish language; and the original derivation being uncertain, it is not easy to settle its orthography. Some derive it from the Hebrew מבשר, totell, and מבשר, a messenger; others from ambactus, which, in the old Gaulish, signified a servant; whence ambascia, in low Latin, is found to signify service, and ambasiator, a servant; others deduce it from ambacht, in old Teutonic, signifying a government, and Junius mentions a possibility of its descent from ambax; and others from am for ad, and basus, bas, as supposing the act of sending an ambassador, to be in some sort an act of submission. All these derivations lead to write ambassadour, not ambassador. A person sent in a public manner from one sovereign power to another, and supposed to represent the power from which he is sent. The person of an ambassador is inviolable.

Ambassadour is, in popular language, the general name of a messenger from a sovereign power, and sometimes ludicrously, from common persons. In the juridical and formal language, it signifies particularly a minister of the highest rank residing in another country, and is distinguished from an envoy, who is of less dignity.

Give first admittance to th' ambassadours. Shakespeare.

Rais'd by these hopes, I sent no news before, Nor ask'd you leave, nor did your faith implore; But come, without a pledge, my own ambassadour. Dryden.

Oft have their black ambassadours appear'd Loaden with gifts, and fill'd the courts of Zama. Addison.

AMBASSADRESS. n. f. [ambassadeur, Fr.]

1. The lady of an ambassadour.

2. In ludicrous language, a woman sent on a message.

Well, my ambassadess — Come you to menace war, and loud defiance? Or does the peaceful olive grace your brow? Rowe.

AMBASSAGE. n. f. [from ambassadour.] An embassy; the business of an ambassador.

Maximilian entertained them with dilatory answers; so as the formal part of their ambassage might well warrant their further stay. Bacon.

AMBER. n. f. [from ambar, Arab. whence the lower writers formed ambaram.]

A yellow transparent substance of a gumous or bituminous consistence, but a resinous taste, and a smell like oil of turpentine; chiefly found in the Baltick sea, along the coasts of Prussia. Some naturalists refer it to the vegetable, others to the mineral, and some even to the animal kingdom. Pliny describes it as a resinous juice, oozing from aged pines and firs, and discharged thence into the sea. He adds, that it was hence the ancients gave it the denomination of succinum from succus, juice. Some have imagined it a concretion of the tears of birds; others, the urine of a beast; others, the scum of the lake Cephalis, near the Atlantick; others, a congelation formed in the Baltick, and in some fountains, where it is found swimming like pitch. Others suppose it a bitumen trickling into the sea from subterraneous sources; but this opinion is also discarded, as good amber having been found in digging at a considerable distance from the sea, as that gathered on the coast. Boerhaave ranks it with camphire, which is a concrete oil of aromatick plants, elaborated by heat into a chrystalline form. Within some pieces of amber have been found leaves, and insects included; which seems to indicate, either that the amber was originally in a fluid state, or, that having been exposed to the sun, it was softened, and rendered susceptible of the leaves and insects. Amber, when rubbed, draws or attracts bodies to it; and, by friction, is brought to yield light pretty copiously in the dark. Some distinguish amber into yellow, white, brown, and black: but the two latter are supposed to be of a different nature and denomination; the one called jet, the other ambergris. Trevaux. Chambers.

Liquid amber, is a kind of native balsam or resin, like turpentine; clear, reddish, or yellowish; of a pleasant smell, almost like ambergris. It flows from an incision made in the bark of a fine large tree in New Spain, called by the natives osofol. Chambers.

If light penetrateth any clear body, that is coloured, as painted glass, amber, water, and the like, it gives the light the colour of its medium. Peachment.

No interwoven reeds a garland made, To hide his brows within the vulgar shade; But poplar wreaths around his temples spread, And tears of amber trickled down his head. Addison.

The spoils of elephants the roofs inlay, And studded amber darts a golden ray. Pope.

AMBER. adj. Consisting of amber.

With scarfs, and fans, and double charge of brav'ry,

With amber bracelets, beads, and all this knav'ry. Shakespeare.

AMBER DRINK. n. f. Drink of the colour of amber, or resembling amber in colour and transparency.

All your clear amber drink is flat. Bacon.

AMBERGRIS. n. f. [from amber and gris, or grey; that is, grey amber.]

A fragrant drug, that melts almost like wax commonly of a greyish or ash colour, used both as a perfume and a cordial. Some imagine it to be the excrement of a bird, which, being melted by the heat of the sun, and washed off the shore, by the waves, is swallowed by whales, who return it back in the condition we find it. Others conclude it to be the excrement of a cetaceous fish, because sometimes found in the intestines of such animals. But we have no instance of any excrement capable of melting like wax; and if it were the excrement of a whale, it should rather be found where these animals abound, as about Greenland. Others take it for a kind of wax or gum, which distils from trees, and drops into the sea, where it congeals. Many of the orientals imagine it springs out of the sea, as naphtha does out of some fountains. Others assert it to be a vegetable production, issuing out of the root of a tree, whose roots always shoot toward the sea, and discharge themselves into it. Others maintain, that ambergris is made from the honey-combs, which fall into the sea from the rocks, where the bees had formed their nests; several persons having seen pieces that were half ambergris, and half plain honey-comb; and others have found large pieces of ambergris, in which, when broke, honey-comb, and honey too, were found in the middle. Neumann absolutely denies it to be an animal substance, as not yielding in the analysis, any one animal principle. He concludes it to be a bitumen issuing out of the earth into the sea; at first of a viscous consistence, but hardening, by its mixture with some liquid naphtha, into the form in which we find it.

Trevoux, Chambers.

Bermudas wall'd with rocks, who does not know

That happy island, where huge lemons grow,
Where shining pearl, coral, and many a pound,
On the rich shore, of ambergris is found. Waller.

AMBER SEED, or meja seed, resembles millet, is of a bitterish taste, and brought dry from Martinico and Egypt. Chambers.

AMBER TREE. n. f. [frutex Africanus ambram spinens.] A shrub, whose beauty is in its small evergreen leaves, which grow as close as heath, and, being bruised between the fingers, emit a very fragrant odour. Miller.

AMBIDEXTER. n. f. [Lat.]

1. A man who has equally the use of both his hands.

Rodiginus, undertaking to give a reason of ambidexters, and left-handed men delivereth a third opinion. Brown.

2. A man who is equally ready to act on either side, in party disputes. This sense is ludicrous.

AMBIDEXTERTY. n. f. [from ambidexter.]

1. The quality of being able equally to use both hands.

2. Double dealing.

AMBIDEXTROUS. adj. [from ambidexter, Lat.]

1. Having, with equal facility, the use of either hand.

Others, not considering ambidextrous and left-handed men, do totally submit unto the efficacy of the liver. Brown.

2. Double-dealing; practising on both sides.

Æsop condemns the double practices of trimmers, and all false, shuffling, and ambidextrous dealings. L'Estrange.

AMBIDEXTROUSNESS. n. f. [from ambidextrous.]

The quality of being ambidextrous. Dict.

AMBIENT. adj. [ambius, Lat.] Surrounding; encompassing; investing.

This which yields or fills

All space, the ambient air wide interfus'd. Milt.
The thickness of a plate requisite to produce any colour, depends only on the density of the plate, and not on that of the ambient medium.

Newton's Opticks.

Around him dance the rosy hours,
And damasking the ground with flow'rs,
With ambient sweets perfume the morn.

Fenton to L. Gower.

Illustrious virtues, who by turns have rose,
With happy laws her empire to sustain,
And with full pow'r assert her ambient main.

Prior.

The ambient æther is too liquid and empty, to impel horizontally with that prodigious celerity.

Bentley.

AMBIGU. n. f. [French.] An entertainment, consisting not of regular courses, but of a medley of dishes set on together.

When straiten'd in your time, and servants few,
You'd richly then compose an ambigu;
Where first and second course, and your desert,
All in one single table have their part.

King's Art of Cookery.

AMBIGUITY. n. f. [from ambiguous.] Doubtfulness of meaning; uncertainty of signification; double meaning.

With ambiguities they often entangle themselves, not marking what doth agree to the word of God in itself, and what in regard of outward accidents.

Hooker.

We can clear these ambiguities,
And know their spring, their head, their true descent.

Shakespeare.

The words are of single signification, without any ambiguity; and therefore I shall not trouble you, by straining for an interpretation, where there is no difficulty; or distinction, where there is no difference. South.

AMBIGUOUS. adj. [ambiguous, Lat.]

1. Doubtful; having two meanings; of uncertain signification.

But what have been thy answers, what but dark, Ambiguous, and with doubtful sense deluding. Milton.

Some expressions in the covenant were ambiguous, and were left so; because the persons who framed them were not all of one mind. Charvenden.

2. Applied to persons using doubtful expressions.

It is applied to expressions, or those that use them, not to a dubious, or suspended state of mind.

Th' ambiguous God, who rul'd her lab'ring breast,
In these mysterious words his mind exprest;
Some truths reveal'd, in terms involv'd the rest. Dryden.

Silence at length the gay Antinous broke,
Constrain'd a smile, and thus ambiguous spoke. Pope.

AMBIGUOUSLY. adv. [from ambiguous.] In an ambiguous manner; doubtfully; uncertainly; with double meaning.

AMBIGUOUSNESS. n. f. [from ambiguous.] The quality of being ambiguous; uncertainty of meaning; duplicity of signification.

AMBIGUITY. n. f. [from ambe, Lat. and logy.]

Talk of ambiguous or doubtful signification. Dict.

AMBIGUOUS. adj. [from ambo and loquor, Lat.] Using ambiguous and doubtful expressions. Dict.

AMBIGUOUS. n. f. [ambiguum, Lat.] The use of doubtful and indeterminate expressions; discourse of doubtful meaning. Dict.

AMBIT. n. f. [ambitus, Lat.] The compass or circuit of any thing; the line that encompasses any thing.

The tusk of a wild boar winds about almost into a perfect ring or hoop; only it is a little writhen. In measuring by the ambit, it is long or round about a foot and two inches; its basis an inch over. Grew's Museum.

AMBITION. n. f. [ambitio, Lat.] The desire of something higher than is possessed at present.

1. The desire of preferment or honour.

Who would think, without having such a mind as Antiphus; that so great goodness could not have bound gratefulness? and so high advancement not have satisfied his ambition? Sidney.

2. The desire of any thing great or excellent.

The quick'ning power would be, and so would rest;

The sense would not be only, but he well:
But wit's ambition longeth to the best,
For it desires in endless bliss to dwell. Davies.

Urge them, while their souls

Are capable of this ambition:

Left zeal now melted by the windy breath

Of soft petitions, pity and remorse,

Cool and congeal again to what it was. Shakespeare.

3. It is used with to before a verb, and of before a noun.

I had a very early ambition to recommend myself to your Lordship's patronage. Addison.

There was an ambition of wit, and an affectation of gaiety. Pope's Preface to his Letters.

AMBITIOUS. adj. [ambitiosus, Lat.]

1. Seized or touched with ambition; desirous of advancement; eager of honours; aspiring. It has the particle of before the object of ambition, if a noun; to if expressed by a verb.

We seem ambitious God's whole work t'undo. Downe.

The neighb'ring monarchs, by thy beauty led,
Contend in crowds, ambitious of thy bed:
The world is at thy choice, except but one,
Except but him thou canst not choose alone. Dryden.

You have been pleased not to suffer an old man to go discontented out of the world, for want of that protection, of which he had been so long ambitious. Dryden.

Trajan, a prince ambitious of glory, defended to the mouths of the Tigris and Euphrates, and went upon the ocean, where, seeing a vessel trading to the Indies, he had thoughts of outdoing Alexander. Arbutnot on Coins.

2. Eager to grow bigger; aspiring.

I have seen

Th' ambitious ocean swell, and rage, and foam,
To be exalted with the threaten'ing clouds. Shakespeare.

AMBITIOUSLY. adv. [from ambitious.] In an ambitious manner; with eagerness of advancement or preference.

With such glad hearts did our despairing men
Salute th' appearance of the prince's fleet;
And each ambitiously would claim the ken,

That with first eyes did distant safety meet. Dryden.

Here Flecknoe, as a place to fame well known,
Ambitiously design'd his Sh—'s throne. Dryden.

AMBITIOUSNESS. n. f. [from ambitious.] The quality of being ambitious.

AMBITUDE. n. f. [ambio, Lat.] Compass; circuit; circumference. Dict.

TO AMBLE. v. n. [ambler, Fr. ambule, Lat.]

1. To move upon an amble. [See AMBLE.]

It is good, on some occasions, to enjoy as much of the present, as will not endanger our futurity; and to provide ourselves of the virtuoso's fiddle, which will be sure to amble, when the world is upon the hardest trot. Dryden.

2. To move easily, without hard shocks or shaking.

Who ambles time withal?—A rich man that hath not the gout; for he lives merrily, because he feels no pain; knowing no burthen of heavy tedious penury; him time ambles withal. Shakespeare's As you like it.

3. In a ludicrous sense, to move with submission, and by direction; as, a horse that ambles, uses a gait not natural.

A laughing, toying, wheedling, wimpering she,
Shall make him amble on a gossip's message,
And take the distaff with a hand as patient,
As ere did Hercules. Roscoe's Junc Shore.

4. To walk daintily and affectedly.

I am rudely stamp'd, and want love's majesty,
To strut before a wanton ambling nymph. Shakespeare.

AMBLE. n. f. [from To amble.] A pace or movement in which the horse removes both his legs on one side; as, on the far side, he removes his fore and hinder leg of the same side at one time, whilst the legs on the near side stand still;

and, when the far legs are upon the ground, the near side removes the fore leg and hinder leg, and the legs on the far side stand still.—An amble is the first pace of young colts, but when they have strength to trot, they quit it.

There is no amble in the manage; riding-masters allow only of walk, trot, and gallop. A horse may be put from a trot to a gallop without stopping; but cannot be put from an amble to a gallop without a stop, which interrupts the justness of the manage. Farrier's Dict.

AMBLER. n. f. [from To amble.] A horse that has been taught to amble; a pacer.

AMBLINGLY. adv. [from ambling.] With an ambling movement.

AMBROSIA. n. f. [ambrosia.]

1. The imaginary food of the gods, from which every thing eminently pleasing to the smell or taste, is called ambrosia.

2. The name of a plant.

It has male flosculous flowers, produced on separate parts of the same plant from the fruit, having no visible petals; the fruit which succeeds the female flowers, is shaped like a club, and is prickly, containing one oblong seed in each.

The species are, 1. The marine or sea ambrosia.

2. Taller unfavoury sea ambrosia. 3. The tallest Canada ambrosia. Miller.

AMBROSIAL. adj. [from ambrosia.] Partaking of the nature or qualities of ambrosia; fragrant; delicious delectable.

Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance fill'd

All heaven, and in the blessed spirits elect

Sense of new joy ineffable diffus'd. Milton.

The gifts of heaven my following song pursues,
Aerial honey and ambrosial dews. Dryden.

To farthest shores th' ambrosial spirit flies,
Sweet to the world, and grateful to the skies. Pope.

Ambrosia

A M B

A'MERRY. n. f. [a word corrupted from almshouse.] 1. The place where the almoner lives, or where alms are distributed.

2. The place where plate, and utensils for house-keeping, are kept; also a cupboard for keeping cold victuals: a word still used in the northern counties, and in Scotland.

AMBS ACE. n. f. [from ambo, Lat. and acc.] A double ace, so called when two dice turn up the ace.

I had rather be in this choice, than throw ambs ace for my life. Shakefp. All's well that ends well.

This will be yet clearer, by considering his own instance of casting ambs ace, though it partake more of contingency than of freedom. Supposing the posture of the party's hand who did throw the dice, supposing the figure of the table, and of the dice themselves, supposing the measure of force applied, and supposing all other things which did concur to the production of that cast, to be the very same they were, there is no doubt but in this case the cast is necessary. Bramb. against Hobbs.

AMBULATION. n. f. [ambulatio, Lat.] The act of walking.

From the occult and invisible motion of the muscles, in station, proceed more offensive lastitudes than from ambulation. Brown's Vulgar Err.

A'MBULATORY. adj. [ambulus, Lat.]

1. That which has the power or faculty of walking.

The gradient or ambulatory, are such as require some basis, or bottom, to uphold them in their motions: such were those self-moving statues, which, unless violently detained, would of themselves run away. Wilkins's Math. Mag.

2. That which happens during a passage or walk.

He was sent to conduce hither the princess of whom his majesty had an ambulatory view in his travels. Wotton.

3. Moveable; as, an ambulatory court; a court which removes from place to place for the exercise of its jurisdiction.

A'MBURY. n. f. A bloody wart on any part of a horse's body.

AMBUSCADE. n. f. [embuscade, Fr. See AM-BUSH.] A private station in which men lie to surprise others; ambush.

Then waving high her torch, the signal made, Which rous'd the Grecians from their ambuscade. Dryden.

When I behold a fashionable table set out, I fancy that gout, fevers, and lethargies, with innumerable distempers, lie in ambuscade among the dishes. Addison.

AMBUSCA'DO. n. f. [embuscada, Span.] A private post, in order to surprise an enemy.

Sometimes she driveth o'er a soldier's neck, And then he dreams of cutting foreign throats, Of breaches, ambuscades, Spanish blades, Of healths five fathom deep. Shakefp. Rom. and Jul.
AMBUH. n. f. [ambush, Fr. from bois, a wood; whence ambusher, to hide in woods, ambushes being commonly laid under the concealment of thick forests.

1. The post where soldiers or assassins are placed, in order to fall unexpectedly upon an enemy.

The residue retired deceitfully towards the place of their ambush, whence issued more. Then the earl maintained the fight. But the enemy intending to draw the English further into their ambush, turned away at an easy pace. Hayward.

Charge, charge, their ground the faint Taxallans yield,

Bold in close ambush, base in open field. Dryden's Ind. Emp.

2. The act of surprizing another, by lying in wait, or lodging in a secret post.

Nor shall we need, With dangerous expedition to invade Heaven, whose high walls fear no assault or siege, Or ambush from the deep. Milton's Paradise Lost.

3. The state of being posted privately, in order to surprise; the state of lying in wait.

4. Perhaps the persons placed in private stations. For you, my noble lord of Lancaster, Once did I lay an ambush for your life. Shakefpere's Richard II.

A M E

A'MBUSHED. adj. [from ambush.] Placed in ambush; lying in wait.

Thick as the shades, there issue swarming bands Of ambush'd men, whom, by their arms and drefs, To be Taxallan enemies I guess. Dryden's Ind. Emp.

A'MBUSHMENT. n. f. [from ambush; which see.] Ambush; surprise: a word now not used.

Like as a wily fox, that having spied Where on a funny bank the lambs do play, Full closely creeping by the hinder side, Lies in ambushment of his hoped prey. Spenser.

AMBU'ST. adj. [ambustus, Lat.] Burnt; scalded. Diſt.

AMBU'STION. n. f. [ambusio, Lat.] A burn; a scald.

A'MEL. n. f. [emil, Fr.] The matter with which the variegated works are overlaid, which we call enamelled.

The materials of glass melted with calcined tin, compose an undiaphanous body. This white amel is the basis of all those fine concretes that goldsmiths and artificers employ in the curious art of enamelling. Boyle on Colours.

AME'N. adv. [A word of which the original has given rise to many conjectures. Scaliger writes, that it is Arabick; and the Rabbies make it the compound of the initials of three words, signifying the Lord is a faithful king; but the word seems merely Hebrew, amen, which, with a long train of derivatives, signifies firmness, certainty, fidelity.] A term used in devotions, by which, at the end of a prayer, we mean, so be it; at the end of a creed, so it is.

One cried, God bless us! and, Amen! the other, As they had seen me with these hangman's hands.

Listening their fear, I could not say Amen, When they did say God bless us. Shakefp. Mac.

Blessed be the Lord God of Israel, from everlasting to everlasting, Amen and amen. Psalms xli. 13.

AMENABLE. adj. [amenable, Fr. amener quelqu'un, in the French courts, signifies, to oblige one to appear to answer a charge exhibited against him.] Responsible; subject so as to be liable to enquiries or accounts.

Again, because the inferior fort were loose and poor, and not amenable to the law, he provided, by another act, that five of the best and eldest persons of every sept, should bring in all the idle persons of their surname, to be justified by the law. Sir John Davies on Ireland.

A'MENAGE. n. f. [They seem to come from A'MENANCE. n. f. [amener, Fr.] Conduct; behaviour; mien: words disused.

For he is fit to use in all affairs, Whether for arms and warlike amenance, Or else for wife and civil governance. Spenser.

Well kend him so far space, Th' enchanter, by his arms and amenance, When under him he saw his Lybian steed to prance. Fair v Queen.

TO AMEND. v. a. [amender, Fr. emendo, Lat.]

1. To correct; to change any thing that is wrong to something better.

2. To reform the life, or leave wickedness. In these two cases we usually write mend. See MEND. Amend your ways and your doings, and I will cause you to dwell in this place. Jer. vii. 3.

3. To restore passages in writers, which the copiers are supposed to have depraved; to recover the true reading.

TO AMEND. v. n. To grow better To amend differs from to improve; to improve supposes or not denies that the thing is well already, but to amend implies something wrong.

As my fortune either amends or impairs, I may declare it unto you. Sidney.

At his touch Such sanctity hath heaven given his hand, They presently amend. Shakefpere's Macbeth.

AME'NDE. n. f. [French.] This word, in French, signifies a fine, by which recompence is supposed to be made for the fault committed. We use, in a cognate signification, the word amends.

AME'NDMENT. n. f. [amendement, Fr.]

A M E

1. A change from bad for the better.

Before it was presented on the stage, some things in it have passed your approbation and amendment. Dryden.

Man is always mending and altering his works; but nature observes the same tenour, because her works are so perfect, that there is no place for amendments; nothing that can be reprehended. Ray on the Creation.

There are many natural defects in the understanding, capable of amendment, which are overlooked and wholly neglected. Locke.

2. Reformation of life.

Our Lord and Saviour was of opinion, that they which would not be drawn to amendment of life, by the testimony which Moses and the prophets have given, concerning the miseries that follow sinners after death, were not likely to be persuaded by other means, although God from the dead should have raised them up preachers. Hooker.

Behold! famine and plague, tribulation and anguish, are sent as scourges for amendment. 2 Esdras, xvi. 19.

Though a serious purpose of amendment, and true acts of contrition, before the habit, may be accepted by God; yet there is no sure judgment whether this purpose be serious, or these acts true acts of contrition. Hammond's Practical Catechism.

3. Recovery of health.

Your honour's players hearing your amendment, Are come to play a pleasant comedy. Shakefpere.

AME'NDMENT. n. [emendatio, Lat.] It signifies, in law, the correction of an error committed in a process, and espied before or after judgment; and sometimes after the party's seeking advantage by the error. Blount.

AME'NDER. n. f. [from amend.] The person that amends any thing.

AME'NDS. n. f. [amende, Fr. from which it seems to be accidentally corrupted.] Recompence; compensation; atonement.

If I have too austere punish'd you, Your compensation makes amends. Shakefpere.

Of the amends recovered, little or nothing returns to those that had suffered the wrong, but commonly all runs into the prince's coffers. Raskin's Essays.

There I a pris'ner chain'd, scarce freely draw The air imprison'd also, close and damp,

Unwholesome draught; but here I feel amends, The breath of heav'n fresh blowing, pure and sweet,

With day-spring born; here leave me to respire. Milton.

Some little hopes I have yet remaining, that I may make the world some part of amends for many ill plays, by an heroic poem. Dryden.

If our souls be immortal, this makes abundant amends and compensation for the frailties of life, and sufferings of this state. Tillotson.

It is a strong argument for retribution hereafter, that virtuous persons are very often unfortunate, and vicious persons prosperous; which is repugnant to the nature of a Being, who appears infinitely wise and good in all his works; unless we may suppose that such a promiscuous distribution which was necessary for carrying on the designs of providence in this life, will be rectified and made amends for in another. Spektor.

AME'NITY. n. f. [amenitas, Fr. aminitas, Lat.] Pleasantness; agreeableness of situation.

If the situation of Babylon was such at first, as in the days of Herodotus, it was a seat of amenity and pleasure. Brown.

AME'NTACEOUS. adj. [amentatus, Lat.] Hanging as by a thread.

The pine-tree hath amentaceous flowers or katkins. Miller.

TO AMERCE. v. a. [amerce, Fr. opredre quelqu'un, seems to give the original.]

1. To punish with a pecuniary penalty; to exact a fine; to inflict a forfeiture. It is a word originally juridical, but adopted by other writers, and is used by Spenser of punishments in general. Where every one that misleth then her make, Shall be by him amerced with penance due. Spenser.

2. To punish with a pecuniary penalty; to exact a fine; to inflict a forfeiture. It is a word originally juridical, but adopted by other writers, and is used by Spenser of punishments in general. Where every one that misleth then her make, Shall be by him amerced with penance due. Spenser.

But I'll amerce you with so strong a fine,
That you shall all repent the loss of mine.

Shakespeare.

All the suitors were considerably amerced; yet this proved but an ineffectual remedy for those mischiefs.

Hale.

2. Sometimes with the particle in before the fine. They shall amerce him in an hundred shekels of silver, and give them unto the father of the damsel, because he hath brought up an evil name upon a virgin of Israel.

Deut. xxii. 19.

3. Sometimes it is used, in imitation of the Greek construction, with the particle of. Millions of spirits for his fault amerc'd Of heav'n, and from eternal splendours flung For his revolt.

Milton.

AMERCER. n. f. [from amerce.] He that sets a fine upon any misdemeanour; he that decrees or inflicts any pecuniary punishment or forfeiture.

AMERCEMENT. n. f. [from amerce.] The AMERCIAIMENT. } pecuniary punishment of an offender, who stands at the mercy of the king, or other lord in his court.

Corwell.

All amercements and fines that shall be imposed upon them, shall come unto themselves.

Spencer's State of Ireland.

AMES ACE. n. f. [a corruption of the word ambace, which appears from very old authorities, to have been early softened by omitting the b.] Two aces on two dice.

But then my study was to cog the dice
And dext'rously to throw the lucky dice:
To thum ames ace, that swept my stakes away;
And watch the box, for fear they should convey,
False bones, and put upon me in the play.

Dryd.

AMESS. n. f. [corrupted from amice.] A priest's vestment.

DiG.

AMETHO'DICAL. adj. [from a and method.] Out of method; without method; irregular.

AMETHYST. n. f. [from amethystos, contrary to wine, or contrary to drunkenness; so called, either because it is not quite of the colour of wine, or because it was imagined to prevent inebriation.] A precious stone of a violet colour, bordering on purple. The oriental amethyst is the hardest, fairest, and most valuable; it is generally of a dove colour, though some are purple, and others white like the diamond. The German is of a violet colour, and the Spanish are of three sorts; the best are the blackest or deepest violet; others are almost quite white, and some few tinged with yellow. The amethyst is not extremely hard, but easy to be engraved upon, and is next in value to the emerald.

Savary, Chambers.

Some stones approached the granate complexion; and several nearly resembled the amethyst.

Woodward.

AMETHYST. [in heraldry] signifies the same colour in a nobleman's coat, that purple does in a gentleman's.

AMETHYSTINE. adj. [from amethyst.] Resembling an amethyst in colour.

A kind of amethystine flint not composed of crystals or grains, but one entire massy stone.

Grew.

AMIA'BLE. adj. [from amabile, Fr.] 1. Lovely; pleasing.

That which is good in the actions of men, doth not only delight as profitable, but as amiable also.

Hooker.

She told her, while she kept it,
'Twould make her amiable, subdue my father
Intirely to her love; but if she lost it,
Or made a gift of it, my father's eye
Should hold her loathed.

Shakespeare, Othello.

2. Pretending love; shewing love. Lay amiable siege to the honesty of this Ford's wife; use your art of wooing.

Shakespeare.

AMIA'BLENESS. n. f. [from amiable.] The quality of being amiable; loveliness; power of raising love.

As soon as the natural gaiety and amiableness of the young man wears off, they have nothing left to commend them, but lie by among the lumber and refuse of the species.

Addison.

AMIA'BL. adv. [from amiable.] In an amiable manner; in such a manner as to excite love.

AMICABLE. adj. [from amicus, Lat.] Friendly; kind. It is commonly used of more than one; as, they lived in an amicable manner; but we seldom say, an amicable action, or an amicable man, though it be so used in this passage.

O grace serene; oh virtue heav'nly fair,
Divine oblivion of low-thoughted care!
Fresh blooming hope, gay daughter of the sky!
And faith, our early immortality!

Enter each mild, each amicable guest;
Receive and wrap me in eternal rest.

Pope.

AMICABLENESS. n. f. [from amicable.] The quality of being amicable; friendliness; goodwill.

AMICABLY. adv. [from amicable.] In an amicable manner; in a friendly way; with goodwill and concord.

They see

Through the dun mist, in blooming beauty fresh,
Two lovely youths, that amicably walk
O'er verdant meads, and pleas'd, perhaps, revolv'd
Anna's late conquests.

Philips.

I found my subjects amicably join,
To lessen their defects, by citing mine.

Prior.

In Am itself, where it is pretended that the variety of sects live so amicably together, it is notorious how a turbulent party, joining with the Arminians, did attempt to destroy the republic.

Swift on the Sentiments of a Church of Englandman.

AMICE. n. f. [from amicus, Lat. amici, Fr. Primum ex sex indumentis episcopi & presbyteris communibus sunt, amictus, alba, cingulum, stola, manipulus, & planities. Du Cange. Amictus quo collum stringitur, & pectus tegitur, castitatem interioris hominis d. signat; tegit enim cor, ne vanitates cogitet, stringit autem collum, ne inde ad linguam transeat maledictio. Bruno.] The first or undermost part of a priest's habit, over which he wears the alb.

Thus pass'd the night so foul, till morning fair
Came forth with pilgrim steps in amice grey.

Milton.

On some a priest, fuccinct in amice white,
Attends.

Pope.

AMID. n. f. } prop. [from a and mid, or midst.]
AMIDST. n. f. }

1. In the midst; equally distant from either extremity.

Of the fruit

Of each tree in the garden we may eat;
But of the fruit of this fair tree amidst

The garden, God hath said, ye shall not eat.

Milton.

The two ports, the bagnio, and the Donatelli's statue of the great duke, amidst the four slaves, chained to his pedestal, are very noble sights.

Addison.

2. Mingled with; surrounded by; in the ambit of another thing.

Amid my flock with woe my voice I tear,
And, but bewitch'd, who to his flock would moan?

Sidney.

So hills amid the air encounter'd hills,
Hurl'd to and fro, with jaculation dire.

Milton.

What have I done, to name that wealthy swain,
The boar amidst my crystal streams I bring;
And southern winds to blast my flow'ry spring.

Dryden.

Amata's breast the fury thus invades,
And fires with rage amid the sylvan shades.

Dryd.

3. Amongst; conjoined with.

What tho' no real voice nor found
Amid the radiant orbs be found?

Addison.

In reason's ear they all rejoice,
And utter forth a glorious voice,
For ever singing, as they shine,
"The hand that made us is divine."

Addison.

AMIS. adv. [from a, which, in this form of composition, often signifies according to, and mis, the English particle, which shews any thing, like the Greek malos, to be wrong; as, to miscount, to count erroneously; to misdo, to commit a crime: amis therefore signifies not right, or out of order.]

1. Faulty; criminal.

For that which thou hast sworn to do amis,
Is yet amis when it is truly done.

Shakespeare's King John.

2. Faultily; criminally.

We hope therefore to reform ourselves, if at any time we have done amis, is not to sever ourselves from the church we were of before.

Hooker.

O ye powers that search
The heart of man, and weigh his inmost thoughts,
If I have done amis, impute it not.

Addison.

3. In an ill sense. She sigh'd withal, they constru'd all amis,
And thought she wish'd to kill who long'd to kiss.

Fairfax.

4. Wrong; improper; unfit.

Examples have not generally the force of laws, which all men ought to keep, but of counsels only and persuasions, not amis to be followed by them, whose case is the like.

Hooker.

Methinks, though a man had all science, and all principles, yet it might not be amis to have some conscience.

Tillotson.

5. Wrong; not according to the perfection of the thing, whatever it be.

Your kindred is not much amis, 'tis true;
Yet I am somewhat better born than you.

Dryden.

I built a wall, and when the masons plaid the knaves, nothing delighted me so much as to stand by, while my servants threw down what was amis.

Swift.

6. Reproachful; irreverent.

Every people, nation, and language, which speak any thing amis against the God of Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego, shall be cut in pieces, and their houses shall be made a dunghill; because there is no other God that can deliver after this sort.

Daniel, iii. 29.

7. Impaired in health; as, I was somewhat amis yesterday, but am well to day.

8. Amis is marked as an adverb, though it cannot always be adverbially rendered; because it always follows the substantive to which it relates, contrary to the nature of adjectives in English; and though we say the action was amis, we never say an amis action.

9. Amis is used by Shakespeare as a noun substantive.

To my sick soul, as sin's true nature is,
Each toy seems prologue to some great amis.

Hamlet.

AMIS'SION. n. f. [from amissio, Lat.] Loss.

To AMIS'T. v. a. [from amitto, Lat.] To lose: a word little in use.

Ice is water congealed by the frigidity of the air, whereby it acquireth no new form, but rather a consistence or determination of its diffusivity, and amittit not its essence, but condition of fluidity.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

AMITY. n. f. [from amicitia, Fr. amicitia, Lat.] Friendship, whether publick between nations, opposed to war, or among the people, opposed to discord, or between private persons.

The prophet David did think, that the very meeting of men together, and their accompanying one another to the house of God, should make the bond of their love insoluble, and tie them in a league of inviolable amity.

Hooker.

The monarchy of Great Britain was in league and amity with all the world.

Sir John Davies on Ireland.

You have a noble and a true conceit
Of godlike amity; which appears most strongly
In bearing thus the absence of your lord.

Shakespeare.

And ye, oh Tyrians, with immortal hate
Pursue this race, this service dedicate
To my deplored ashes; let there be
'Twixt us and them no league nor amity.

Denham.

AMMONI'AC. n. f. The name of a drug.

GUM AMMONIAC is brought from the East Indies, and is supposed to ooze from an umbelliferous plant. Dioscorides says, it is the juice of a kind of ferula growing in Barbary, and the plant is called agafyllis. Pliny calls the tree metopion, which, he says, grows near the temple of Jupiter Ammon, whence the gum takes its name. It ought to be in dry drops, white within, yellowish without, easily fusible, refinous, somewhat bitter, and of a very sharp taste and smell, somewhat like

like

like garlick. This gum is said to have served the ancients for incense, in their sacrifices.

Savary. Trevoux.

SAL AMMONIAC is a volatile salt of two kinds, ancient and modern. The ancient salt, described by Pliny and Dioscorides, was a native salt, generated in those large inns where the crouds of pilgrims, coming from the temple of Jupiter Ammon, used to lodge; who, travelling upon camels, and those creatures in Cyrene, where that celebrated temple stood, urining in the stable, or, in the parched sands, out of this urine, which is remarkably strong, arose a kind of salt, denominated sometimes from the temple, Ammoniac, and sometimes from the country, Cyreniac. No more of this salt is produced there; and, from this deficiency, some suspect there never was any such thing: but this suspicion is removed, by the large quantities of salt, nearly of the same nature, thrown out by mount Atna.

The modern sal ammoniac is made in Egypt; where long-necked glass bottles, filled with foot, a little sea salt, and the urine of cattle, and having their mouths luted with a piece of wet cotton, are placed over an oven or furnace, in a thick bed of ashes, nothing but the necks appearing, and kept there two days and a night, with a continual strong fire. The steam swells up the cotton, and forms a paste at the vent-hole, hindering the salts from evaporating; which stick to the top of the bottle, and are taken out in those large cakes, which they send to England. Only foot exhaled from dung, is the proper ingredient in this preparation; and the dung of camels affords the strongest.

Our chymists imitate the Egyptian sal ammoniac, by adding one part of common salt to five of urine; with which some mix that quantity of foot, and putting the whole in a vessel they raise from it, by sublimation, a white, friable, farinaceous substance, which they call sal ammoniac.

Chambers.

AMMONIACAL. adj. [from ammoniac.] Having the properties of ammoniac salt.

Human blood calcin'd, yields no fixed salt; nor is it a sal ammoniac; for that remains immutable after repeated distillations; and distillation destroys the ammoniacal quality of animal salt, and turns them alkaline: so that it is a salt neither quite fixed, nor quite volatile, nor quite acid, nor quite alkaline, nor quite ammoniacal; but soft and benign, approaching nearest to the nature of sal ammoniac.

Arbutnot.

AMMUNITION. n. f. [supposed by some to come from amunio, which, in the barbarous ages, seems to have signified supply of provision; but it, surely, may be more reasonably derived from munio, fortification; chose à munitions, things for the fortresses.] Military stores.

They must make themselves defensible against strangers; and must have the assistance of some able military man, and convenient arms and ammunition for their defence.

Bacon.

The colonel staid to put in the ammunition he brought with him; which was only twelve barrels of powder, and twelve hundred weight of match.

Clarendon.

All the rich mines of learning ransackt are, To furnish ammunition for this war.

Denham.

But now his stores of ammunition spent, His naked valour is his only guard:

Rare thunders are from his dumb cannon sent, And solitary guns are scarcely heard.

Dryden.

AMMUNITION BREAD. n. f. Bread for the supply of the armies or garrisons.

AMNESTY. n. f. [ἀμνηστία.] An act of oblivion; an act by which crimes against the government, to a certain time, are so obliterated, that they can never be brought into charge.

I never read of a law enacted to take away the force of all laws, by which a man may safely commit upon the last of June, what he would infallibly be hanged for, if he committed it on the first of July; by which the greatest criminals may escape, provided they continue long enough in power to antiquate their crimes, and, by stifling them a while, deceive the legislature into an amnesty.

Swift.

AMNICOLIST. n. f. [amicola, Lat.] Inhabiting near a river.

DiA.

AMNIGENOUS. n. f. [amnigenus, Lat.] Born of a river.

DiA.

AMNION. } n. f. [Lat. perhaps from ἀμνιον.]
AMNIOS. }

The innermost membrane with which the fetus in the womb is most immediately covered, and with which the rest of the secundines, the chorion, and alantois, are ejected after birth. It is whiter and thinner than the chorion. It also contains a nutritious humour, separated by glands for that purpose, with which the fetus is preserved. It is outwardly clothed with the urinary membrane, and the chorion, which sometimes stick so close to one another, that they can scarce be separated. It has also its vessels from the same origin as the chorion.

Quincy.

AMOMUM. n. f. [Lat.] A sort of fruit.

The commentators on Pliny and Dioscorides differ about the ancient amomum; but the generality of them suppose it to be a fruit different from ours. The modern amomum appears to be the sison of the ancients, or bastard fennel. It resembles the muscat grape, grows in clusters, and is about the thickness of a pea. The fruit is brought from the East-Indies, and makes part of the composition of treacle. It is of a hot spicy taste and smell.

Trevoux. Chambers.

AMONG. } prep. [among, german, Saxon.]
AMONGST. }

1. Mingled with; placed with other persons or things on every side.

Amongst strawberries sow here and there some borage seed; and you shall find the strawberries under those leaves far more large than their fellows.

Bacon.

The voice of God they heard, Now walking in the garden, by soft winds Brought to their ears, while day declin'd: they heard,

And from his presence hid themselves among The thickest trees, both man and wife.

Milton.

2. Conjoined with others, so as to make part of the number.

I have then, as you see, observed the failings of many great wits amongst the moderns, who have attempted to write an epic poem.

Dryden.

There were, among the old Roman statues, several of Venus in different postures and habits; as there are many particular figures of her made after the same design.

Addison.

AMORIST. n. f. [from amour.] An innamorato; a gallant; a man professing love.

Female beauties are as fickle in their faces as their minds; though casualties should spare them, age brings in a necessity of decay; leaving doters upon red and white, perplexed by uncertainty both of the continuance of their mistress's kindness, and her beauty, both which are necessary to the amorist's joys and quiet.

Boyle.

AMOROUSO. n. f. [Ital.] A man enamoured.

DiA.

AMOROUS. adj. [amoroso, Ital.]

1. In love; enamoured; with the particle of before the thing loved; in Shakespeare, on.

Sure my brother is amorous on Hero; and hath withdrawn her father to break with him about it.

Shakespeare.

The am'rous master own'd her potent eyes, Sigh'd when he look'd, and trembl'd as he drew;

Each flowing line confirm'd his first surprize, And as the piece advanc'd, the passion grew.

Prior.

2. Naturally inclined to love; disposed to fondness; fond.

Apes, as soon as they have brought forth their young, keep their eyes fastened on them, and are never weary of admiring their beauty; so amorous is nature of whatsoever the produces.

Dryden. Dufresnoy.

3. Relating, or belonging to love.

I that am not shap'd for sportive tricks, Nor made to court an am'rous looking-glass,

I, that am rudely stamp'd.

Shakespeare. Rich. III.

And, into all things from her air inspir'd The spirit of love, and amorous delight.

Milton.

In the amorous net First caught they lik'd; and each his liking chose.

Milton.

O! how I long my careless limbs to lay Under the plantane's shade, and all the day With am'rous airs my fancy entertain,

Invoke the muses, and improve my vein! Wallr.

AMOROUSLY. adv. [from amorous.] Fondly; lovingly.

When thou wilt swim in that live-bath, Each fish, which every channel hath, Will amorously to thee swim, Gladder to catch thee, than thou him. Dante.

AMOROUSNESS. n. f. [from amorous.] The quality of being amorous; fondness; lovingness; love.

All Gynecia's actions were interpreted by Bafilus, as proceeding from jealousy of his amorousness.

Sidney.

Lindamor has wit, and amorousness enough to make him find it more easy to defend fair ladies, than to defend himself against them.

Boyle on Colours.

AMORT. adv. [à la mort, Fr.] In the state of the dead: dejected; depressed; ipiritless.

How fares my Kate? what, sweeting, all amort?

Shakespeare. Taming of the Shrew.

AMORTIZATION. } n. f. [amortissement, amor-
AMORTIZEMENT, } tissement, Fr.] The right or act of transferring lands to mortmain; that is, to some community, that never is to cease.

Every one of the religious orders was confirmed by one pope or other; and they made an especial provision for them, after the laws of amortization were devised and put in use by princes.

Ayliffe's Paragon Juris Canonici.

To AMORTIZE. v. a. [amortir, Fr.] To alien lands or tenements to any corporation, guild, or fraternity, and their successors; which cannot be done without licence of the king, and the lord of the manour.

Blount.

This did concern the kingdom to have farms sufficient to maintain an able body out of penury, and to amortize part of the lands unto the yeomanry, or middle part of the people.

Bacon.

To AMOVE. v. a. [amovere, Lat.]

1. To remove from a post or station: a juridical sense.

2. To remove; to move; to alter; a sense now out of use.

Therewith, amoved from his sober mood, And lives he yet, said he, that wrought this act?

And do the heavens afford him vital food?

Fairy Queen.

At her so piteous cry was much amoved Her champion stout.

Fairy Queen.

To AMOUNT. v. n. [monter, Fr.]

1. To rise to in the accumulative quantity; to compose in the whole; with the particle to. It is used of several sums in quantities added together.

Let us compute a little more particularly how much this will amount to, or how many oceans of water would be necessary to compose this great ocean rowling in the air, without bounds or banks.

Burnt's Theory.

2. It is used, figuratively, of the consequence rising from any thing taken altogether.

The errors of young men are the ruin of business; but the errors of aged men amount to this, that more might have been done, or sooner.

Bacon.

Judgments that are made on the wrong side of the danger, amount to no more than an affectation of skill, without either credit or effect. L'Estrange.

AMOUNT. n. f. [from To amount.] The sum total; the result of several sums or quantities accumulated.

And now, ye lying vanities of life, Where are you now, and what is your amount?

Vexation, disappointment, and remorse. Thompson.

AMOUR. n. f. [amour, Fr. amor, Lat.] An affair of gallantry; an intrigue: generally used of vicious love. The ou sounds like oo in poor.

No man is of so general and diffusive a lust, as to professure

profecure

prosecute his amours all the world over; and let it burn never so outrageously, yet the impure flame will either die of itself, or consume the body that harbours it.

The restless youth search'd all the world around,
But how can Jove in his amours be found?

AMPER. n. f. [amppe, Sax.] A tumour, with inflammation; bile; a word said, by Skinner, to be much in use in Essex; but, perhaps, not found in books.

AMPHIBIOUS. adj. [αἰψυ and βίωσις.]

1. That which partakes of two natures, so as to live in two elements; as, in air and water.

A creature of amphibious nature,

On land a beast, a fish in water.

Those are called amphibious, which live freely in the air, upon the earth, and yet are observed to live long upon water, as if they were natural inhabitants of that element; though it be worth the examination to know, whether any of those creatures that live at ease, and by choice, a good while, or at any time upon the earth, can live, a long time together, perfectly under water.

Fishes contain much oil, and amphibious animals participate somewhat of the nature of fishes, and are oily.

2. Of a mixt nature, in allusion to animals that live in air and water.

Traulus of amphibious breed,

Motley fruit of mongrel seed;

By the dam from lordlings sprung,

By the fire exhal'd from dung.

AMPHIBIOUSNESS. n. f. [from amphibious.] The quality of being able to live in different elements.

AMPHIBOLOGICAL. adj. [from amphibology.] Doubtful.

AMPHIBOLOGICALLY. adv. [from amphibologically.] Doubtfully; with a doubtful meaning.

AMPHIBOLOGY. n. f. [ἀμφιβολία.] Discourse of uncertain meaning. It is distinguished from equivocation, which means the double signification of a single word; as, noli regem occidere timere bonum est, is amphibology; captare lepores, meaning by lepores, either hares or jests, is equivocation.

Now the fallacies, whereby men deceive others, and are deceived themselves, the ancients have divided into verbal and real; of the verbal, and such as conclude from mistakes of the word, there are but two worthy our notation; the fallacy of equivocation and amphibology.

He that affirm'd, 'gainst sense, snow black to be,
Might prove it by this amphibology;
Things are not what they seem.

In defining obvious appearances, we are to use what is most plain and easy; that the mind be not misled by amphibologies, into fallacious deductions.

AMPHIBOLOUS. adj. [αἰψυ and βέβαιος.] Tossed from one to another; striking each way.

Never was there such an amphibolous quarrel, both parties declaring themselves for the king, and making use of his name in all their remonstrances, to justify their actions.

AMPHIBOLOGY. n. f. [αἰψυ and βέβαιος.] Equivocation; ambiguity.

AMPHISBÆNA. n. f. [Lat. αμφισβῆνα.] A serpent supposed to have two heads, and by consequence to move with either end foremost.

That the amphibæna, that is, a smaller kind of serpent, which moveth forward and backward, hath two heads, or one at either extreme, was affirmed by Nicander, and others.

Scorpion, and asp, and amphibæna dire.

AMPHISCILL. n. f. [Lat. αμφισκύλλω, of αἰψυ and σκία, a shadow.] Those people dwelling in climates, wherein the shadows, at different times of the year, fall both ways; to the north pole, when the sun is in the southern signs, and to the south pole, when he is in the northern signs. These are the people who inhabit the torrid zone.

AMPHITHEATRE. n. f. [Lat. αμφιθέατρον, of αἰψυ and θέατρον.] A building in a circular or oval form, having its area encompassed with rows of seats one above another; where spectators might behold spectacles, as stage-plays, or gladiators. The theatres of the ancients were built in the form of a semicircle, only exceeding a just semicircle by one fourth part of the diameter; and the amphitheatre is two theatres joined together; so that the longest diameter of the amphitheatre, was to the shortest, as one and a half to one.

Within, an amphitheatre appear'd
Rais'd in degrees: to sixty paces rear'd,
That when a man was plac'd in one degree,
Height was allow'd for him above to see.

Conceive a man placed in the burning iron chair at Lyons, amid the insults and mockeries of a croud'd amphitheatre, and still keeping his seat; or stretched upon a grate of iron, over coals of fire, and breathing out his soul, among the exquisite sufferings of such a tedious execution, rather than renounce his religion, or blaspheme his Saviour.

AMPLE. adj. [amplus, Lat.]

1. Large; wide; extended.

Heav'n descends

In universal bounty, shedding herbs,
And fruits, and flowers, on Nature's ample lap.

2. Great in bulk.

Did your letters pierce the queen to any demonstration of grief?—

She took 'em, and read 'em in my presence,
And now and then an ample tear trill'd down
Her delicate cheeks.

3. Unlimited; without restriction.

Have what you ask, your presents I receive;
Land where, and when you please, with ample leave.

4. Liberal; large; without parsimony.

If we speak of strict justice, God could no way have been bound to require man's labours in so large and ample manner as human felicity doth import; in as much as the dignity of this exceedeth so far the other's value.

5. Magnificent; splendid.

To dispose the prince the more willingly to undertake his relief, the earl made ample promises, that, within so many days after the siege should be raised, he would advance his highness's levies with two thousand men.

6. Diffusive; not contracted; as, an ample narrative; that is, not an epitome.

AMPLENESS. n. f. [from ample.] The quality of being ample; largeness; splendour.

Impossible it is for a person of my condition to produce any thing in proportion either to the ampleness of the body you represent, or of the places you bear.

To AMPLIATE. v. a. [amplio, Lat.] To enlarge; to make greater; to extend.

He shall look upon it, not to traduce or extenuate, but to explain, and dilucidate, to add and ampliate.

AMPLIATION. n. f. [from ampliate.]

1. Enlargement; exaggeration; extension.

Odious matters admit not of an ampliation, but ought to be restrained and interpreted in the mildest sense.

2. Diffuseness; enlargement.

The obscurity of the subject, and the prejudice and prepossession of most readers, may plead excuse for any ampliations or repetitions that may be found, whilst I labour to express myself plain and full.

To AMPLIFICATE. v. a. [amplifico, Lat.] To enlarge; to spread out; to amplify.

AMPLIFICATION. n. f. [amplification, Fr. amplification, Lat.]

1. Enlargement; extension.

2. It is usually taken in a rhetorical sense, and implies exaggerated representation, or diffuse narrative; an image heightened beyond reality; a narrative enlarged with many circumstances.

I shall summarily, without any amplification at all, shew in what manner defects have been supplied.

Things unknown seem greater than they are, and are usually received with amplifications above their nature.

Is the poet justifiable for relating such incredible amplifications? It may be answered, if he had put these extravagancies into the mouth of Ulysses, he had been unpardonable; but they suit well with the character of Alcinous.

AMPLIFIER. n. f. [from To amplify.] One that enlarges any thing; one that exaggerates; one that represents any thing with a large display of the best circumstances; it being usually taken in a good sense.

Dorillaus could need no amplifier's mouth for the highest point of praise.

To AMPLIFY. v. a. [amplifier, Fr.] 1. To enlarge; to encrease any material substance, or object of sense.

So when a great moneyed man hath divided his chests, and coins, and bags, he seemeth to himself richer than he was: and therefore a way to amplify any thing, is to break it, and to make anatomy of it in several parts, and to examine it according to the several circumstances.

All concaves that proceed from more narrow to more broad, do amplify the found at the coming out.

2. To enlarge, or extend any thing incorporeal.

As the reputation of the Roman prelates grew up in these blind ages, so grew up in them withal a desire of amplifying their power, that they might be as great in temporal forces, as men's opinions have formed them in spiritual matters.

3. To exaggerate any thing; to enlarge it by the manner of representation.

Thy general is my lover; I have been
The book of his good acts; whence men have read

His fame unparallel'd, haply amplified.
Since I have plainly laid open the negligence and errors of every age that is past, I would not willingly seem to flatter the present, by amplifying the diligence and true judgment of those servitors that have laboured in this vineyard.

4. To enlarge; to improve by new additions.
In paraphrase the author's words are not strictly followed, his sense too is amplified but not altered, as Waller's translation of Virgil.

I feel age advancing, and my health is insufficient to increase and amplify these remarks, to confirm and improve these rules, and to illuminate the several pages.

To AMPLIFY. v. n. Frequently with the particle on.

1. To speak largely in many words; to lay one's self out in diffusion.

When you affect to amplify on the former branches of a discourse, you will often lay a necessity upon yourself of contracting the latter, and prevent yourself in the most important part of your design.

2. To form large and pompous representations.
An excellent medicine for the stone might be conceived, by amplifying apprehensions able to break a diamond.

I have sometimes been forced to amplify on others; but here where the subject is so fruitful, that the harvest overcomes the reaper, I am shortened by my chain.

Homer amplifies, not invents; and as there was really a people called Cyclopeans, so they might be men of great stature, or giants.

AMPLITUDE. n. f. [amplitude, Fr. amplitude, Lat.]

1. Extent.
Whatever I look upon, within the amplitude of heaven and earth, is evidence of human ignorance.

2. Largeness; greatness.

Men should learn how severe a thing the true inquiry of nature is, and accustom themselves, by the light of particulars, to enlarge their minds to the amplitude of the world, and not reduce the world to the narrowness of their minds. Bacon.

3. Capacity; extent of intellectual faculties.

With more than human gifts from heav'n adorn'd,

Perfections absolute, graces divine,

And amplitude of mind to greatest deeds. Milton.

4. Splendour; grandeur; dignity.

In the great frame of kingdoms and common-wealths, it is in the power of princes, or estates, to add amplitude and greatness to their kingdoms. Bacon's Essays.

5. Copiousness; abundance.

You should say every thing which has a proper and direct tendency to this end; always proportioning the amplitude of your matter, and the fullness of your discourse, to your great design; the length of your time, to the convenience of your hearers. Watts's Logic.

6. Amplitude of the range of a projectile, denotes the horizontal line subtending the path in which it moved.

7. Amplitude, in astronomy, an arch of the horizon, intercepted between the true east and west point thereof, and the centre of the sun or star at its rising or setting. It is eastern or ortive, when the star rises, and western or occiduous, when the star sets. The eastern or western amplitude, are also called northern or southern, as they fall in the northern or southern quarters of the horizon.

8. Magnetical amplitude, is an arch of the horizon contained between the sun at his rising, and the east or west point of the compass; or, it is the difference of the rising or setting of the sun, from the east or west parts of the compass. Chambers.

A'MPLY. adv. [ample, Lat.]

1. Largely; liberally.

For whose well-being,

So amply, and with hands so liberal,

Thou hast provided all things. Milton.

The evidence they had before was enough, amply enough, to convince them; but they were resolved not to be convinced: and to those, who are resolved not to be convinced, all motives, all arguments are equal. Literbury.

2. At large; without reserve.

At return

Of him so lately promis'd to thy aid,

The woman's feed; obscurely then foretold,

Now amplifier known, thy Saviour, and thy Lord. Milton.

3. At large; copiously; with a diffusive detail.

Some parts of a poem require to be amply written, and with all the force and elegance of words; others must be cast into shadows; that is, passed over in silence, or but faintly touched. Dryden's Dufresnoy.

To A'MPUTATE. v. a. [amputo, Lat.] To cut off a limb: a word used only in chirurgery.

Amongst the cruizers, it was complained, that their surgeons were too active in amputating fractured members. Wise's Surgery.

AMPUTATION. n. f. [amputatio, Lat.]

The operation of cutting off a limb, or other part of the body. The usual method of performing it, in the instance of a leg, is as follows. The proper part for the operation being four or five inches below the knee, the skin and flesh are first to be drawn very tight upwards, and secured from returning by a ligature two or three fingers broad: above this ligature another loose one is passed, for the gripe; which being twisted by means of a stick, may be straitened to any degree at pleasure. Then the patient being conveniently situated, and the operator placed to the inside of the limb, which is to be held by one assistant above, and another below the part designed for the operation, and the gripe sufficiently twisted, to prevent too large an hæmorrhage, the flesh is, with a stroke or two, to be separated from the bone with the dismembering knife. Then the periosteum being also divided from the bone with the back of the knife, saw the bone afunder, with as few strokes as possible.

When two parallel bones are concerned, the flesh that grows between them must likewise be separated before the use of the saw. This being done, the gripe may be slackened, to give an opportunity of searching for the large blood vessels, and securing the hæmorrhage at their mouths. After making proper applications to the stump, loosen the first ligature, and pull both the skin and the flesh, as far as conveniently may be, over the stump, to cover it; and secure them with the cross stitch made at the depth of half or three quarters of an inch in the skin. Then apply pledgets, astringents, plaisters, and other necessaries. Chambers.

The Amazons, by the amputation of their right breast, had the freer use of their bow.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

A'MULET. n. f. [amulette, Fr. amuletum, or amuletum, quod malum amolitur, Lat.] An appended remedy, or preservative: a thing hung about the neck, or any other part of the body, for preventing or curing of some particular diseases.

That spirits are corporeal, seems at first view a conceit derogative unto himself; yet herein he establisheth the doctrine of lustrations, amulets, and charms. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

They do not certainly know the falsity of what they report; and their ignorance must serve you as an amulet against the guilt both of deceit and malice. Government of the Tongue.

AMURCO'SITY. n. f. [amurca, Lat.] The quality of lees or mother of any thing. Dict.

To AMU'SE. v. a. [amuser, Fr.]

1. To entertain with tranquillity; to fill with thoughts that engage the mind, without distracting it. To divert implies something more lively, and to please, something more important. It is therefore frequently taken in a sense bordering on contempt.

They think they see visions, and are arrived to some extraordinary revelations; when, indeed, they do but dream dreams, and amuse themselves with the fantastick ideas of a busy imagination. Decay of Piety.

I cannot think it natural for a man, who is much in love, to amuse himself with trifles. Walsh.

2. To draw on from time to time; to keep in expectation; as, he amused his followers with idle promises.

AMU'SEMENT. n. f. [amusement, Fr.] That which amuses; entertainment.

Every interest or pleasure of life, even the most trifling amusement, is suffered to postpone the one thing necessary. Rogers.

During his confinement, his amusement was to give poison to dogs and cats, and see them expire by slower or quicker torments. Pope.

I was left to stand the battle, while others who had better talents than a draper, thought it no unpleasant amusement to look on with safety, whilst another was giving them diversion, at the hazard of his liberty. Swift.

AMU'SER. n. f. [amuseur, Fr.] He that amuses, as with false promises. The French word is always taken in an ill sense.

AMU'SIVE. adj. [from amuse.] That which has the power of amusing. I know not that this is a current word.

But amaz'd;

Beholds th' amusive arch before him fly,

Then vanish quite away. Thomson.

AMYGDALATE. adj. [amygdala, Lat.] Made of almonds.

AMYGDALINE. adj. [amygdala, Lat.] Relating to almonds; resembling almonds.

AN. article, [anc, Saxon. een, Dutch, eine, German.] The article indefinite, used before a vowel, or b mute. See A.

1. One, but with less emphasis; as, there stands a house.

Since he cannot be always employed in study, reading, and conversation, there will be many an hour, besides what his exercises will take up. Locke.

2. Any, or some; as, an elephant might swim in this water.

He was no way at an uncertainty, nor ever in the least at a loss concerning any branch of it. Locke.

A wit's a feather, and a chief a rod,
An honest man's the noblest work of God.

Pope.

3. Sometimes it signifies, like a, some particular state; but this is now disused.

It is certain that odours do, in a small degree, nourish; especially the odour of wine; and we see men an hungred do love to smell hot bread. Bacon.

4. An is sometimes, in old authors, a contraction of and if.

He can't flatter, he!

An honest mind and plain, he must speak truth;
An they will take it so; if not, he's plain. Shakespeare.

5. Sometimes a contraction of and before if.

Well I know

The clerk will ne'er wear hair on's face that had it.

— He will an' if he live to be a man. Shakespeare.

6. Sometimes it is a contraction of as if.

My next pretty correspondent, like Shakespeare's lion in Pyramus and Thisbe, roars an' it were any nightingale. Addison.

AN. adv. [ana.] A word used in the prescriptions of physick, importing the like quantity; as, wine and honey, a or ana ʒii; that is, of wine and honey each two ounces.

In the same weight prudence and innocence take,

Ana of each does the just mixture make. Corley.

He'll bring an apothecary, with a chargeable long bill of anas. Dryden.

ANA. n. f. Books so called from the last syllables of their titles; as, Scaligerana, Tibulliana; they are loose thoughts, or casual hints, dropped by eminent men, and collected by their friends.

ANACAMPTICK. adj. [anacamptis.] Reflecting, or reflected: an anacamptick sound, an echo; an anacamptick hill, a hill that produces an echo.

ANACAMPTICKS. n. f. The doctrine of reflected light, or catoptricks. It has no singular.

ANACATHARTICK. n. f. [See CATHARTICK.] Any medicine that works upwards. Quincy.

ANACEPHALÆOSIS. n. f. [anacephalosis.] Recapitulation, or summary of the principal heads of a discourse. Dict.

ANACHORETE. n. f. [sometimes viciously written anachorite; anachorite, anachorite.] A monk who, with the leave of his superior, leaves the convent for a more austere and solitary life.

Yet lies not love dead here, but here doth sit,
Vow'd to this trench, like an anachorite. Donne.

ANACHRONISM. n. f. [from anachronos.] An error in computing time, by which events are misplaced with regard to each other. It seems properly to signify an error by which an event is placed too early; but is generally used for any error in chronology.

This leads me to the defence of the famous anachronism, in making Æneas and Dido cotemporaries: for it is certain, that the hero lived almost two hundred years before the building of Carthage. Dryden.

ANACLASTICKS. n. f. [anaclastis and anaclastis.] The doctrine of refracted light; dioptricks. It has no singular.

ANADIPOLOSIS. n. f. [anadiiplosis.] Reduplication; a figure in rhetoric, in which the last word of a foregoing member of a period becomes the first of the following; as, he retained his virtues amidst all his misfortunes, misfortunes which only his virtue brought upon him.

ANAGOGETICAL. adj. [anagogia.] That which contributes or relates to spiritual elevation, or religious raptures; mysterious; elevated above humanity. Dict.

ANAGOGICAL. adj. [anagogia, Fr.] Mysterious; elevated; religiously exalted. Dict.

ANAGOGICALLY. adv. [from anagogical.] Mysteriously; with religious elevation.

VOL. I. N^o. 3. K A'NAGRAM.

ANAGRAM. n. f. [ἀνά and γράμμα.] A conceit arising from the letters of a name transposed; as this, of W, i, l, l, i, a, m, N, o, y, attorney-general to Charles I. a very laborious man, I moyl in law.

Though all her parts be not in th' usual place,
She hath yet the anagrams of a good face:
If we might put the letters but one way,
In that lean dearth of words what could we say?

Donne.

Thy genius calls thee not to purchase fame
In keen iambicks, but mild anagram. Dryden.

ANAGRAMMATISM. n. f. [from anagram.] The act or practice of making anagrams.

The only quintessence that hitherto the alchymy of wit could draw out of names, is anagrammatism, or metagrammatism, which is a dissolution of a name truly written into his letters, as his elements, and a new connexion of it by artificial transposition, without addition, subtraction, or change of any letters into different words, making some perfect sense applicable to the person named. Camden.

ANAGRAMMATIST. n. f. [from anagram.] A maker of anagrams.

TO ANAGRAMMATIZE. v. n. [from anagrammatist. Fr.] To make anagrams.

ANALEPTICK. adj. [ἀναλεπτικός.] Comforting; corroborating; a term of physick.

Analeptick medicines cherish the nerves, and renew the spirits and strength. Quincy.

ANALOGAL. adj. [from analogous.] Analogous; having relation.

When I see many analogal motions in animals, though I cannot call them voluntary, yet I see them spontaneous, I have reason to conclude that these in their principle are not simply mechanical. Hale.

ANALOGICAL. adj. [from analogy.]

1. Used by way of analogy. It seems properly distinguished from analogous, as words from things; analogous signifies having relation, and analogical having the quality of representing relation.

It is looked on only as the image of the true God, and that not as a proper likeness, but by analogical representation. Stillingfleet.

When a word, which originally signifies any particular idea or object, is attributed to several other objects, not by way of resemblance but on the account of some evident reference to the original idea, this is peculiarly called an analogical word; so a sound or healthy pulse, a sound digestion, sound sleep, are so called, with reference to a sound and healthy constitution; but if you speak of sound doctrine, or sound speech, this is by way of resemblance to health, and the words are metaphorical. Watts's Logick.

2. Analogous; having resemblance or relation.

There is placed the minerals between the inanimate and vegetable province, participating something analogical to either.

Hales's Origin of Mankind.

ANALOGICALLY. adv. [from analogical.] In an analogical manner; in an analogous manner.

I am convinced, from the simplicity and uniformity of the Divine Nature, and of all his works, that there is some one universal principle, running through the whole system of creatures analogically, and congruous to their relative natures. Cheyne.

ANALOGICALNESS. n. f. [from analogical.] The quality of being analogical; fitness to be applied for the illustration of some analogy.

ANALOGISM. n. f. [ἀναλογισμός.] An argument from the cause to the effect.

TO ANALOGIZE. v. a. [from analogy.] To explain by way of analogy; to form some resemblance between different things; to consider something with regard to its analogy with somewhat else.

We have systems of material bodies, diversely figured and situated, if separately considered; they represent the object of the desire, which is analogized by attraction or gravitation. Cheyne.

ANALOGOUS. adj. [ἀνά and λόγος.]

1. Having analogy; bearing some resemblance or proportion; having something parallel.

Exercise makes things easy, that would be otherwise very hard; as, in labour, watchings, heats, and colds; and then there is something ana- logous in the exercise of the mind, to that of the body. It is folly and infirmity that makes us delicate and froward. L'Estrange.

Many important consequences may be drawn from the observation of the most common things, and analogous reasonings from the causes of them. Arbutnot.

2. It has the word to before the thing to which the resemblance is noted.

This incorporeal substance may have some sort of existence, analogous to corporeal extension: though we have no adequate conception hereof. Locke.

ANALOGY. n. f. [ἀναλογία.]

1. Resemblance between things with regard to some circumstances or effects; as learning is said to enlighten the mind; that is, it is to the mind what light is to the eye, by enabling it to discover that which was hidden before.

From God it hath proceeded, that the church hath evermore held a prescript form of common prayer, although not in all things every where the same, yet, for the most part, retaining the same analogy. Hooker.

What I here observe of extraordinary revelation and prophecy, will, by analogy and due proportion, extend even to those communications of God's will, that are requisite to salvation. South.

2. When the thing to which the analogy is supposed, happens to be mentioned, analogy has after it the particles to or with; when both the things are mentioned after analogy, the particle between or betwixt is used.

If the body politic have any analogy to the natural, an act of oblivion were necessary in a hot distemper'd state. Dryden.

By analogy with all other liquors and concretions, the form of the chaos, whether liquid or concrete, could not be the same with that of the present earth. Burnet's Theory.

If we make Juvenal express the customs of our country, rather than of Rome, it is when there was some analogy betwixt the customs. Dryden.

3. By grammarians, it is used to signify the agreement of several words in one common mode; as, from love is formed loved, from bate, bated, from grieve, grieved.

ANALYSIS. n. f. [ἀνάλυσις.]

1. A separation of a compound body into the several parts of which it consists.

There is an account of dew falling, in some places, in the form of butter or grease, which grows extremely fetid; so that the analysis of the dew of any place, may, perhaps, be the best method of finding such contents of the soil as are within the reach of the sun. Arbutnot.

2. A consideration of any thing in parts, so as that one particular is first considered, then another.

Analysis consists in making experiments and observations, and in drawing general conclusions from them by induction, and admitting of no objections but such as are taken from experiments, or other certain truths. Newton's Opticks.

3. A solution of any thing, whether corporeal or mental, to its first elements; as of a sentence to the single words; of a compound word, to the particles and words which form it; of a tune, to single notes; of an argument, to simple propositions.

We cannot know any thing of nature, but by an analysis of its true initial causes; till we know the first springs of natural motions, we are still but ignorants. Glanville.

ANALYTICAL. adj. [from analysis.]

1. That which resolves any thing into its first principles; that which separates any compound. See ANALYSIS.

Either may be probably maintained against the inaccuracy of the analytical experiments vulgarly relied on. Boyle.

2. That which proceeds by analysis, or by taking the parts of a compound into distinct and particular consideration.

Descartes hath here infinitely outdone all the philosophers that went before him, in giving a particular and analytical account of the universal fabrick: yet he intends his principles but for hypotheses. Glanville.

ANALYTICALLY. adv. [from analytical.] In such a manner as separates compounds into simples. See ANALYSIS.

ANALYTICK. adj. [ἀναλυτικός.] The manner of resolving compounds into the simple constituent or component parts, applied chiefly to mental operations.

He was in logick a great critic,
Profoundly skill'd in analytick. Hudibras.

Analytick method takes the whole compound as it finds it, whether it be a species or an individual, and leads us into the knowledge of it, by resolving into its first principles, or parts; its generic nature, and its special properties; and therefore it is called the method of resolution. Watts's Logick.

TO ANALYZE. v. a. [ἀνάλυνω.] To resolve a compound into its first principles. See ANALYSIS.

Chymistry enabling us to deplete bodies, and, in some measure, to analyze them, and take asunder their heterogeneous parts, in many chymical experiments, we may, better than in others, know what manner of bodies we employ; art having made them more simple or uncompounded, than nature alone is wont to present them us. Boyle.

To analyze the immorality of any action into its last principles; if it be enquired, why such an action is to be avoided, the immediate answer is, because it is sin. Norris's Miscell.

When the sentence is distinguished into subject and predicate, proposition, argument, act, object, cause, effect, adjunct, opposite, &c. then it is analyzed analogically and metaphysically. This last is what is chiefly meant in the theological schools, when they speak of analyzing a text of scripture. Watts's Logick.

ANALYZER. n. f. [from To analyze.] That which has the power of analyzing.

Particular reasons incline me to doubt, whether the fire be the true and universal analyzer of mixt bodies. Boyle.

ANAMORPHOSIS. n. f. [ἀνά and μορφή.] Deformation; a perspective projection of any thing, so that to the eye, at one point of view, it shall appear deformed, in another, an exact and regular representation. Sometimes it is made to appear confused to the naked eye, and regular, when viewed in a mirror of a certain form.

ANANAS. n. f. The pine apple.

It has a flower consisting of one leaf, divided into three parts, and funnel-shaped; the embryos produced in the tubercles afterwards become fruit; the seeds in the tubercles are small, and almost kidney shaped.

The species are, 1. Oval-shaped pine apple, with a whitish flesh. 2. Pyramidal pine-apple, with a yellow flesh. 3. Pine-apple, with smooth leaves. 4. Pine-apple, with shining green leaves, and scarce any spines on their edges. 5. The olive-coloured pine. Milner.

Witness thou best anana, thou the pride
Of vegetable life, beyond what'er

The poets imag'd in the golden age. Thomson.
ANANAS, wild. The same with penguin. See PENGUIN.

ANAPHORA. n. f. [ἀναφορά.] A figure, when several clauses of a sentence are begun with the same word, or sound; as, Where is the wife? Where is the scribe? Where is the disputer of this world?

ANAPLROTICK. adj. [ἀναπλωτικός.] That which fills up any vacancy; used of applications which promote flesh.

ANARCH. n. f. [See ANARCHY.] An author of confusion.

Him thus the anarch old,
With fault'ring speech, and visage impos'd, Answer'd. Milton.

ANARCHICAL. adj. [from anarchy.] Confused; without rule or government.

In this anarchical and rebellious state of human nature, the faculties belonging to the material world presume to determine the nature of subjects belonging to the supreme Spirit. Cheyne.

ANARCHY.

ANARCHY. n. f. [ἀναρχία.] Want of government; a state in which every man is unaccountable; a state without magistracy.

Where eldest night

And chaos, ancestors of nature, hold

Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise

Of endless wars, and by confusion stand. Milton.

Arbitrary power is but the first natural step from anarchy, or the savage life; the adjusting power and freedom being an effect and consequence of maturer thinking. Swift.

ANASARCIA. n. f. [from ἀνά and σαρξ.] A sort of dropsy, where the whole substance is stuffed with pituitous humours. Quincy.

When the lymph stagnates, or is extravasated under the skin, it is called an anasarca.

Arbutnot on Diet.

ANASARCOUS. adj. [from anasarca.] Relating to an anasarca; partaking of the nature of an anasarca.

A gentlewoman laboured of an ascites, with an anasarcaous swelling on her belly, thighs, and legs. Wifeman.

ANASTOMATICK. adj. [from ἀνά and στήναι.] That which has the quality of opening the vessels, or of removing obstructions.

ANASTOMOSIS. n. f. [from ἀνά and στήναι.] The inoculation of vessels, or the opening of one vessel into another; as, of the arteries into the veins.

ANASTROPHE. n. f. [ἀναστροφή, a preposterous placing, from ἀναστροφή.] A figure whereby words which should have been precedent, are postponed.

ANATHEMA. n. f. [ἀνάθεμα.]

1. A curse pronounced by ecclesiastical authority; excommunication.

Her bare anathemas fall but like so many bruta fulmina upon the schismatical; who think themselves shrewdly hurt, forsooth, by being cut off from the body, which they choose not to be of. South's Sermons.

2. The object of the curse, or person cursed. This seems the original meaning, though now little used.

ANATHEMATICAL. adj. [from anathema.] That which has the properties of an anathema; that which relates to an anathema.

ANATHEMATICALY. adv. [from anathematichal.] In an anathematical manner.

To ANATHEMATIZE. v. a. [from anathema.] To pronounce accursed by ecclesiastical authority; to excommunicate.

They were therefore to be anathematized, and, with detestation, branded and banished out of the church. Hammond.

ANATIFEROUS. adj. [from ἀνά and φέρω, Lat.] Producing ducks. Not in use.

If there be anatiforous trees, whose corruption breaks forth into barnacles; yet, if they corrupt, they degenerate into maggots, which produce not them again. Brown's Vulg. Err.

ANATOCISM. n. f. [anatocismus, Lat. ἀνατοκισμός.] The accumulation of interest upon interest; the addition of the interest due for money lent, to the original sum. A species of usury generally forbidden.

ANATOMICAL. adj. [from anatomy.]

1. Relating or belonging to anatomy.

When we are taught by logic to view a thing completely in all its parts, by the help of division, it has the use of an anatomical knife, which dissects an animal body, and separates the veins, arteries, nerves, muscles, membranes, &c. and shews us the several parts which go to the composition of a complete animal. Watt's Logick.

2. Proceeding upon principles taught in anatomy; considered as the object of anatomy.

There is a natural, involuntary distortion of the muscles, which is the anatomical cause of laughter; but there is another cause of laughter, which decency requires. Swift.

3. Anatomized; dissected; separated.

The continuation of solidity is apt to be confounded with, and, if we will look into the minute anatomical parts of matter, is little different from hardness. Locke.

ANATOMICALLY. adv. [from anatomical.] In an anatomical manner; in the sense of an anatomist; according to the doctrine of anatomy.

While some affirmed it had no gall, intending only thereby no evidence of anger or fury, others have construed anatomically, and denied that part at all. Brown's Vulg. Errors.

ANATOMIST. n. f. [ἀνατομικός.] He that studies the structure of animal bodies, by means of dissection; he that divides the bodies of animals, to discover the various parts.

Anatomists adjudged, that if nature had been suffered to run her own course, without this fatal interruption, he might have doubled his age. Herivel.

Hence when anatomists discourse, How like brutes organs are to ours; They grant, if higher powers think fit, A bear might soon be made a wit; And that, for any thing in nature, Pigs might squeak love odes, dogs bark satire. Prior.

To ANATOMIZE. v. a. [ἀνατομίζω.]

1. To dissect an animal; to divide the body into its component or constituent parts.

Our industry must even anatomize every particle of that body, which we are to uphold. Hooker.

2. To lay any thing open distinctly, and by minute parts.

I speak but brotherly of him, but should I anatomize him to thee as he is, I must blush and weep, and then must look pale and wonder. Shakespeare.

Then dark distinctions reason's light disguis'd, And into atoms truth anatomiz'd. Denham.

ANATOMY. n. f. [ἀνατομία.]

1. The art of dissecting the body.

It is proverbially said, Formice sua bilis inest, habet et musca splenem; whereas these parts anatomy hath not discovered in insects. Brown's Vulg. Err.

It is therefore in the anatomy of the mind, as in that of the body; more good will accrue to mankind, by attending to the large, open, and perceptible parts, than by studying too much such finer nerves and vessels, as will for ever escape our observation. Pope.

2. The doctrine of the structure of the body, learned by dissection.

Let the muscles be well inserted and bound together, according to the knowledge of them which is given us by anatomy. Dryden.

3. The act of dividing any thing, whether corporeal or intellectual.

When a moneyed man hath divided his chests, he seemeth to himself richer than he was; therefore, a way to amplify any thing, is to break it, and to make anatomy of it in several parts. Bacon.

4. The body stripped of its integuments; a skeleton.

O that my tongue were in the thunder's mouth, Then with a passion I would shake the world, And rouse from sleep that fell anatomy, Which cannot hear a feeble lady's voice. Shakespeare.

5. By way of irony or ridicule, a thin meagre person.

They brought one Pinch, a hungry lean-fac'd villain,

A mere anatomy, a mountebank,

A thread-bare juggler, and a fortune-teller,

A needy, hollow-ey'd, sharp looking wretch,

A living dead man. Shakespeare's Com. of Errors.

ANATRON. n. f. The scum which swims upon the molten glass in the furnace, which, when taken off, melts in the air, and then coagulates into common salt. It is likewise that salt which gathers upon the walls of vaults.

ANBURY. n. f. See AMBURY.

ANCESTOR. n. f. [ancestor, Lat. anceps, Fr.]

One from whom a person descends, either by the father or the mother. It is distinguished from predecessor; which is not, like ancestor, a natural, but civil denomination. An hereditary monarch succeeds to his ancestors; an elective to his predecessors.

And she lies buried with her ancestors, O, in a tomb where never scandal slept, Save this of her's. Shakespeare. Much ado about Not.

Cham was the paternal ancestor of Ninus, the father of Chus, the grandfather of Nimrod; whole son was Belus the father of Ninus. Rahigb.

Obicure! why pry'st thee what am I? I know

My father, grandfather, and great grandfire too; if farther I derive my pedigree,

I can but guess beyond the fourth degree. The rest of my forgotten ancestors,

Were sons of earth like him, or sons of whores. Dryden.

ANCESTREL. adj. [from ancestor.] Claimed from ancestors; relating to ancestors; a term of law.

Limitation in actions ancestor, was anciently so here in England. Hale.

ANCESTRY. n. f. [from ancestor.]

1. Lineage; a series of ancestors, or progenitors; the persons who compose the lineage,

Phedon I hight, quoth he; and do advance Mine ancestry from famous Coradin,

Who first to raise our house to honour did begin. Spenser.

A tenacious adherence to the rights and liberties transmitted from a wife and virtuous ancestry, public spirit, and a love of one's country, are the support and ornaments of government. Addis.

Say from what sceptred ancestry ye claim, Recorded eminent in deathless fame? Pope.

2. The honour of descent; birth.

Title and ancestry render a good man more illustrious, but an ill one more contemptible. Addis.

ANCHENTRY. n. f. [from ancient, and therefore properly to be written an-ientry.] Antiquity of a family; ancient dignity; appearance or proof of antiquity.

Wooring, wedding, and repenting, is a Scotch jig, a measure and a cinque pace; the first suit is hot and hasty, like a Scotch jig, and full as fantastical; the wedding mannerly modest, as a measure full of state and anchentry; and then comes repentance, and with his bad legs falls into the cinque pace faster and faster, till he sinks into his grave. Shakespeare.

ANCHOR. n. f. [anchora, Lat.]

1. A heavy iron, composed of a long shank, having a ring at one end to which the cable is fastened, and at the other, branching out into two arms or floes, tending upwards, with barbs or edges on each side. Its use is to hold the ship, by being fixed to the ground.

He said, and wept; then spread his sails before The winds, and reach'd at length the Cuman shore: Their anchors dropt, his crew the vessels moor. Dryden.

2. It is used, by a metaphor, for any thing which confers stability or security.

Which hope we have as an anchor of the soul, both sure and steadfast, and which entereth into that within the veil. Heb.

3. The forms of speech in which it is most commonly used, are, to cast anchor, to lie or ride at anchor.

The Turkish general, perceiving that the Rhodians would not be drawn forth to battle at sea, withdrew his fleet, when casting anchor, and landing his men, he burnt the corn. Knolles's History of the Turks.

Ent'ring with the tide,

He dropp'd his anchors, and his oars he ply'd:

Furl'd every sail, and drawing down the mast,

His vessel moor'd, and made with haulfers fast. Dryden.

Far from your capital my ship resides,

At Reithrus, and secure at anchor rides. Pope.

To ANCHOR. v. n. [from anchor.]

1. To cast anchor; to lie at anchor.

The fishermen that walk upon the beach,

Appear like mice; and yon tall anchoring bark

Diminish'd to her cock. Shakespeare's K. Lear.

Near Calais the Spaniards anchored, expecting their land-forces, which came not. Bacon.

Or the strait course to rocky Chios plow,

And anchor under Mimos' shaggy brow. Pope.

2. To stop at; to rest on.

My intention, hearing not my tongue,

Anchor on Isabel. Shakespeare.

To A'NCHOR, v. a.

1. To place an anchor; as, he anchored his ship. To fix on.
2. My tongue should to my ears not name my boys, 'Till that my nails were anchored in thine eyes.

Shakespeare
A'NCHOR, n. f. Shakespeare seems to have used this word for an anchoret, or abstemious recluse person.

To desperation turn my trust and hope!

An anchor's cheer in prison be my scope! Shaksp.

A'NCHOR-HOLD, n. f. [from anchor and hold.] The hold or fastness of the anchor; and, figuratively, security.

The old English could express most aptly all the conceits of the mind in their own tongue, without borrowing from any; as for example: the holy service of God, which the Latins called religion, because it knitted the minds of men together, and most people of Europe have borrowed the name from them, they called most significantly can-f-f-n-fs, as the one and only assurance and fast anchor-hold of our foul's health. Camilien.

A'NCHOR-SMITH, n. f. [from anchor and smith.] The maker or forger of anchors.

Smithing comprehends all trades, which use either forge or file, from the an-chor-smith to the watchmaker; they all working by the same rules, though not with equal exactness, and all using the same tools, though of several sizes. Moxon.

A'NCHORAGE, n. f. [from an. chor.]

1. The hold of the anchor.

Let me resolve whether there be indeed such efficacy in nurture and first production; for if that supposal should fail us, all our anchorage were loose, and we should but wander in a wild sea, Watson.

2. The set of anchors belonging to a ship.

The bark that hath discharg'd her freight,
Returns with precious lading to the bay,
From whence at first she weigh'd her anchorage. Shakespeare.

3. The duty paid for liberty of anchoring in a port.

A'NCHORED, participial adj. [from To anchor.] Held by the anchor.

Like a well-twisted cable, holding fast
The anchored vessel in the loudest blast. Waller.

A'NCHORET, n. f. [contracted from an-chor-ete, anachoritis.] A recluse;

A'NCHORITE, n. f. [contracted from an-chor-ite, anachoritis.] A recluse; a hermit; one that retires to the more severe duties of religion.

His poetry indeed he took along with him: but he made that an anchoret as well as himself. Spart.

You describe so well your hermitical state of life, that none of the ancient *anchoret*s could go beyond you, for a cave in a rock, with a fine spring, or any of the accommodations that beset a solitary life. Pope.

A'NCHO'VY, n. f. [from an. chova, Span. or anchovy, Ital. of the same signification.] A little sea-fish, much used by way of sauce or seasoning. Scaliger describes the anchovy as of the herring kind, about the length of a finger, having a pointed snout, a wide mouth, no teeth, but gums as rough as a saw. Others make it a sort of sardine, or pilchard; but others, with better reason, hold it a peculiar species, very different from either. The fishing is chiefly in the night-time; when a light being put on the stern of their little fishing vessels, the anchovies flock round, and are caught in nets, Savary.

We invent new sauces and pickles, which resemble the animal ferment in taste and virtue, as the lactic-acid gravies of meat; the salt pickles of fish, anchovies, oysters. Floyer.

A'NCIENT, adj. [ancien, Fr. antiquus Lat.]

1. Old; that happened long since; of old time; not modern. Ancient and old are distinguished; old relates to the duration of the thing itself, as, an old coat, a coat much worn; and ancient, to time in general, as, an ancient dress, a habit used in former times. But this is not always observed; for we mention old custom; but though old be sometimes opposed to modern, ancient is seldom opposed to new, but when new means modern.

An ancient tenure is that, whereby all the manours belonging to the crown, in St. Edward's or William the Conqueror's days, did hold. The number and names of which manours, as all others, belonging to common persons, he caused to be written in a book, after a survey made of them, now remaining in the exchequer, and called doomsday book; and such as by that book appeared to have belonged to the crown at that time, are called ancient demesnes. Cowel.

2. Old; that has been of long duration.

With the ancient is wisdom, and in length of days understanding. Job. xii. 12.

Thales affirms, that God comprehended all things, and that God was of all things the most ancient, because he had never any beginning. Raleigh.

Industry

Gave the tall ancient forest to his axe. Thomson.

3. Past; former.

I feel thy fury: if I longer stay,
We shall begin our ancient bickerings. Shakespeare.

A'NCIENT, n. f. [from ancient, adj.]

1. Those that lived in old time were called ancients, opposed to the moderns.

And though the ancients thus their rules invade,
As kings dispense with laws themselves have made;
Moderns beware! or if you must offend
Against the precept, ne'er transgress its end. Pope.

2. Senior; not in use.

He toucheth it as a special pre-eminence of Junias and Andronicus, that in Christianity they were his ancients. Hooker.

A'NCIENT, n. f.

1. The flag or streamer of a ship, and, formerly, of a regiment.

2. The bearer of a flag, as was Ancient Pistol; whence in present use, ensign.

This is Othello's ancient, as I take it,
The same indeed, a very valiant fellow. Shakespeare.

A'NCIENTLY, adv. [from ancient.] In old times.

Trebifond anciently pertained unto this crown; now unjustly possessed, and as unjustly abused, by those who have neither title to hold it, nor virtue to rule it. Sidney.

The colewort is not an enemy, though that were anciently received, to the vine only, but to any other plant, because it draweth strongly the fattest juice of the earth. Bacon.

A'NCIENTNESS, n. f. [from ancient.] Antiquity; existence from old times.

The Fescenine and Saturnian were the same; they were called Saturnian from their ancientness, when Saturn reigned in Italy. Dryden.

A'NCIENTRY, n. f. [from ancient.] The honour of ancient lineage; the dignity of birth.

Of all nations under heaven, the Spaniard is the most mingled and most uncertain. Wherefore, most foolishly do the Irish think to ennoble themselves, by wresting their ancientry from the Spaniard, who is unable to derive himself from any in certain. Spenser on Ireland.

There is nothing in the between, but getting wenches with child, wronging the ancientry, stealing, fighting. Shakespeare.

ANGLE. See ANGLE.

A'NCONY, n. f. [in the iron mills.] A bloom wrought into the figure of a flat iron bar, about three foot long, with two square rough knobs, one at each end. Chambers.

AND, conjunction.

1. The particle by which sentences or terms are joined, which it is not easy to explain by any synonymous word.

Sure his honesty
Got him small gains, but shameless flattery
And filthy beverage, and unseemly theft,
And borrow base, and some good lady's gift. Spenser.
What shall I do to be for ever known,
And make the age to come my own? Cowley.
The Danes unconquer'd offspring march behind:
And Morini, the last of human kind. Dryden.

It shall ever be my study to make discoveries of this nature in human life, and to settle the proper distinctions between the virtues and perfections of mankind, and those false colours and resemblances of them that shine alike in the eyes of the vulgar. Addison.

2. And sometimes signifies though, and seems a contraction of and if.

It is the nature of extreme self-lovers, as they will set an house on fire, and it were but to roast their eggs. Bacon.

3. In and if, the and is redundant, and is omitted by all later writers.

I pray thee, Launce, an' if thou see'st my boy, Bid him make haste. Shakespeare. Two Gentlemen of Verona.

A'NDIRON, n. f. [supposed by Skinner to be corrupted from band-iron; an iron that may be moved by the hand, or may supply the place of a hand.] Irons at the end of a fire-grate, in which the spit turns; or irons in which wood is laid to burn.

If you strike an entire body, as an andiron of brass, at the top, it maketh a more treble sound, and at the bottom a baser. Bacon.

ANDRO'GYNAL, adj. [from andros and gynai.] Having two sexes; hermaphroditical.

ANDRO'GYNALLY, v. a. [from androgynal.] In the form of hermaphrodites; with two sexes.

The examples hereof have undergone no real or new transaction, but were androgynally born, and under some kind of hermaphrodites. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ANDRO'GYNOUS, adj. The same with androgynal.

ANDRO'GYNUS, n. f. [See ANDRO'GYNAL.] An hermaphrodite; one that is of both sexes.

ANDRO'TOMY, n. f. [from andros and tomos.] The practice of cutting human bodies. Diet.

A'NECDOTE, n. f. [ancidote.]

1. Something yet unpublished; secret history.

Some modern anecdotes aver,

He nodded in his elbow chair. Prior.

2. It is now used, after the French, for a biographical incident; a minute passage of private life.

A'NEMO'GRAPHY, n. f. [anemos and grapho.] The description of the winds.

A'NEMO'METER, n. f. [anemos and metron.] An instrument contrived to measure the strength or velocity of the wind.

A'NEMONE, n. f. [anemos and neme.] The wind flower.

Upon the top of its single stalk, surrounded by a leaf, is produced one naked flower, of many petals, with many stamina in the centre; the seeds are collected into an oblong head, and surrounded with a copious down. The principal colours in anemones, are white, red, blue, and purple, sometimes curiously intermixed. Miller.

Wind flowers are distinguished into those with broad and hard leaves, and those with narrow and soft ones. The broad leaved anemony roots should be planted about the end of September. These with small leaves must not be put into the ground till the end of October. Nortmeyer.

From the soft wing of vernal breezes shed,

Anemones, auriculas, enrich'd

With shining meal o'er all their velvet leaves. Thomson.

A'NEMOSCOPE, n. f. [anemos and skopeo.] A machine invented to foretell the changes of the wind. It has been observed, that hygrosopes made of cat's gut proved very good anemoscopes, seldom failing, by the turning the index about, to foretell the shifting of the wind. Chambers.

A'NE'NT, prep. A word used in the Scotch dialect.

1. Concerning; about; as, he said anent this particular.

2. Over against; opposite; as, he lives anent the market-house.

A'NES, n. f. The spires or beards of corn.

A'WNS, n. f. [anemos.]

A'NEURISM, n. f. [aneurysm.] A disease of the arteries, in which, either by a preternatural weakness of any part of them, they become excessively dilated, or by a wound through their coats, the blood is extravasated among the adjacent cavities. Scarp.

In the orifice, there was a throbbing of the arterial blood, as in an aneurism. Wijeman.

A'NE'W.

ANG'W. adv. [from an and new.]

1. Over again; another time; repeatedly. This is the most common use.

Nor, if at mischief taken, on the ground
Be slain, but pris'ners to the pillars bound,
At either barrier plac'd; nor, captives made,
Be freed, or, arm'd anew, the fight invade. Dryd.

That as in birth, in beauty you excel.
The muse might dictate, and the poet tell:
Your art no other art can speak; and you
To show how well you play must play anew.

The miseries of the civil war did, for many years, deter the inhabitants of our island from the thoughts of engaging anew in such desperate undertakings. Addison.

2. Newly; in a new manner.

He who begins late, is obliged to form anew
the whole disposition of his soul, to acquire new habits of life, to practice duties to which he is utterly a stranger. Rogers.

ANFRACTUOSE. } adj. [from anfractus, Lat.]

ANFRACTUOUS. } Winding; mazy; full of turnings and winding passages.

Behind the drum are several vaults, and an- fractuous cavities in the ear-bone, so to intend the least found imaginable, that the sense might be affected with it; as we see in subterraneous caves and vaults, how the found is redoubled. Ray.

ANFRACTUOUSNESS. n. f. [from anfractus.]
Fullness of windings and turnings.

ANFRACTURE. n. f. [from anfractus, Lat.] A turning; a mazy winding and turning. Dict.

ANGEL. n. f. [ἄγγελος; angelus, Lat.]
1. Originally a messenger. A spirit employed by God in the administration of human affairs.

Some holy angel

Fly to the court of England, and unfold
His message ere he come. Shakespeare.

Had we such a knowledge of the constitution of man, as it is possible angels have, and it is certain his Maker has, we should have a quite other idea of his essence. Locke.

2. Angel is sometimes used in a bad sense; as angels of darkness.

And they had a king over them, which was the angel of the bottomless pit. Revelations.

3. Angel, in scripture, sometimes means man of God, prophet.

4. Angel is used, in the style of love, for a beautiful person.

Thou hast the sweetest face I ever looked on.
Sir, as I have a soul, she is an angel. Shakespeare.

5. A piece of money anciently coined impressed with an angel, in memory of an observation of Pope Gregory, that the pagan Angli, or English, were so beautiful, that, if they were Christians, they would be angels, or angeli. The coin was rated at ten shillings.

Take an empty basin, put an angel of gold, or what you will, into it; then go so far from the basin, till you cannot see the angel, because it is not in a right line; then fill the basin with water, and you will see it out of its place, because of the reflexion. Bacon.

Shake the bags

Of hoarding abbots; their imprison'd angels
Set thou at liberty. Shakespeare.

ANGEL. adj. Resembling angels; angelical.

I have mark'd

A thousand blushing apparitions
Start into her face; a thousand innocent flames
In angel whiteness bear away those blushes. Shakespeare.

Or virgins visited by angel powers,
With golden crowns, and wreaths of heav'nly flow'rs. Pope's Rape of the Lock.

ANGEL-LIKE. adj. [from angel and like.] Resembling an angel.

In heav'n itself thou sure wer't drest
With that angel-like disguise. Waller.

ANGEL-SHOT. n. f. [perhaps properly angle- shot, being folden together with a hinge.] Chain shot, being a cannon bullet cut in two, and the halves being joined together by a chain. Dict.

ANGELICA. n. f. [Lat. ab angelica virtute.]
The name of a plant.

It has winged leaves divided into large segments; its stalks are hollow and jointed; the flowers grow in an umbel upon the tops of the stalks, and consist of five leaves, succeeded by two large channelled seeds.

The species are, 1. Common or manured ange- lica. 2. Greater wild angelica. 3. Shining Canada angelica. 4. Mountain perennial angelica, with columbine leaves. Miller.

ANGELICA. (Berry-bearing) [Aralia, Lat.]

The flower consists of many leaves, expanding in form of a rose, which are naked, growing on the top of the ovary: these flowers are succeeded by globular fruits, which are soft and succulent, and full of oblong seeds. Miller.

ANGELICAL. adj. [angelicus, Lat.]

1. Resembling angels.

It discovereth unto us the glorious works of God, and carried up, with an angelical swiftness, our eyes, that our mind, being informed of his visible marvels, may continually travel upward. Raleigh.

2. Partaking of the nature of angels.

Others more mild
Retreated in a silent valley, sing
With notes angelical to many a harp,
Their own heroic deeds, and hapless fall
By doom of battle. Milton.

3. Belonging to angels; suiting the nature or dignity of angels.

It may be encouragement to consider the pleasure of speculations, which do ravish and sublime the thoughts with more clear angelical contenments. Wilkins's Decadus.

ANGELICALNESS. n. f. [from angelical.] The quality of being angelical; resemblance of angels; excellence more than human.

ANGELICK. adj. [angelicus, Lat.] Partaking of the nature of angels; angelical; above human.

Here happy creature, fair angelick Eve,
Partake thou also. Milton.

My fancy form'd thee of angelick kind,
Some emanation of th' all beauteous mind. Pope.

ANGELOT. n. f. A musical instrument, somewhat resembling a lute. Dict.

ANGER. n. f. [a word of no certain etymology, but, with most probability, derived by Skinner from ange, Sax. veged; which, however, seems to come originally from the Latin ango.]

1. Anger is uneasiness or discomfort of the mind, upon the receipt of any injury, with a present purpose of revenge. Locke.

Anger is like

A full hot horse, who being allow'd his way,
Self-mettle tires him. Shakespeare.

Was the Lord displeased against the rivers? was thine anger against the rivers? was thy wrath against the sea, that thou didst ride upon thine horses and thy chariots of salvation? Habb. iii. 8.

Anger is, according to some, a transient hatred, or at least very like it. South.

2. Pain, or smart, of a fore or swelling. In this sense it seems plainly deducible from angor.

I made the experiment, setting the moxa where the first violence of my pain began, and where the greatest anger and soreness still continued, notwithstanding the swelling of my foot. Temple.

To ANGER. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To make angry; to provoke; to enrage.

Who would anger the meanest artisan, which carrieth a good mind? Hooker.

Sometimes he angers me,

With telling me of the moldwarp and the ant. Shakespeare.

There were some late taxes and impositions introduced, which rather angered than grieved the people. Clarendon.

It anger'd Turenne, once upon a day,
To see a footman kick'd that took his pay. Pope.

2. To make painful.

He turneth the humours back, and maketh the wound bleed inwards, and angereth malign ulcers and pernicious imposthumations. Bacon.

ANGRILY. adv. [from anger.] In an angry manner like one offended: it is now written an- grily.

Why, how now, Hecat, you look angrily.

Shakespeare.

Such jester's dishonest indiscretion, is rather charitably to be pitied, than their exception either angrily to be grieved at, or seriously to be con-futed. Garew.

ANGIOGRAPHY. n. f. [from ἄνγιστος and γραφία.]
A description of vessels in the human body; nerves, veins, arteries, and lymphatics.

ANGIOLOGY. n. f. [from ἄνγιστος and λόγος.] A treatise or discourse of the vessels of a human body.

ANGIOMONOSPERMOUS. adj. [from ἄνγιστος, μόνος, and σπέρμα.] Such plants as have but one single seed in the seed-pod.

ANGIOTOMY. n. f. [from ἄνγιστος and τομή, to cut.] A cutting open of the vessels, as in the opening of a vein or artery.

ANGLE. n. f. [angle, Fr. angulus, Lat.] The space intercepted between two lines intersecting or meeting, so as, if continued, they would intersect each other.

Angle of the centre of a circle, is an angle whose vertex, or angular point, is at the centre of a circle, and whose legs are two semidiameters of that circle. Stone's Dict.

ANGLE. n. f. [angel, Germ. and Dutch.] An instrument to take fish, consisting of a rod, a line, and a hook.

She also had an angle in her hand; but the taker was so taken, that she had forgotten taking. Sidney.

Give me thine angle, we'll to the river there,
My musick playing far off, I will betray
Tawny fin'd fish; my bending hook shall pierce
Their slimy jaws. Shakespeare.

The patient fisher takes his silent stand,
Intent, his angle trembling in his hand;
With looks unmov'd, he hopes the scaly breed,
And eyes the dancing cork, and bending reed. Pope.

To ANGLE. v. n. [from the noun.]

1. To fish with a rod and hook.

The ladies angling in the crystal lake,
Feast on the waters with the prey they take. Waller.

2. To try to gain by some insinuating artifices, as fishes are caught by a bait.

If he spake courteously, he angled the people's hearts: if he were silent, he mused upon some dangerous plot. Sidney.

By this face,

This seeming brow of justice, did he win
The hearts of all that he did angle for. Shakespeare.

The pleasant 'st angling is to see the fish
Cut with her golden oars the silver stream,
And greedily devour the treacherous bait;
So angle we for Beatrice. Shakespeare.

ANGLE-ROD. n. f. [angel roede, Dutch.] The stick to which the line and hook are hung.

It differeth much in greatness; the smallest being fit for thatching of houses; the second bigness is used for angle-rods; and in China, for beating of offenders upon the thighs. Bacon.

He makes a May-fly to a miracle, and furnishes the whole country with angle-rods. Addison.

ANGLER. n. f. [from angle.] He that fishes with an angle.

He, like a patient angler, ere he strook,
Wou'd let them play a while upon the hook. Dryden.

Neither do birds alone, but many sorts of fishes, feed upon insects; as is well known to anglers, who bait their hooks with them. Ray.

ANGLICISM. n. f. [from Anglus, Lat.] A form of speech peculiar to the English language; an English idiom.

They corrupt their stile with untutoured Angli- cisms. Milton.

ANGOBBER. n. f. A kind of pear.

ANGOUR. n. f. [angor, Lat.] Pain.

If the patient be surprized with a lipothymous angour, and great oppress about the stomach, expect no relief from cordials. Harvey.

ANGRILY. adv. [from angry.] In an angry manner; furiously; peevishly.

I will

ANG

I will sit as quiet as a lamb;
I will not stir, nor wince, nor speak a word,
Nor look upon the iron angrily. Shakespeare.
ANGRY. adj. [from anger.]
1. Touched with anger; provoked.
Oh! let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak:
peradventure there shall be thirty found there. Gen. xviii. 30.

2. It seems properly to require, when the object of anger is mentioned, the particle at before a thing, and with before a person; but this is not always observed.

Your Coriolanus is not much missed, but with his friends; the commonwealth doth stand, and so would do, were he angry at it. Shakespeare.

Now therefore be not grieved, nor angry with yourselves, that ye fold me hither: for God did send me before you to preserve life. Gen. xlv. 5.

I think it a vast pleasure, that whenever two people of merit regard one another, so many scoundrels envy and are angry at them. Swift.

3. Having the appearance of anger; having the effect of anger.

The north wind driveth away rain: so doth an angry countenance a backbiting tongue. Prov. xxv. 23.

4. In chirurgery, painful; inflamed; smarting. This serum, being accompanied by the thinner parts of the blood, grows red and angry; and, wanting its due regrefs into the mass, first gathers into a hard swelling, and, in a few days, ripens into matter, and so discharges. Wifman.

ANGUISH. n. f. [angoisse, Fr. angor, Lat.] Excessive pain either of mind or body; applied to the mind, it means the pain of sorrow, and is seldom used to signify other passions.

Not all so cheerful seemed she of sight,
As was her sister; whether dread did dwell,
Or anguish in her heart, is hard to tell. Fairy Queen.

Virtue's but anguish, when 'tis several,
By occasion walk'd, and circumstantial;
True virtue's foul's always in all deeds all. Donne.

They had persecutors, whose invention was as great as their cruelty. Wit and malice conspired to find out such deaths, and those of such incredible anguish, that only the manner of dying was the punishment, death itself the deliverance. South.

Perpetual anguish fills his anxious breast,
Not stopt by business, nor compos'd by rest;
No musick cheers him, nor no feast can please. Dryden.

ANGUISHED. adj. [from anguish.] Seized with anguish; tortured; excessively pained: not in use.

Feel no touch
Of confidence, but of fame, and be Anguish'd, not that 'twas sin, but that 'twas she. Donne.

ANGULAR. adj. [from angle.]
1. Having angles or corners; cornered.

As for the figure of crystal, it is for the most part hexagonal, or six cornered, being built upon a confused matter, from whence, as it were from a root, angular figures arise, even as in the amethyst and bafaltes. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

2. Consisting of an angle.

The distance of the edges of the knives from one another, at the distance of four inches from the angular point, where the edges of the knives meet, was the eighth part of an inch. Newton's Opticks.

ANGULARITY. n. f. [from angular.] The quality of being angular, or having corners.

ANGULARLY. adv. [from angular.] With angles or corners.

Another part of the same solution afforded us an ice angularly figured. Boyle.

ANGULARNESS. n. f. [from angular.] The quality of being angular.

ANGULATED. adj. [from angle.] Formed with angles or corners.

Topazes, amethysts, or emeralds, which grow in the fissures, are ordinarily crystallized, or shot into angulated figures; whereas, in the strata, they are found in rude lumps, like yellow, purple, and green pebbles. Woodward.

ANGULOSITY. n. f. [from angulus.] Angularity; cornered form.

ANGULOUS. adj. [from angle.] Hooked; angular.

Nor can it be a difference, that the parts of solid bodies are held together by hooks, and angulus involutions; since the coherence of the parts of these will be of as difficult a conception. Glanville.

ANGUST. adj. [angustus, Lat.] Narrow; strait.

ANGUSTATION. n. f. [from angustus.] The act of making narrow; straitening; the state of being narrowed.

The cause may be referred either to the grumousness of the blood, or to the obstruction of the vein somewhere in its passage, by some angustation upon it by part of the tumour. Wifman.

ANGELATION. n. f. [angelus, Lat.] The act of painting; the state of being out of breath.

ANGELISE. adj. [angelus, Lat.] Out of breath; panting; labouring of being out of breath. Dict.

ANGIENT. adj. [angient, Fr.] Frustrated; brought to nothing.

ANGHTS. adv. [a for at, and night.] In the night time.

Sir Toby, you must come in earlier anghts; my lady takes great exceptions at your ill hours. Shakespeare.

ANIL. n. f. The shrub from whose leaves and stalks indigo is prepared.

ANILENESS. n. f. [anilitas, Lat.] The state of being an old woman; the old age of women.

ANIMABLE. adj. [from animate.] That which may be put into life, or receive animation. Dict.

ANIMADVERSION. n. f. [animadversio, Lat.] 1. Reproof; severe censure; blame.

He dismissed their commissioners with severe and sharp animadversions. Clarendon.

2. Punishment. When the object of animadversion is mentioned, it has the particle on or upon before it.

When a bill is debating in parliament, it is usual to have the controversy handled by pamphlets on both sides; without the least animadversion upon the authors. Swift.

3. In law.

An ecclesiastical censure, and an ecclesiastical animadversion, are different things; for a censure has a relation to a spiritual punishment, but an animadversion has only a respect to a temporal one; as, degradation, and the delivering the person over to the secular court. Ayliffe's Parergon.

4. Perception; power of notice: not in use.

The soul is the sole percipient which hath animadversion and sense properly so called. Glanville.

ANIMADVERSIVE. adj. [from animadversio.] That has the power of perceiving; percipient: not in use.

The representation of objects to the soul, the only animadversive principle, is conveyed by motions made on the immediate organs of sense. Glanville.

ANIMADVERSIVENESS. n. f. [from animadversio.] The power of animadverting, or making judgment. Dict.

ANIMADVERT. v. n. [animadverto, Lat.] 1. To pass censures upon.

I should not animadvert on him, who was a painful observer of the decorum of the stage, if he had not used extreme severity in his judgment of the incomparable Shakespeare. Dryden.

2. To inflict punishments. In both senses with the particle upon.

If the Author of the universe animadverts upon men here below, how much more will it become him to do it upon their entrance into a higher state of being? Grew.

ANIMADVERTER. n. f. [from animadverto.] He that passes censures, or inflicts punishments.

God is a strict observer of, and a severe animadverter upon, such as presume to partake of those mysteries, without such a preparation. South.

ANIMAL. n. f. [animal, Lat.] 1. A living creature corporeal, distinct, on the one side, from pure spirit; on the other, from mere matter.

Animals are such beings, which, besides the power of growing, and producing their like, as plants and vegetables have, are endowed also with sensation and spontaneous motion. Mr. Ray gives two schemes of tables of them.

Animals are either

Sanguineous, that is such as have blood, which breathe either by

Lungs, having either

Two ventricles in their heart, and those either

Viviparous,

Aquatick, as the whale kind,

Terrestrial, as quadrupeds;

Oviparous, as birds.

But one verticle in the heart, as frogs, tortoises, and serpents.

Gills, as all sanguineous fishes, except the whale kind.

Exsanguineous, or without blood, which may be divided into

Greater, and those either,

Naked,

Terrestrial, as naked snails.

Aquatick, as the poulp, cuttle-fish, &c.

Covered with a tegument, either

Crustaceous, as lobsters and crab-fish.

Testaceous, either

Univalve, as limpets;

Bivalve, as oysters, mufcles, cockles;

Turbinate, as periwinkles, snails, &c.

Lesser, as insects of all sorts.

Viviparous hairy animals, or quadrupeds, are either

Hoofed, which are either

Whole-footed or hoofed, as the horse and ass;

Cloven-footed, having the hoof divided into

Two principal parts, called bifidula, either

Such as chew not the cud, as swine;

Ruminant, or such as chew the cud; divided into

Such as have perpetual and hollow horns.

Beef-kind,

Sheep-kind,

Goat-kind.

Such as have solid, branched and deciduous horns, as the deer-kind.

Four parts, or quadrifidula, as the rhinoceros and hippopotamus.

Clawed or digitate, having the foot divided into

Two parts or toes, having two nails, as the camel-kind;

Many toes or claws; either

Undivided, as the elephant;

Divided, which have either

Broad nails, and an human shape, as apes;

Narrower, and more pointed nails, which in respect of their teeth, are divided into such as have

Many foreteeth, or cutters in each jaw;

The greater, which have

A shorter snout and rounder head, as the cat-kind;

A longer snout and head, as the dog-kind.

The lesser, the vermin or weazel-kind.

Only two large and remarkable fore-teeth, all which are phytivorous, and are called the hare-kind. Ray.

Vegetables are proper enough to repair animals, as being near of the same specific gravity with the animal juices, and as consisting of the same parts with animal substances, spirit, water, salt, oil, earth; all which are contained in the sap they derive from the earth. Arbutnot on Aliments.

Some of the animated substances have various organical or instrumental parts, fitted for a variety of motions from place to place, and a spring of life within themselves, as beasts, birds, fishes, and insects; these are called animals. Other animated substances are called vegetables, which have within themselves the principles of another sort of life and growth, and of various productions of leaves and fruit, such as we see in plants, herbs, and trees. Watts's Logic.

2. By way of contempt, we say of a stupid man, that he is a stupid animal.

A'NIMAL. adj. [animalis, Lat.]

1. That which belongs or relates to animals. There are things in the world of spirits, where in our ideas are very dark and confused; such as their union with animate nature, the way of their acting on material beings, and their converse with each other. Watts's Logick.

2. Animal functions, distinguished from natural and vital, are the lower powers of the mind, as, the will, memory, and imagination.

3. Animal life is opposed, on one side, to intellectual, and, on the other, to vegetable.

4. Animal is used in opposition to spiritual or rational; as, the animal nature.

A'NIMAL'CULE. n. f. [animalculum, Lat.] A small animal; particularly those which are in their first and smallest state.

We are to know, that they all come of the seed of animalcules of their own kind, that were before laid there. Ray.

A'NIMAL'ITY. n. f. [from animal.] The state of animal existence.

The word animal first only signifies human animality. In the minor proposition, the word animal, for the same reason, signifies the animality of a goose: thereby it becomes an ambiguous term, and unfit to build the conclusion upon. Watts.

To A'NIMATE. v. a. [animare, Lat.]

1. To quicken; to make alive; to give life to: as, the soul animates the body; man must have been animated by a higher power.

2. To give powers to; to heighten the powers or effect of anything.

But none, ah! none can animate the lyre, And the mute strings with vocal souls inspire; Whether the learn'd Minerva be her theme, Or chaste Diana bathing in the stream; None can record their heavenly praise so well As Helen, in whose eyes ten thousand Cupids dwell. Dryden.

3. To encourage; to incite.

The more to animate the people, he stood on high, from whence he might be best heard, and cried unto them with a loud voice. Kneller.

He was animated to expect the papacy, by the prediction of a soothsayer, that one should succeed Pope Leo, whose name should be Adrian. Bacon.

A'NIMATE. adj. [from To animate.] Alive; possessing animal life.

All bodies have spirits and pneumatual parts within them; but the main differences between animate and inanimate, are two: the first is, that the spirit of things animate are all contained within themselves, and are branched in veins and secret canals; as blood is; and, in living creatures, the spirits have not only branches, but certain cells or seats, where the principal spirits do reside, and whereunto the rest do resort: but the spirits of things inanimate are shut in, and cut off by the tangible parts, and are not pervious one to another, as air is in snow. Bacon.

Nobler birth

Of creatures animate with gradual life, Of growth, sense, reason, all summ'd up in man. Milton.

There are several topicks used against atheism and idolatry; such as the visible marks of divine wisdom and goodness in the works of the creation, the vital union of souls with matter, and the admirable structure of animate bodies. Bentley.

A'NIMATED. participial adj. [from animate.] Lively; vigorous.

Warriors the fires with animated sounds; Pours balm into the bleeding lover's wounds. Pope.

A'NIMATENESS. n. f. [from animate.] The state of being animated.

A'NIMATION. n. f. [from animate.]

1. The act of animating or enlivening.

Plants or vegetables are the principal part of the third day's work. They are the first producat, which is the word of animation. Bacon.

2. The state of being enlivened.

Two general motions in all animation are its beginning and encrease; and two more to run through its state and declination.

A'NIMATIVE. adj. [from animate.] That which has the power of giving life, or animating. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

A'NIMA'TOR. n. f. [from animate.] That which gives life; or any thing analogous to life, as motion.

Those bodies being of a congenerous nature, do readily receive the impressions of their motor, and, if not fettered by their gravity, conform themselves to situations, wherein they best unite to their animators. Brown.

A'NIMO'SE. adj. [animositas, Lat.] Full of spirit; hot; vehement. Di.

A'NIMO'SENESS. n. f. [from animose.] Spirit; heat, vehemence of temper. Di.

A'NIMO'SITY. n. f. [animositas, Lat.] Vehemence of hatred; passionate malignity. It implies rather the disposition to break out into outrages, than the outrage itself.

They were sure to bring passion, animosity, and malice enough of their own, what evidence forever they had from others. Clarendon.

If there is not some method found out for allaying these heats and animosities among the fair sex, one does not know to what outrages they may proceed. Addison.

No religious sect ever carried their averfions for each other to greater heights than our state parties have done; who, the more to inflame their passions, have mixed religious and civil animosities together; borrowing one of their appellations from the church. Swift.

A'NISE. n. f. [anifum, Lat.] A species of apium or parsley, with large sweet scented seeds. This plant is not worth propagating in England for use, because the seeds can be had much better and cheaper from Italy. Miller.

Ye pay the tythe of mint, and anise, and cummin, and have omitted the weightier matters of the law, judgment, mercy, and faith: these ought ye to have done, and not to leave the other undone. Matthew xxiii. 23.

A'NKER. n. f. [anker, Dut.] A liquid measure chiefly used at Amsterdam. It is the fourth part of the awm, and contains two stekans: each stekan consists of sixteen mengles; the mengle being equal to two of our wine quarts. Cham.

A'NKLE. n. f. [ancleop, Sax. ankel, Dutch.] The joint which joins the foot to the leg.

One of his ankles was much swelled and ulcerated on the inside, in several places. Wifeman.

My simple system shall suppose, That Alma enters at the toes; That then she mounts by just degrees Up to the ankles, legs and knees. Prior.

A'NKLE-BONE. n. f. [from ankle and bone.] The bone of the ankle.

The shin-bone, from the knee to the instep, is made by shadowing one half of the leg with a single shadow, the ankle-bone will shew itself by a shadow given underneath, as the knee. Peacbam.

A'NNALIST. n. f. [from annals.] A writer of annals.

Their own annalist has given the same title to that of Syrmium. Atterbury.

A'NNALS. n. f. without singular number. [annales, Lat.] Histories digested in the exact order of time; narratives in which every event is recorded under its proper year.

Could you with patience hear, or I relate, O nymph! the tedious annals of our fate! Through such a train of woes if I should run, The day wou'd sooner than the tale be done! Dryden.

We are assured, by many glorious examples in the annals of our religion, that every one, in the like circumstances of distress, will not act and argue thus; but thus will every one be tempted to act. Rogers.

A'NNATS. n. f. without singular. annates, Lat.] 1. First fruits; because the rate of first fruits paid of spiritual livings, is after one year's profit. Cowel.

2. Masses said in the Romish church for the space of a year, or for any other time, either for the soul of a person deceased, or for the benefit of a person living. Ayliffe's Parergon.

To ANNE'AL. v. a. [alan, to heat, Saxon.] 1. To heat glass, that the colours laid on it may pierce through.

But when thou dost anneal in glass thy story, — then the light and glory More rev'rend grows, and more doth win, Which else shews watterish, bleak, and thin. Herbert.

When you purpose to anneal, take a plate of iron made fit for the oven; or take a blue stone, which being made fit for the oven, lay it upon the cross bars of iron. Peacbam.

Which her own inward symmetry reveal'd, And like a picture shone, in glass anneal'd. Dryden.

2. To heat glass after it is blown, that it may not break.

3. To heat any thing in such a manner as to give it the true temper.

To ANNEX. v. a. [annecto, annexum, Lat. annexer, Fr.]

1. To unite to at the end; as, he annexed a codicil to his will.

2. To unite; as, a smaller thing to a greater; as, he annexed a province to his kingdom.

3. To unite à posteriori; annexion always presupposing something: thus we may say, punishment is annexed to guilt; but not guilt to punishment.

Concerning fate or destiny, the opinions of those learned men, that have written thereof, may be safely received, had they not thereunto annexed and fastened an inevitable necessity, and made it more general and universally powerful than it is. Raleigh.

Nations will decline so low, From virtue, which is reason, that no wrong, But justice, and some fatal curse annex'd, Deprives them of their outward liberty. Milton.

I mean not the authority, which is annexed to your office; I speak of that only which is inborn and inherent to your person. Dryden.

He cannot but love virtue wherever it is, and annex happiness always to the exercise of it. Atterbury.

The temporal reward is annexed to the bare performance of the action, but the eternal to the obedience. Rogers.

ANNEX. n. f. [from To annex.] The thing annexed; additament.

Failing in his first attempt to be but like the highest in heaven, he hath obtained of men to be the same on earth, and hath accordingly assumed the annexes of divinity. Brown.

ANNEXATION. n. f. [from annex.]

1. Conjunction; addition.

If we can return to that charity and peaceable mindedness, which Christ so vehemently recommends to us, we have his own promise, that the whole body will be full of light, Matt. vi. that all other christian virtues will, by way of concomitance or annexation, attend them. Hammond.

2. Union; act or practice of adding or uniting.

How annexations of benefices first came into the church, whether by the prince's authority, or the pope's licence, is a very great dispute. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ANNEXION. n. f. [from annex.] The act of annexing; addition.

It is necessary to engage the fears of men, by the annexion of such penalties as will overbalance temporal pleasure. Rogers.

ANNEXMENT. n. f. [from annex.]

1. The act of annexing.

2. The thing annexed.

When it falls, Each small annexment, petty consequence, Attends the boist'rous ruin. Shakespeare.

ANNIHILABLE. adj. [from annihilare.] That which which may be reduced to nothing; that which may be put out of existence.

To ANNHILATE. v. a. [ad and nihilum, Lat.]

1. To reduce to nothing; to put out of existence.

It is impossible for any body to be utterly annihilated; but that as it was the work of the omnipotency of God to make somewhat of nothing; so it requireth the like omnipotency to turn somewhat into nothing.

Thou taught'st me, by making me Love her, who doth neglect both me and thee, T'invent and practise this one way, t' annihilate all three.

He despaired of God's mercy; he, by a decoliation of all hope, annihilated his mercy.

Whose friendship can stand against assaults, strong enough to annihilate the friendship of puny minds; such an one has reached true constancy.

Some imagined, water sufficient to a deluge was created, and, when the business was done, disbanded, and annihilated.

2. To destroy, so as to make the thing otherwise than it was.

The flood that hath altered, deformed, or rather annihilated, this place, so as no man can find any mark or memory thereof.

3. To annul; to destroy the agency of any thing.

There is no reason, that any one commonwealth should annihilate that whereupon the whole world has agreed.

ANNIHILATION. n. f. [from annihilate.] The act of reducing to nothing. The state of being reduced to nothing.

God hath his influence into the very essence of things, without which their utter annihilation could not choose but follow.

That knowledge, which as spirits we obtain, Is to be val'd in the midst of pain:

Annihilation were to lose heav'n more:

We are not quite exil'd, where thought can soar.

ANNIVERSARY. n. f. [anniversarius, Lat.]

1. A day celebrated as it returns in the course of the year.

For encouragement to follow the example of martyrs, the primitive christians met at the places of their martyrdom, to praise God for them, and to observe the anniversary of their sufferings.

2. The act of celebration, or performance, in honour of the anniversary day.

Donne had never seen Mrs. Drury, whom he has made immortal in his admirable anniversaries.

3. Anniversary is an office in the Romish church, celebrated not only once a year, but which ought to be said daily through the year, for the soul of the deceased.

ANNIVERSARY. adj. [anniversarius, Lat.] Returning with the revolution of the year; annual; yearly.

The heaven whirled about with admirable celerity, most constantly finishing its anniversary vicissitudes.

They deny giving any worship to a creature, as inconsistent with christianity; but confess the honour and esteem for the martyrs, which they expressed by keeping their anniversary days, and recommending their example.

ANNO DOMINI. [Lat.] In the year of our Lord; as, anno domini, or A. D. 1751; that is, in the seventeen hundred and fifty-first year from the birth of our Saviour.

ANNOUNCEANCE. n. f. [from annoy, but not now in use.]

It hath a double signification. Any hurt done either to a publick place, as highway, bridge, or common river, or to a private, by laying any thing that may breed infection, by encroaching, or such like means. The writ that is brought up on this transgression. See NUISANCE, the word now used.

ANNOLIS. n. f. An American animal like a lizard.

ANNOTATION. n. f. [annotatio, Lat.] Explanations or remarks written upon books; notes.

It might appear very improper to publish annotations, without the text itself whereunto they relate.

ANNOTATOR. n. f. [Lat.] A writer of notes, or annotations; a scholiast; a commentator.

I have not that respect for the annotators which they generally meet with in the world.

To ANNO'UNCE. v. a. [annuncer, Fr. annuncie, Lat.]

1. To publish; to proclaim.

Of the Messiah I have heard foretold By all the prophets; of thy birth at length

Announc'd by Gabriel with the first I knew.

2. To pronounce; to declare by a judicial sentence.

Those, mighty Jove, mean time, thy glorious care, Who model nations, publish laws, announce

Or life or death.

To ANNOY. v. a. [annoyer, Fr.] To incommode; to vex; to tease; to molest.

Woe to poor man; each outward thing annoys him;

He heaps in inward grief, that most destroys him.

Her joyous presence and sweet company, In full content he there did long enjoy;

Ne wicked envy, nor vile jealousy, His dear delights were able to annoy.

As one who long in populous city pent, Where houses thick, and sewers, annoy the air, Forth issuing on a summer's morn to breathe Among the pleasant villages and farms Adjoin'd, from each thing met conceives delight.

Insects seldom use their offensive weapons, unless provoked: let them but alone, and annoy them not.

ANNOY. n. f. [from the verb.] Injury; molestation; trouble.

Sleep, Richmond, sleep in peace, and wake in joy;

Good angels guard thee from the boar's annoy.

All pain and joy is in their way; The things we fear bring less annoy, Than fear, and hope brings greater joy;

But in themselves they cannot stay. What then remains, but, after past annoy, To take the good vicissitude of joy.

ANNOYANCE. n. f. [from annoy.] 1. That which annoys; that which hurts.

A grain, a dust, a gnat, a wand'ring hair, Any annoyance in that precious sense.

Crows, ravens, rooks, and magpies, are great annoyances to corn.

2. The state of being annoyed; or act of annoying.

The spit venom of their poisoned hearts breaketh out to the annoyance of others.

The greatest annoyance and disturbance of mankind, has been from one of those two things, force or fraud.

For the further annoyance and terrour of any besieged place, they would throw into it dead bodies.

ANNOYER. n. f. [from To annoy.] The person that annoys.

ANNUAL. adj. annuel, Fr. [from annus, Lat.] 1. That which comes yearly.

Annual for me, the grape, the rose, renew, The juice nectareous, and the balmy dew.

2. That which is reckoned by the year.

The king's majesty Does purpose honour to you; to which A thousand pounds a-year, annual support, Out of his grace he adds.

3. That which lasts only a year.

The dying in the winter of the roots of plants that are annual, seemeth to be caused by the over-expense of the sap; which being prevented, they will superannuate, if they stand warm.

Every tree may, in some sense, be said to be an annual plant, both leaf, flower, and fruit, proceeding from the coat that was superinduced over the wood the last year.

ANNUALLY. adv. [from annual.] Yearly; every year.

By two drachms, they thought it sufficient to signify a heart; because the heart at one year weigheth two drachms, that is, a quarter of an ounce; and unto fifty years annually encreaseth the weight of one drachm.

The whole strength of a nation is the utmost that a prince can raise annually from his subjects.

ANNUITANT. n. f. [from annuity.] He that possesses or receives an annuity.

ANNUITY. n. f. [annuité, Fr.]

1. A yearly rent to be paid for term of life or years. The differences between a rent and an annuity are, that every rent is going out of land; but an annuity charges only the grantor, or his heirs, that have assets by descent. The second difference is, that, for the recovery of an annuity, no action lies, but only the writ of annuity against the grantor, his heirs or successors; but of a rent, the same actions lie as do of land. The third difference is, that an annuity is never taken for assets, because it is no freehold in law: nor shall be put in execution upon a statute merchant, statute staple, or elegit, as a rent may.

2. A yearly allowance.

He was generally known to be the son of one earl, and brother to another, who supplied his expence, beyond what his annuity from his father would bear.

To ANNU'L. v. a. [from nullus.]

1. To make void; to nullify; to abrogate; to abolish.

That which gives force to the law, is the authority that enacts it; and whoever destroys this authority, does, in effect, annul the law.

2. To reduce to nothing; to obliterate.

Light, the pure work of God, to me's extinct, And all her various objects of delight

Annul'd, which might in part my grief have eas'd.

ANNUAL. adj. [from annulus, Lat.] In the form of a ring.

That they might not, in bending the arm or leg, rise up, he has tied them to the bones by annular ligaments.

ANNUALY. adj. [from annulus, Lat.] In the form of rings.

Because continual respiration is necessary, the wind pipe is made with annular cartilages, that the sides of it may not flag and fall together.

ANNULET. n. f. [from annulus, Lat.]

1. A little ring.

2. [In heraldry.] A difference or mark of distinction, which the fifth brother of any family ought to bear in his coat of arms.

3. Annulets are also a part of the coat-armour of several families; they were anciently reputed a mark of nobility and jurisdiction, it being the custom of prelates to receive their investiture per baculum & annulum.

4. [In architecture.] The small square members, in the Dorick capital, under the quarter round, are called annulets.

5. Annulet is also used for a narrow flat moulding common to other parts of the column; so called, because it encompasses the column round.

To ANNUMERATE. v. a. [annumero, Lat.] To add to a former number; to unite to something before mentioned.

ANNUMERATION. n. f. [annumeratio, Lat.] Addition to a former number.

ANOTHER, adj. [from an and other.]

1. Not the same.

He that will not lay a foundation for perpetual disorder, must of necessity find another rise of government than that. Locke.

2. One more; a new addition to the former number.

—A fourth?—

What! will the line stretch out to th' crack of doom?

Another yet?—a seventh! I'll see no more. Shakespeare.

3. Any other; any one else.

If one man sin against another, the judge shall judge him. 1 Samuel, ii. 25.

Why not of her; preferr'd above the rest,

By him with knightly deeds, and open love profess'd; So had another been, where he his vows address'd. Dryden.

4. Not one's self.

A man shall have diffused his life, his self, and his whole concerns to far, that he can weep his sorrows with another's eyes; when he has another heart besides his own, both to share, and to support his grief. South.

5. Widely different; much altered.

When the soul is beaten from its station, and the mounds of virtue are broken down, it becomes quite another thing from what it was before. South.

ANOTHERGAINES, adj. [See ANOTHER-GUESS.] Of another kind. This word I have found only in Sidney.

If my father had not plaid the hasty fool, I might have had anothergainess husband than Darnley. Sidney.

ANOTHERGUESS, adj. [This word, which though rarely used in writing, is somewhat frequent in colloquial language, I conceive to be corrupted from another guise; that is, of a different guise, or manner, or form.] Of a different kind.

Oh Hocus! where art thou? It used to go in anotherguess manner in thy time. Arbutnot.

ANSATED, adj. [anatus, Lat.] Having handles; or something in the form of handles.

TO ANSWER, v. n. [The etymology is uncertain; the Saxons had andspawan, but in another sense; the Dutch have antwoorden.]

1. To speak in return to a question.

Are we succour'd? are the Moors remov'd?

Answer these questions first, and then a thousand more. Dryden.

Answer them altogether.

2. To speak in opposition.

No man was able to answer him a word. Matt. xxii. 46.

If it be said, we may discover the elementary ingredients of things, I answer, that it is not necessary that such a discovery should be practicable. Boyle.

3. To be accountable for; with for.

Those many had not dared to do evil

If the first man that did th' edict infringe

Had answered for his deed. Shakespeare.

Some men have sinned in the principles of humanity, and must answer for not being men. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

If there be any absurdity in this, our author must answer for it. Locke.

4. To vindicate; to give a justificatory account of; with for.

The night, so impudently fixed for my last, made little impression on myself; but I cannot answer for my family. Swift.

5. To give an account.

How they have been since received, and so well improved, let those answer either to God or man, who have been the authors and promoters of such wife council. Temple.

He wants a father to protect his youth,

And rear him up to virtue. You must bear

The future blame, and answer to the world

When you refuse the easy honest means

Of taking care of him. Southern.

6. To correspond to; to suit with.

As in water face answereth to face, so the heart of man to man. Prov. xxvii. 19.

7. To be equivalent to; to stand for something else.

A feast is made for laughter, and wine maketh merry: but money answereth all things. Ecc. x. 19.

8. To satisfy any claim or petition, of right or justice.

Zelmane with rageful eyes bade him defend himself; for no less than his life would answer it. Sidney.

Revenge the jeering and disdain'd contempt

Of this proud king, who studies day and night

To answer all the debt he owes unto you,

Ev'n with the bloody payments of your deaths. Shakespeare.

Let his neck answer for it if there is any martial law in the world. Shakespeare.

Men no sooner find their appetites unanswered, than they complain the times are injurious. Raleigh.

That yearly rent is still paid, even as the former casualty itself was wont to be, in parcel meal paid in and answered. Bacon.

9. To act reciprocally.

Say, do'st thou yet the Roman harp command? Do the strings answer to thy noble hand? Dryden.

10. To stand as opposite or correlative to something else.

There can but two things create love, perfection and usefulness; to which answer, on our part, 1. Admiration; and, 2. Desire; and both these are centered in love. Taylor.

11. To bear proportion to.

Weapons must needs be dangerous things, if they answered the bulk of so prodigious a person. Swift.

12. To perform what is endeavoured or intended by the agent.

Our part is, to choose out the most deserving objects, and the most likely to answer the ends of our charity; and when this is done, all is done that lies in our power: the rest must be left to providence. Atterbury.

13. To comply with.

He dies that touches of this fruit,

Till I and my affairs are answered. Shakespeare.

14. To succeed; to produce the wished event.

Jafon followed her counsel, whereto, when the event had answered, he again demanded the fleece. Raleigh.

In operations upon bodies for their version or alteration, the trial in great quantities doth not answer the trial in small: and so deceiveth many. Bacon.

15. To appear to any call, or authoritative summons; in which sense, though figuratively, the following passage may be, perhaps, taken.

Thou wert better in thy grave, than to answer, with thy uncovered body, this extremity of the skies. Shakespeare.

16. To be over-against any thing.

Fire answers fire, and, by their paly beams, Each battle sees the other's umber'd face. Shakespeare.

A'NSWER. n. f. [from To answer.]

That which is said, whether in speech or writing, in return to a question, or position.

It was a right answer of the physician to his patient, that had fore eyes: If you have more pleasure in wine than in your fight, wine is good. Locke.

How can we think of appearing at that tribunal, without being able to give a ready answer to the questions which he shall then put to us, about the poor and the afflicted, the hungry and the naked, the sick and imprisoned? Atterbury.

2. An account to be given to the demand of justice.

He'll call you to so hot an answer for it, That you shall chide your trespasses. Shakespeare.

3. In law, a confutation of a charge exhibited against a person.

A personal answer ought to have three qualities; it ought to be pertinent to the matter in hand; it ought to be absolute and unconditional; it ought to be clear and certain. Ayliffe.

A'NSWER-JOBBER. n. f. [from answer and jobber.] He that makes a trade of writing answers.

What disgusts me from having any thing to do with answer-jobbers, is, that they have no conscience. Swift.

A'NSWERABLE. adj. [from answer.]

1. That to which a reply may be made; that which may be answered; as, the argument, though subtle, is yet answerable.

2. Obligated to give an account; obliged to answer any demand of justice; or stand the trial of an accusation.

Every chief of every kindred or family should be answerable, and bound to bring forth every one of that kindred, at all times to be justified, when he should be required, or charged with any treason or felony. Spenser's State of Ireland.

Will any man argue, that if a physician should manifestly prescribe poison to all his patients, he cannot be justly punished, but is answerable only to God? Swift.

He cannot think ambition more justly laid to their charge, than to other men, because that would be to make church government answerable for the errors of human nature. Swift.

3. Correspondent.

It was but such a likeness as an imperfect glass doth give, answerable enough in some features and colours, but erring in others. Sidney.

The daughters of Atlas were Indies, who, accompanying such as came to be registered among the worthies, brought forth children answerable in quality to those that begot them. Raleigh.

4. Proportionate; suitable.

Only add Deeds to thy knowledge answerable; add faith, Add virtue, patience, temperance; add love By name to come call'd charity, the soul Of all the rest. Milton.

5. Suitable; suited.

The following, by certain estates of men, answerable to that which a great person himself professeth, as of soldiers to him that hath been employed in the wars, hath been a thing well taken even in monarchies. Bacon.

If answerable style I can obtain

Of my celestial patroness. Milton.

6. Equal; equivalent.

There be no kings whose means are answerable unto other men's desires. Raleigh.

7. Relative; correlative.

That, to every petition for things needful,

ANT

there should be some answerable sentence of thanks provided particularly to follow, is not requisite. Hooker.

A'NSWERABLY. adv. [from answerable.] In due proportion; with proper correspondence; suitably.

The broader seas are, if they be entire, and free from islands, they are answerably deeper. Brewerwood on Languages.

It bears light sorts, into the atmosphere, to a greater or lesser height answerably to the greater or lesser intenseness of the heat. Woodward.

A'NSWERABLENESS. n. f. [from answerable.] The quality of being answerable. Dict.

A'NSWERER. n. f. [from answer.]

1. He that answers; he that speaks in return to what another has spoken.

I know your mind, and I will satisfy it, neither will I do it like a niggardly answerer going no further than the bounds of the question. Sidney.

2. He that manages the controversy against one that has written first.

It is very unfair in any writer to employ ignorance and malice together; because it gives his answerer double work. Swift.

ANT. n. f. [æmetz, Sax, which Junius imagines, not without probability, to have been first contracted to æmt, and then softened to ant.] An emmet; a pismire. A small insect that lives in great numbers together in hillocks.

We'll set thee to school to an ant, to teach thee there's no lab'ring in the winter. Shakespeare.

Methinks, all cities now but ant-hills are, Where when the several labourers I see

For children, house, provision, taking pain, They're all but ants, carrying eggs, straw, and grain. Donne.

Learn each small people's genius, policies; The ant's republick, and the realm of bees. Pope.

ANT-BEAR. n. f. [from ant and bear.] An animal that feeds on ants.

Divers quadrupeds feed upon insects; and some live wholly upon them; as two sorts of tamanduas upon ants, which therefore are called in English ant-bears. Ray.

ANT-HILL, or HILLOCK. n. f. [from ant and hill.] The small protuberances of earth in which ants make their nests.

Put blue flowers into an ant-hill, they will be stained with red; because the ants drop upon them their stinging liquor, which hath the effect of oil of vitriol. Ray.

Those who have seen ant hillocks, have easily perceived those small heaps of corn about their nests. Addison.

AN'T. A contraction for and it, or rather and if it; as, an't please you; that is, and if it please you.

ANTAGONIST. n. f. [ἀντὶ and ἀγωνίζω.]

1. One who contends with another; an opponent. It implies generally a personal and particular opposition.

Our antagonists in these controversies may have met with some not unlike to Ithacius. Hooker.

What was set before him,

To heave, pull, draw, and break, he still perform'd, None daring to appear antagonist. Milton.

It is not fit, that the history of a person should appear, till the prejudice both of his antagonists and adherents be softened and subdued. Addison.

2. Contrary.

The short club consists of those who are under five feet; ours is to be composed of such as are above six. These we look upon as the two extremes and antagonists of the species; considering all these as neutrals, who fill up the middle space. Addison.

3. In anatomy, the antagonist is that muscle which counteracts some others.

A relaxation of a muscle must produce a spasm in its antagonist, because the equilibrium is destroyed. Arbutnot.

To ANTAGONIZE, v. n. [ἀντὶ and ἀγωνίζω.] To contend against another. Dict.

ANT

ANTALGICK. adj. [from ἀντὶ against, and ἀλγος, pain.] That which softens pain; anodyne.

ANTANACLISIS. n. f. [Lat. from ἀντι-αντις, from ἀντιπαύω, to drive back.]

1. A figure in rhetoric, when the same word is repeated in a different, if not in a contrary signification; as, In thy youth learn some craft, that in old age thou mayst get thy living without craft. Craft, in the first place, signifies science or occupation; in the second, deceit or subtilty.

2. It is also a returning to the matter at the end of a long parenthesis; as, Shall that heart (which does not only feel them, but hath all motion of his life placed in them), shall that heart, I say, &c. Smith's Rhetoric.

ANTAPHRODITICK. adj. [from ἀντὶ, against, and ἀφροδύτης, Venus.] That which is efficacious against the venereal disease.

ANTEAMBULATION. n. f. [from ante and ἀνταύω, Lat.] A walking before. Dict.

To ANTECEDE. v. n. [from ante, before, and cede, to go.] To precede; to go before.

It seems consonant to reason, that the fabrick of the world did not long antecede its motion. Hale.

ANTECEDENCE. n. f. [from antecede.] The act or state of going before; precedence.

It is impossible that mixed bodies can be eternal, because there is necessarily a pre-existence of the simple bodies, and an antecedence of their constitution preceding the existence of mixed bodies. Hale.

ANTECEDENT. adj. [antecedens, Lat.]

1. Going before; preceding. Antecedent is used, I think, only with regard to time; precedent, with regard both to time and place.

To assert, that God looked upon Adam's fall as a sin, and punished it, when, without any antecedent sin of his, it was impossible for him not to fall, seems a thing that highly reproaches essential equity and goodness. South.

2. It has to before the thing which is supposed to follow.

No one is so hardy as to say, God is in his debt; that he owed him a nobler being: for existence must be antecedent to merit. Collier.

Did the blood first exist, antecedent to the formation of the heart? But that is to set the effect before the cause. Bentley.

ANTECEDENT. n. f. [antecedens, Lat.]

1. That which goes before.

A duty of so mighty an influence, that it is indeed the necessary antecedent, if not also the direct cause of a sinner's return to God. South.

2. In grammar, the noun to which the relative is subjoined; as, the man who comes hither.

Let him learn the right joining of substantives with adjectives, the noun with the verb, and the relative with the antecedent. Asbam.

3. In logic, the first proposition of an enthymeme or argument, consisting only of two propositions. Conditional

Conditional or hypothetical propositions are those whose parts are united by the conditional particle if; as, if the sun be fixed, the earth must move: if there be no fire, there will be no smoke. The first part of these propositions, or that wherein the condition is contained, is called the antecedent, the other is called the consequent.

Watts's Logick.

ANTECEDENTLY, adv. [from antecedent.] In the state of antecedence, or going before; previously.

We consider him antecedently to his creation, while he yet lay in the barren womb of nothing, and only in the number of possibilities. South.

ANTECESSOR, n. f. [Latin.] One who goes before, or leads another; the principal. Dry.

ANTECHAMBER, n. f. [from ante, before, and chamber.] It is generally written, improperly, antichamber.] The chamber that leads to the chief apartment.

The empress has the antechambers past, And this way moves with a disorder'd haste. Dryden.

His antechamber, and room of audience, are little square chambers wainfocoted. Addison.

ANTECURSOR, n. f. [Latin.] One who runs before. Dry.

To ANTEDATE, v. a. [from ante, and do, datum, Lat.]

1. To date earlier than the real time, so as to confer a fictitious antiquity.

Now thou hast lov'd me one whole day, To-morrow, when thou leav'st, what wilt thou say?

Wilt thou then antedate some new-made vow, Or say, that now

We are not just those persons, which we were? Donne.

By reading, a man does, as it were, antedate his life, and makes himself cotemporary with the ages past. Collier.

2. To take something before the proper time.

Our joys below it can improve, And antedate the bliss above. Pope.

ANTEDILUVIAN, adj. [from ante, before, and diluvium, a deluge.]

1. Existing before the deluge.

During the time of the deluge, all the stone and marble of the antediluvian earth were totally dissolved. Woodward.

2. Relating to things existing before the deluge.

The text intends only the line of Seth, con- duceable unto the genealogy of our Saviour, and the antediluvian chronology. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ANTEDILUVIAN, n. f. One that lived before the flood.

We are so far from repining at God, that he hath not extended the period of our lives to the longevity of the antediluvians, that we give him thanks for contracting the days of our trial. Bentley.

ANTELOPE, n. f. [The etymology is uncertain.] A goat with curled or wreathed horns.

The antelope, and wolf both fierce and fell. Spenser.

ANTEMERIDIAN, adj. [from ante, before, and meridian, noon.] Before noon.

ANTEMETICK, adj. [anti, against, and meteo, to vomit.] That which has the power of calming the stomach; of preventing or stopping vomiting.

ANTEPENDANE, adj. [ante, before, and mundus, the world.] That which was before the creation of the world.

ANTENUMBER, n. f. [from ante and number.] The number that precedes another.

Whatsoever virtue is in numbers, for conduc- ing to consent of notes, is rather to be ascribed to the antenumber, than to the entire number, as that the sound returneth after six, or after twelve; so that the seventh or thirteenth is not the matter, but the sixth or the twelfth. Bacon.

ANTEPAST, n. f. [from ante, before, and pastum, to feed.] A foretaste; something taken before the proper time.

Were we to expect our bliss only in the satiat- ing our appetites, it might be reasonable, by frequent antepasts, to excite our gust for that profuse perpetual meal. Decay of Piety.

ANTEPENULT, n. f. [antepenultima, Lat.] The last syllable but two, as the syllable te in antepenult: a term of grammar.

ANTEPILEPTICK, adj. [anti and epilepsia.] A medicine against convulsions.

That bezoar is antidotal, lapid judicious diuretical, coral antepileptical, we will not deny. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

To ANTEPONE, v. a. [antepone, Lat.] To set one thing before another; to prefer one thing to another. Dry.

ANTEPREDICAMENT, n. f. [antepredicamentum, Lat.] Something to be known in the study of lo- gick, previously to the doctrine of the predica- ment.

ANTERIORITY, n. f. [from anterior.] Priority; the state of being before either in time or situation.

ANTERIOUR, adj. [anterior, Lat.] Going be- fore, either with regard to time or place.

If that be the anterior or upper part wherein the senses are placed, and that the posterior and lower part, which is opposite thereunto, there is no inferior or former part in this animal; for the senses being placed at both extremes, make both ends anterior, which is impossible. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ANTES, n. f. [Latin.] Pillars of large dimen- sions that support the front of a building.

ANTESTOMACH, n. f. [from ante, before, and stomach.] A cavity which leads into the stomach.

In birds there is no mastication or comminution of the meat in the mouth; but it is immediately swallowed into a kind of antestomach, which I have observed in piscivorous birds. Ray.

ANTHELMINTHICK, adj. [anti, against, and helminx, a worm.] That which kills worms.

Arbuthnot, or contrary to worms, are things which are known by experience to kill them, as oils, or honey taken upon an empty sto- mach. Arbuthnot.

ANTHEM, n. f. [anti, a hymn sung in alternate parts, and should therefore be written anthymn.] A holy song; a song performed as part of divine service.

God Moses first, then David did inspire, To compose anthems for his heavenly quire. Denham.

There is no passion that is not finely expressed in those parts of the inspired writings, which are proper for divine songs and anthems. Addison.

ANTICHRISTIANISM, n. f. [from antichristian.] Opposition or contrariety to christianity.

ANTI'CHRONISM, n. f. [anti, against, and chronos, time.] Deviation from the right order or account of time.

To ANTICIPATE, v. a. [anticipo, Lat.]

1. To take something sooner than another, so as to prevent him that comes after; to take first possession.

God hath taken care to anticipate and prevent every man, to draw him early into his church; to give piety the prepossession, and so engage him in holiness. Hammond.

If our apostle had maintained such an anticipat- ing principle engraven upon our souls before all exercise of reason; what did he talk of seeking the Lord, seeing that the knowledge of him was in- nate and perpetual? Bentley.

2. To take up before the time at which any thing might be regularly had.

I find I have anticipated already, and taken up from Boccace, before I come to him; but I am of the temper of kings, who are for present mo- ney, no matter how they pay it. Dryden.

3. To foretaste, to take an impression of some- thing, which is not yet, as if it really was.

The life of the desperate equals the anxiety of death, who but act the life of the damned, and anticipate the desolations of hell. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Why should we anticipate our sorrows? 'tis like those That die for fear of death. Denham.

4. To prevent any thing by crouding in before it; to preclude.

Time, thou *anticipate*st my dread exploits: The flighty purpose never is o'ertook, Unless the deed go with it. Shakespeare.

I am far from pretending to instruct the profession, or anticipating their directions to such as are under their government. Arbutnot.

ANTICIPATION. n. f. [from anticipate.]

1. The act of taking up something before its time.

The golden number gives the new moon four days too late, by reason of the aforesaid anticipation, and our neglect of it. Holder.

It is not enough to be miserable when the time comes, unless we make ourselves so beforehand, and by anticipation. L'Estrange.

2. Foretaste.

If we really live under the hope of future happiness, we shall taste it by way of anticipation and fore thought; an image of it will meet our minds often, and stay there, as all pleasing expectations do. Atterbury.

3. Opinion implanted before the reasons of that opinion can be known.

The east and west, the north and south, have the same anticipation concerning one supreme disposer of things. Stillington.

What nation is there, that, without any teaching, have not a kind of anticipation, or preconceived notion of a Deity? Denham.

ANTICK. adj. [probably from antiquus, ancient, as things out of use appear odd.] Odd; ridiculous; wild; buffoon in gesticulation.

What! dares the slave
Come hither cover'd with an antick face,
And flier and scorn at our solemnity? Shakef. Romeo and Juliet.

Of all our antick sights, and pageantry,
Which English idiots run in crowds to see. Dryden.

The prize was to be conferred upon the whistler, that could go through his tune without laughing, though provoked by the antick postures of a merry Andrew, who was to play tricks. Addison.

ANTICK. n. f.

1. He that plays anticks; he that uses odd gesticulation: a buffoon.

Within the hollow crown,
That rounds the frontal temples of a king,
Keeps death his court; and there the antick sits,
Scoffing his state. Shakef.

If you should smile he grows impatient.—
Fear not, my lord we can contain ourselves,
Were he the veriest antick in the world. Shakef.

2. Odd appearance.

A work of rich entail, and curious mold,
Woven with anticks, and wild imagery. Fairy Queen.

For ev'n at first reflection she espies
Such toys, such anticks, and such vanities,
As she retires and shrinks for shame and fear. Davies.

To ANTICK. v. a. [from antick.] To make antick.

Mine own tongue
Splits what it speaks; the wild disguise hath almost Antick'd us all. Shakespeare.

ANTICKLY. adv. [from antick.] In an antick manner; with odd postures; wild gesticulations, or fanciful appearance.

Scrambling, out-facing, fashion-mongring boys,
That lye, and cog, and flout, deprave, and slander,
Go antickly, and shew an outward hideousness.
And speak of half a dozen dangerous words. Shakespeare.

ANTICLIMAX. n. f. [from ἀντί and κλίμαξ.] A sentence in which the last part expresses something lower than the first.

A certain figure which was unknown to the ancients, is called by some an anticlimax. Addison.
This distich is frequently mentioned as an example:

Next comes Dalhousie the great god of war,
Lieutenant col'nel to the earl of Mar.

ANTICONVULSIVE. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and convulsive.] Good against convulsions.

Whatever produces an inflammatory disposition in the blood, produces the asthma, as anticonvulsive medicines. Floyer.

ANTICOR. n. f. [from ἀντί, against, and cor, the heart.]

A preternatural swelling of a round figure, occasioned by a sanguine and bilious humour, and appearing in a horse's breast, opposite to his heart. An anticor may kill a horse, unless it be brought to a suppuration by good remedies. Farrier's Dict.

ANTICOURTIER. n. f. [from ἀντί, against, and courtier.] One that opposes the court.

ANTIDOTAL. adj. [from antidote.] That which has the quality of an antidote, or the power of counteracting poison.

That bezoar is antidotal, we shall not deny. Brown.

Animals that can innocuously digest these poisons, become antidotal to the poison digested. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ANTIDOTE. n. f. [from ἀντίδοτον, antidotus, Lat. a thing given in opposition to something else.]

A medicine given to expel the mischiefs of another, as of poison. Quincy.

Trust not the physician,

His antidotes are poison, and he slays
More than you rob. Shakespeare.

What fool would believe that antidote delivered by Pierius against the sting of a scorpion? to sit upon an ass, with one's face towards his tail. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Poison will work against the stars: beware;
For every meal an antidote prepare. Dryden.

ANTIDYSENTERICK. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and dysenteria, a bloody flux.] Good against the bloody flux.

ANTIFEBRILE. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and febris, a fever.] Good against fevers.

Antifebrile medicines check the ebullition. Floyer.

ANTILOGARITHM. n. f. [from ἀντί, against, and logarithm.]

The complement of the logarithm of a sine, tangent, or secant; or the difference of that logarithm from the logarithm of ninety degrees. Chambers.

ANTILOGY. n. f. [from ἀντιλογία.] A contradiction between any words and passages in an author. Di.

ANTILOQUIST. n. f. [from ἀντί, against, and loquor, to speak.] A contradictor. Di.

ANTIMONARCHICAL. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and μοναρχία, government by a single person.] Against government by a single person.

When he spied the statue of King Charles in the middle of the crowd, and most of the kings ranged over their heads, he concluded that an antimonarchical assembly could never choose such a place. Addison.

ANTIMONARCHICALNESS. n. f. [from antimonarchical.] The quality of being an enemy to regal power.

ANTIMONIAL. adj. [from antimony.] Made of antimony; having the qualities of antimony; relating to antimony.

They were got out of the reach of antimonial fumes. Grew.

Though antimonial cups prepared with art,
Their force to wine through ages should impart;
This dissipation, this profuse expence,
Nor shrinks their size, nor wastes their stores immense. Blackmore.

ANTIMONY. n. f. [The stibium of the ancients, by the Greeks called στίβιον. The reason of its modern denomination is referred to Basil Valentine, a German monk; who, as the tradition relates, having thrown some of it to the hogs, observed, that, after it had purged them heartily, they immediately fattened; and therefore, he imagined his fellow monks would be the better for the like dose. The experiment, however, succeeded so ill, that they all died of it; and the medicine was thenceforward called antimoine; antimonik.]

Antimony is a mineral substance, of a metalline nature, having all the seeming characters of a real metal, except malleability; and may be called a femimetal, being a fossil gleebe of some undetermined metal, combined with a sulphurous and stony substance. Mines of all metals afford it; that in gold mines is reckoned best. It has also its own mines in Hungary, Germany, and France. Its texture is full of little shining veins or threads, like needles; brittle as glass. Sometimes veins of a red or golden colour are intermixed, which is called male antimony; that without them being denominated female antimony. It fuses in the fire, though with some difficulty; and dissolves more easily in water. It destroys and dissipates all metals fused with it, except gold; and is therefore useful in refining. It is a common ingredient in speculums, or burning concaves; serving to give them a finer polish. It makes a part in bell metal; and renders the found more clear. It is mingled with tin, to make it more hard, white and found; and with lead, in the casting of printers letters, to render them more smooth and firm. It is a general help in the melting of metals, and especially in casting of cannon balls. In pharmacy it is used under various forms, and with various intentions, chiefly as an emetic. Chambers.

ANTINEPHRETICK. adj. [from ἀντί and νεφρῆς.] Medicines good against diseases of the reins and kidneys.

ANTINOMY. n. f. [from ἀντί and νόμος.] A contradiction between two laws, or two articles of the same law.

ANTIPATHETICAL. adj. [from antipathy.] Having a natural contrariety to any thing.

The soil is fat and luxurious, and antipathetical to all venomous creatures. Howel's Vocal Forest.

ANTIPATHETICALNESS. n. f. [from antipathetical.] The quality or state of having a natural contrariety to any thing. Di.

ANTIPATHY. n. f. [from ἀντί, against, and πάθος, feeling; antipathie, Fr.]

1. A natural contrariety to any thing, so as to shun it involuntarily; aversion; dislike. It is opposed to sympathy.

No contraries hold more antipathy,
Than I and such a knave. Shakespeare.

To this perhaps might be justly attributed most of the sympathies and antipathies observable in men. Locke.

2. It has sometimes the particle against before the object of antipathy.

I had a mortal antipathy against standing armies in times of peace; because I took armies to be hired by the master of the family, to keep his children in slavery. Swift.

3. Sometimes to.

Ask you, what provocation I have had?
The strong antipathy of good to bad.

When truth, or virtue, an affront endures,
Th' affront is mine, my friend, and should be yours. Pope.

4. Formerly with; but improperly.

Tangible bodies have an antipathy with air; and any liquid body, that is more dense, they will draw, condense, and, in effect, incorporate. Bacon.

ANTIPERISTASIS. n. f. [from ἀντί and περίστασις, to stand round.] The opposition of a contrary quality, by which the quality it opposes becomes heightened or intended; or the action by which a body attacked by another, collects itself, and becomes stronger by such opposition: or an intention of the activity of one quality caused by the opposition of another. Thus quicklime is set on fire by the affusion of cold water; so water becomes warmer in winter than in summer, and thunder and lightning are excited in the middle region of the air, which is continually cold, and all by antiperistasis. This is an exploded principle in the Peripatetic philosophy.

Th' antiperistasis of age
More inflam'd his am'rous rage. Cowley.

The riotous prodigal detests covetousness; yet let him find the springs grow dry, which feed his luxury.

luxury, covetousness shall be called in; and so, by a strange antiperistasis, prodigality shall beget rapine. Decay of Piety.

ANTIPESTILENTIAL. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and pestilential.] Efficacious against the infection of the plague.

Perfumes correct the air before it is attracted by the lungs; or, rather, antipestilential unguents, to anoint the nostrils with. Harvey on the Plague.

ANTI'PHRASIS. n. f. [from ἀντί against, and phras, a form of speech.] The use of words in a sense opposite to their proper meaning.

You now find no cause to repent, that you never dip your hands in the bloody high courts of justice, so called only by antiphrasis. South.

ANTI'PODAL. adj. [from antipodes.] Relating to the countries inhabited by the antipodes.

The Americans are antipodals unto the Indians. Brown.

ANTIPODES. n. f. It has no singular. [from ἀντί, against, and πῶδες, feet.] Those people who, living on the other side of the globe, have their feet directly opposite to ours.

We should hold day with the antipodes, If you would walk in absence of the sun. Shakespeare.

So shines the sun, tho' hence remov'd as clear, When his beams warm th' antipodes, as here. Waller.

ANTIPOPE. n. f. [from ἀντί, against, and pope.] He that usurps the popedom, in opposition to the right pope.

This house is famous in history, for the retreat of an antipope, who called himself Felix V. Addison.

ANTIPTOSIS. n. f. [from ἀντίπτωσις.] A figure in grammar, by which one case is put for another.

ANTIQUARY. n. f. [from antiquarius, Lat.] A man studious of antiquity; a collector of ancient things.

All arts, rarities, and inventions, are but the relics of an intellect defaced with sin. We admire it now, only as antiquaries do a piece of old coin, for the stamp it once bore. South.

With sharpen'd sight pale antiquaries pore, Th' inscription value, but the rust adore. Pope.

The rude Latin of the monks is still very intelligible; had their records been delivered in the vulgar tongue, they could not now be understood, unless by antiquaries. Swift.

ANTIQUARY. adj. [This word is improper.] Old; antique.

Here's Nestor, Instructed by the antiquary times; He must, he is, he cannot but be wise. Shakespeare.

To ANTIQUATE. v. a. [from antiquo, Lat.] To put out of use; to make obsolete.

The growth of Christianity in this kingdom might reasonably introduce new laws, and antiquate or abrogate some old ones, that seemed less consistent with the Christian doctrines. Hale's Common Law of England.

Milton's Paradise Lost is admirable. But cannot I admire the height of his invention, and the strength of his expression, without defending his antiquated words, and the perpetual harshness of their sound? Dryden.

Almighty Latium, with her cities crown'd, Shall like an antiquated fable sound. Addison.

ANTIQUATEDNESS. n. f. [from antiquated.] The state of being antiquated, worn out of use, or obsolete.

ANTI'QUE. adj. [from antique, Fr. antiquus, Lat.] It was formerly pronounced according to the English analogy, with the accent on the first syllable; but now after the French, with the accent on the last, at least in prose; the poets use it variously.]

1. Ancient; old; not modern.

Now, good Cefario, but that piece of song, That old and antique song we heard last night. Shakespeare.

Such truth in love as th' antique world did know, In such a style as courts might boast of now. Waller.

2. Of genuine antiquity.

The seals which we have remaining of Julius Cæsar, which we know to be antique, have the star of Venus over them. Dryden.

My copper lamps at any rate, For being true antique I bought; Yet wisely melted down my plate, On modern models to be wrought;

And trifles I alike pursue, Because they're old, because they're new. Prior.

3. Of old fashion.

Forth came that ancient lord and aged queen, Array'd in antique robes down to the ground, And sad habiliments right well beseen. Fairy Queen.

Must he no more divert the tedious day? Nor sparkling thoughts in antique words convey? Smith to the Memory of Philips.

4. Odd; wild; antick;

Name not these living death-heads unto me; For these not ancient but antique be. Donne,

And sooner may a gulling weather-spy By drawing forth heaven's scheme, tell certainly What fashion'd hats or ruffs, or suits next year, Our giddy-headed antique youth will wear. Donne.

ANTI'QUE. n. f. [from antique, adj.] An antiquity; a remain of ancient times; an ancient rarity.

I leave to Edward, now earl of Oxford, my seal of Julius Cæsar; as also another seal, supposed to be a young Hercules; both very choice antiques, and set in gold. Swift.

ANTI'QUENESS. n. f. [from antique.] The quality of being antique; an appearance of antiquity.

We may discover something venerable in the antiqueness of the work; but we would see the design enlarged. Addison.

ANTI'QUITY. n. f. [from antiquitas, Lat.] 1. Old times; time past long ago.

I mention Aristotle, Polybius, and Cicero, the greatest philosopher, the most impartial historian, and the most consummate statesman of all antiquity. Addison.

2. The people of old times; the ancients.

That such pillars were raised by Seth, all antiquity has avowed. Raleigh.

3. The works or remains of old times.

As for the observation of Machiavel, traducing Gregory the Great, that he did what in him lay, to extinguish all heathen antiquities: I do not find that those zeals last long; as it appeared in the succession of Sabinian, who did revive the former antiquities. Bacon.

4. Old age; a ludicrous sense.

Is not your voice broken? your wind short? your chin double? your wit single? and every part about you blasted with antiquity? and will you yet call yourself young? Shakespeare.

5. Ancientness; as, this ring is valuable for its antiquity.

ANTI'SCII. n. f. It has no singular. [from ἀντί, against, and σκία, shadow.] In geography, the people who inhabit on different sides of the equator, who, consequently, at noon have their shadows projected opposite ways. Thus the people of the north are Antiscii to those of the south; the one projecting their shadows at noon toward the north pole, and the other toward the south pole. Chambers.

ANTISCORBU'TICAL. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and scorbutum, the scurvy.] Good against the scurvy.

The warm antiscorbutical plants, in quantities, will occasion stinking breath, and corrupt the blood. Arbutnot.

ANTISCORBU'TICK. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and scorbutum, the scurvy.] Good against the scurvy.

The warm antiscorbuticks, animal diet, and animal salts, are proper. Arbutnot.

ANTI'SPASIS. n. f. [from ἀντί, against, and σπασμ, to draw.] The revulsion of any humour into another part.

ANTISPASMO'DICK. adj. [from ἀντί, against, and σπασμ, the cramp.] That which has the power of relieving the cramp.

Antisplenetics open the obstructions of the spleen. Floyer.

ANTI'STROPHE. n. f. [from ἀντίστροφ, from ἀντί, the contrary way, and στροφή, turning.] In an ode supposed to be sung in parts, the second stanza of every three, or sometimes every second stanza; so called because the dance turns about.

ANTISTRUMA'TICK. adj. [from ἀντί and struma, a scrophulous swelling.] Good against the king's evil.

I prescribed him a distilled milk, with antistrumatics, and purged him. Wiseman.

ANTI'THESIS. n. f. in the plural antitheses. [from ἀντίθεσις, placing in opposition.] Opposition of words or sentiments; contrast; as in these lines:

Though gentle, yet not dull, Strong without rage, without overflow, full. Denham.

I see a chief, who leads my chosen sons, All arm'd with points, antitheses, and puns. Pope.

ANTI'TYPE. n. f. [from ἀντίτυπος.] That which is resembled or shadowed out by the type; that of which the type is the representation. It is a term of theology. See TYPE.

When once upon the wing, he soars to an higher pitch, from the type to the antitype, to the days of the Messiah, the ascension of our Saviour, and, at length, to his kingdom and dominion over all the earth. Burnet's Theory.

He brought forth bread and wine, and was the priest of the most high God; imitating the antitype, or the substance, Christ himself. Taylor.

ANTI'TYPICAL. adj. [from antitype.] That which relates to an antitype; that which explains the type.

ANTIVENE'REAL. adj. [from ἀντί and venereal.] Good against the venereal disease.

If the lues be joined with it, you will scarce cure your patient without exhibiting antivenereal remedies. Wiseman.

ANTLER. n. f. [from andouillier, Fr.] Properly the first branches of a stag's horns; but, popularly, and generally, any of his branches.

Grown old, they grow less branched, and first lose their brow antlers, or lowest furcations next to the head. Brown.

A well grown stag, whose antlers rise High o'er his front, his beams invade the skies. Dryden.

Bright Diana Brought hunted wild goats heads, and branching antlers

Of stags, the fruit and honour of her toil. Prior.

ANTO'ECI. n. f. It has no singular. [Lat. from ἀντί and οἰκία, to inhabit.] In geography, those inhabitants of the earth, who live under the same meridian, and at the same distance from the equator; the one toward the north, and the other to the south. Hence they have the same longitude, and their latitude is also the same, but of a different denomination. They are in the same semicircle of the meridian, but opposite parallels. They have precisely the same hours of the day and night, but opposite seasons; and the night of the one is always equal to the day of the other. Chambers.

ANTONOMASIA. n. f. [from ἀντί and νόμας, a name.] A form of speech, in which, for a proper name, is put the name of some dignity, office, profession, science, or trade; or when a proper name is put in the room of an appellative. Thus a king is called his majesty; a nobleman, his lordship. We say the philosopher instead of Aristotle, and the orator for Cicero; thus a man is called by the name of his country, a German, an Italian; and a grave man is called a Cato, and a wife man a Solomon. Smith's Rhetoric.

ANTRE. [from αντρε, Fr. antrum, Lat.] A cavern; a cave; a den: not in use.

With all my travels history: Wherein of antres vast, and deserts idle, It was my bent to speak. Shakespeare.

ANVIL. n. f. [from anvil, Sax.]

1. The

3. The iron block on which the smith lays his metal to be forged.

I saw a smith stand with his hammer, thus,
The whilst his iron did on the anvil cool. Shaksp.
On their eternal anvils here he found
The brethren beating, and the blows go round. Dryden.

2. Any thing on which blows are laid.
Here I clip
The anvil of my sword, and do contest
Hotly and nobly. Shaksp.

3. Figuratively; to be upon the anvil, is to be in a state of formation or preparation.
Several members of our house knowing what was upon the anvil, went to the clergy, and desired their judgment. Swift.

ANXIETY. n. f. [anxietas, Lat.]
1. Trouble of mind about some future event; suspense with uneasiness; perplexity; solicitude.

To be happy, is not only to be freed from the pains and diseases of the body, but from anxiety and vexation of spirit; not only to enjoy the pleasures of sense, but peace of conscience and tranquillity of mind. Tillotson.

2. In the medical language, lowness of spirits, with uneasiness of the stomach.

In anxieties which attend fevers, when the cold fit is over, a warmer regimen may be allowed; and because anxieties often happen by spasms from wind, spices are useful. Arbutnot.

ANXIOUS. adj. [anxius, Lat.]

1. Disturbed about some uncertain event; solicitous; being in painful suspense; painfully uncertain.

His pensive cheek upon his hand reclin'd
And anxious thoughts revolving in his mind. Dryden.

With beating hearts the dire event they wait,
Anxious, and trembling for the birth of fate. Pope.
2. Careful; full of inquietude; unquiet.

In youth alone, unhappy mortals live;
But ah! the mighty bliss is fugitive;
Discolour'd sickness, anxious labour come,
And age, and death's inexorable doom. Dryden.

3. Careful, as of a thing of great importance.
No writings we need to be solicitous about the meaning of, but those that contain truths we are to believe, or laws we are to obey; we may be less anxious about the sense of other authors. Locke.

4. It has generally for or about before the object, but sometimes of; less properly.
Anxious of neglect, suspecting change. Granville.

ANXIOUSLY. adv. [from anxious.] In an anxious manner; solicitously; unquietly; carefully; with painful uncertainty.

But where the loss is temporal, every probability of it needs not put us so anxiously to prevent it, since it might be repaired again. South.

Thou what befits the new lord mayor,
And what the Gallick arms will do,
Art anxiously inquisitive to know. Dryden.

ANXIOUSNESS. n. f. [from anxious.] The quality of being anxious; susceptibility of anxiety.

ANX. adj. [ang, eng, Sax.]
1. Every; whoever he be; whatever it be. It is, in all its senses, applied indifferently to persons or things.

I know you are now, Sir, a gentleman born—
Ay and have been so any time these four hours. Shaksp.

You contented yourself with being capable, as much as any whosoever, of defending your country with your sword. Dryden.

How fit is this retreat for uninterrupted study?
Any one that sees it will own, I could not have chosen a more likely place to converse with the dead in. Pope.

2. Whosoever; whatsoever; as distinguished from some other.

What warmth is there in your affection towards any of these princely suitors that are already come? Shaksp.

An inverted motion being begun any where below, continues itself all the whole length. Locke.

3. It is used in opposition to none.

I wound and I heal; neither is there any that can deliver out of my hand. Deut. xxxii. 39.

APART. n. f. [apart, Fr.] The great artery which rises immediately out of the left ventricle of the heart. Quincy.

APACE. adv. [from a and pace; that is, with a great pace.]

1. Quick; speedily; used of things in motion.
Or when the flying libbard she did chace,
She could them nimble move, and after fly apace. Spenser.

Ay, quoth my uncle Gloucester,
Small herbs have grace, great weeds do grow apace.

And since methinks, I would not grow so fast,
Because sweet flow'rs are slow, and weeds make haste. Shaksp.

He promis'd in his east a glorious race;
Now sunk from his meridian, sets apace. Dryd.

Is not he imprudent, who, seeing the tide making haste towards him apace, will sleep till the sea overwhelm him? Tillotson.

2. With haste; applied to some action.
The baron now his diamonds pours apace;
Th' embroider'd king, who shows but half his face,

And his refulgent queen. Pope's Rape of the Lock.

3. Hastily; with speed; spoken of any kind of progression from one state to another.
This second course of men,
With some regard to what is just and right,
Shall lead their lives, and multiply apace. Milton.

The life and power of religion decays apace here and at home, while we are spreading the honour of our arms far and wide through foreign nations. Atterbury.

If sensible pleasure, or real grandeur, be our end, we shall proceed apace to real misery. Watts.

APAGOGICAL. adj. [from ἀπαγωγή; compounded of ἀπ, from, and αγωγή, to bring or draw.]

An apagogical demonstration is such as does not prove the thing directly; but shews the impossibility, or absurdity, which arises from denying it; and is also called reductio ad impossibile, or ad absurdum. Chambers.

APART. adv. [apart, Fr.]
1. Separately from the rest in place.
Since I enter into that question, it behoveth me to give reason for my opinion, with circumspection; because I walk aside, and in a way apart, from the multitude. Raleigh.

The party discerned, that the earl of Essex would never serve their turn; they resolved to have another army apart, that should be at their devotion. Clarendon.

2. In a state of distinction; as, to set apart for any use.
He is so very figurative, that he requires a grammar apart, to construe him. Dryden.

The tyrant shall demand yon sacred load,
And gold and vessels set apart for God. Prior.

3. Distinctly.
Moses first nameth heaven and earth, putting waters but in the third place, as comprehending waters in the word earth; but afterwards he nameth them apart. Raleigh.

4. At a distance; retired from the other company.
So please you, madam,
To put apart these your attendants. Shaksp.

APARTMENT. n. f. [apartment, Fr.] A part of the house allotted to the use of any particular person; a room; a set of rooms.

A private gallery 'twixt th' apartments led,
Not to the foe yet known. Sir J. Denham.

He pale as death, despoil'd of his array,
Into the queen's apartment takes his way. Dryden.

The most considerable ruin is that on the eastern promontory, where are still some apartments left, very high, and arched at top. Addison.

APATHY. n. f. [a, not, and πάθος, feeling.] the quality of not feeling; exemption from passion; freedom from mental perturbation.

Of good and evil much they argued then,
Passion and apathy, and glory, and shame. Milton.

To remain insensible of such provocations, is not constancy, but apathy. South.

In lazy apathy let stoics boast
Their virtue fix'd; 'tis fixed as in frost,
Contracted all, retiring to the breast;
But strength of mind is exercise, not rest. Pope.

APE. n. f. [ape, Icelandic.]

1. A kind of monkey remarkable for imitating what he sees.

I will be more newfangled than an ape, more giddy in my desires than a monkey. Shaksp.

Writers report, that the heart of an ape worn near the heart, comforteth the heart, and increaseth audacity. It is true, that the ape is a merry and bold beast. Bacon.

With glittering gold and sparkling gems they shine,
But apes and monkeys are the gods within. Granville.

Celestial beings, when of late they saw
A mortal man unfold all Nature's law,
Admir'd such knowledge in a human shape,
And shew'd a Newton, as we show an ape. Pope.

2. An imitator; used generally in the bad sense.

Julio Romano, who, had he himself eternity, and could put breath into his work, would beguile Nature of her custom: so perfectly he is her ape. Shaksp.

To APE. v. n. [from ape.] To imitate, as an ape imitates human actions.

Aping the foreigners in every dress,
Which, bought at greater cost, becomes him less. Dryden.

Curse on the stripling! how he apes his fire!
Ambitiously sententious. Addison.

APPEAR, or APPEAR. adv. [probably from a pique.] In a posture to pierce the ground.

APERIENT. adj. [aperio, Lat. to open.] That which has the quality of opening; chiefly used of medicines gently purgative.

There be bracelets fit to comfort the spirits; and they be of three intentions; refrigerant, corroborant, and aperient. Bacon.

Of the stems of plants, some contain a fine aperient salt, and are diuretick and saponaceous. Arbutnot.

APERITIVE. adj. [from aperio, Lat. to open.] That which has the quality of opening the excrementitious passages of the body.

They may make broth, with the addition of aperitive herbs. Harvey.

APERT. adj. [apertus, Lat.] Open.

APERION. n. f. [from apertus, Lat.]
1. An opening; a passage through any thing; a gap.

The next now in order are the aperions; under which term I do comprehend doors, windows, stair-cases, chimneys, or other conduits: in short, all inlets or outlets. Wotton.

2. The act of opening; or state of being opened.

The plenitude of vessels, otherwise called the plethora, when it happens, causes an extravasation of blood, either by ruption or aperion of them. Wyseman.

APERTLY. adv. [apertè, Lat.] Openly; without covert.

APERTNESS. n. f. [from apert.] Openness.

The freedom, or apertness and vigour of pronouncing, and the closeness of muffling, and laziness of speaking, render the sound different. Holbro.

APERTURE. n. f. [from apertus, open.]
1. The act of opening.
Hence ariseth the facility of joining a consonant to a vowel, because from an appulse to an aperture is easier than from one appulse to another. Holbro.

2. An open place.

If memory be made by the easy motion of the spirits through the opened passages, images, without doubt, pass through the same apertures.

Glanville.

3. The hole next the object glass of a telescope or microscope.

The concave metal bore an aperture of an inch; but the aperture was limited by an opaque circle, perforated in the middle.

Newton's Opticks.

4. Enlargement; explanation; a sense seldom found.

It is too much untwisted by the doctors, and, like philosophy, made intricate by explications, and difficult by the aperture and dissolution of distinctions.

Taylor.

APETALOUS. adj. [of a priv. ἀπετῶλος, a leaf.] Without petal or flower leaves.

APETALOUSNESS. n. f. [from apetalous.] Being without leaves.

Quincy.

APHORISM. n. f. [ἀφορισμός.] A maxim; a precept contracted in a short sentence; an unconnected position.

He will easily discern how little of truth there is in the multitude; and though sometimes they are flattered with that aphorism, will hardly believe the voice of the people to be the voice of God.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

I shall at present consider the aphorism, that a man of religion and virtue is a more useful, and consequently a more valuable member of a community.

Rogers.

APHORISTICAL. adj. [from aphorism.] In the form of an aphorism; in separate and unconnected sentences.

APHORISTICALLY. adv. [from aphoristical.] In the form of an aphorism.

These being carried down, seldom miss a cure, as Hippocrates doth likewise aphoristically tell us.

Harvey.

APHRODISIACAL. adj. [from ἀφροδίτη, Venus.]

APHRODISIACK. f. Relating to the venereal disease.

APIARY. n. f. [from apis, Lat. a bee.] The place where bees are kept.

Those who are skilled in bees, when they see a foreign swarm approaching to plunder their hives, have a trick to divert them into some neighbouring apiary, there to make what havoc they please.

Swift.

APICES of a flower. [Lat. from apex, the top.] Little knobs that grow on the tops of the stamina, in the middle of a flower. They are commonly of a dark purplish colour. By the microscope they have been discovered to be a sort of capsule seminales, or seed vessels, containing in the small globular, and often oval particles, of various colours, and exquisitely formed.

Quincy.

APIECE. adv. [from a for each, and piece, or share.] To the part or share of each.

Men, in whose mouths at first founded nothing but mortification, were come to think they might lawfully have six or seven wives apiece.

Hooker.

I have to-night dispatched sixteen business, a month's length apiece, by an abstract of success.

Shakespeare.

One copy of this paper may serve a dozen of you, which will be less than a farthing apiece.

Swift.

APISH. adj. [from ape.]

1. Having the qualities of an ape; imitative.

Report of fashions in proud Italy,

Whose manners still our tardy apish nation

Limps after, in base awkward imitation.

Shakespeare.

2. Foppish; affected.

Because I cannot flatter, and look fair,

Duck with French nods, and apish courtesy,

I must be held a rancorous enemy.

Shakespeare.

3. Silly; trifling; insignificant.

All this is but apish sophistry; and to give it a name divine and excellent, is abusive and unjust.

Glanville.

4. Wanton; playful.

Gloomy sits the queen;

Till happy chance reverts the cruel scene;

And apish folly, with her wild resort

Of wit and jest, disturbs the solemn court.

Prior.

APISHLY. adv. [from apish.] In an apish manner; foppishly; conceitedly.

APISHNESS. n. f. [from apish.] Mimicry;

foppery; insignificance; playfulness.

APITPAT. adv. [a word formed from the motion.] With quick palpitation.

O there he comes—Welcome my bully, my back: agad, my heart has gone apitpat for you.

Congreve.

APLUSTRE. n. f. [Latin.] The ancient engine carried in sea vessels.

The one holds a sword in her hand, to represent the Iliad, as the other has an aplustre, to represent the Odyssey, or voyage of Ulysses.

Addison.

APOCALYPSE. n. f. [from ἀποκαλύπτω.] Revelation; discovery: a word used only of the sacred writings.

O for that warning voice, which he who saw

The apocalypse heard cry in heav'n aloud.

Milton.

With this throne, of the glory of the Father, compare the throne of the Son of God, as seen in the apocalypsis.

Burnet's Theory of the Earth.

APOCALYPTICAL. adj. [from apocalypsis.] Concerning revelation; containing revelation.

If we could understand that scene, at the opening of this apocalypitical theatre, we should find it a representation of the majesty of our Saviour.

Burnet's Theory of the Earth.

APOCALYPTICALLY. adv. [from apocalypitical.] In such a manner as to reveal something secret.

APOCOPE. n. f. [ἀποκοπή.] A figure in grammar, when the last letter or syllable of a word is taken away; as, ingeni, for ingenii; apoplex, for apoplexy.

APOCRUSTICK. adj. [ἀποκρυστικα, from ἀποκρυσσιναι, to drive.] Remedies endued with a repelling and astringent power, by which they prevent the too great afflux of humours.

Chambers.

APOCRYPHA. n. f. [from ἀποκρυφω, to put out of sight.] Books not publicly communicated; books whose authors are not known. It is used for the books appended to the sacred writings, which, being of doubtful authors, are less regarded.

We hold not the apocrypha for sacred, as we do the holy scripture, but for human compositions.

Hooker.

APOCRYPHAL. adj. [from apocrypha.]

1. Not canonical; of uncertain authority.

Jerom, who faith, that all writings not canonical are apocryphal, uses not the title apocryphal, as the rest of the fathers ordinarily have done, whose custom is so to name, for the most part, only such as might not publicly be read or divulged.

Hooker.

2. Contained in the apocrypha.

To speak of her in the words of the apocryphal writers, wisdom is glorious, and never fadeeth away.

Addison.

3. It is sometimes used for an account of uncertain credit.

APOCRYPHALLY. adv. [from apocryphal.] Uncertainly; not indisputably.

APOCRYPHALNESS. n. f. [from apocryphal.] Uncertainty; doubtfulness of credit.

APODICTICAL. adj. [from ἀποδεδειγμένος, evident truth; demonstration.] Demonstrative; evident beyond contradiction.

Holding an apodictical knowledge, and an assured knowledge of it; verily, to persuade their apprehensions otherwise, were to make Euclid believe, that there were more than one center in a circle.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

We can say all at the number three; therefore the world is perfect. Tobit went, and his dog followed him; therefore there is a world in the moon, were an argument as apodictical.

Glanville.

APODIXIS. n. f. [ἀποδείξις.] Demonstration. Dict.

APOGEON. n. f. [from ἀπὸ, from, and γῆ, the earth.] A point in the APOGEUM. n. f. [from ἀπὸ, from, and γῆ, the earth.] A point in the heavens, in which the sun, or a planet, is at the greatest distance possible from the earth in its whole revolution. The ancient astronomers regarding the earth as the centre of the system, chiefly regarded the apogæon and perigæon, which the moderns, making the sun the centre, change for the aphelion, and perihelion.

Chambers.

Thy sin is in his apogæon placed, And when it moveth next, must needs descend.

Fairfax.

It is yet not agreed in what time, precisely, the apogæum absolveth one degree.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

APOLOGETICAL. adj. [from ἀπολογία, to defend.] Apologetic. f. fend.] That which is said in defence of any thing or person.

I design to publish an essay, the greater part of which is apologetical, for one sort of chymists.

Boyle.

APOLOGETICALLY. adv. [from apologetical.] In the way of defence or excuse.

APOLOGIST. n. f. [from To apologize.] He that makes an apology; a pleader in favour of another.

To APOLOGIZE. v. a. [from apology.]

1. To plead in favour of any person or thing.

It will be much more seasonable to reform than apologize or rhetoricate; and therefore it imports those, who dwell secure, to look about them.

Decay of Piety.

2. It has the particle for before the subject of apology.

I ought to apologize for my indiscretion in the whole undertaking.

Wake's Preparation for Death.

The translator needs not apologize for his choice of this piece, which was made in his childhood.

Pope's Preface to Statius.

APOLOGUE. n. f. [ἀπολογία.] Fable; story contrived to teach some moral truth.

An apologue of Æsop is beyond a syllogism, and proverbs more powerful than demonstration.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Some men are remark'd for pleasantness in raillery; others for apologues and apposite diverting stories.

Locke.

APOLOGY. n. f. [ἀπολογία, Lat. apologia.]

1. Defence; excuse. Apology generally signifies rather excuse than vindication, and tends rather to extenuate the fault, than prove innocence.

This is, however, sometimes unregarded by writers.

In her face excuse

Came prologue; and apology too prompt; Which with bland words at will she thus address'd.

Milton.

2. It has for before the object of excuse.

It is not my intention to make an apology for my poem: some will think it needs no excuse, and others will receive none.

Ogden.

I shall neither trouble the reader, nor myself, with any apology for publishing of these sermons; for if they be, in any measure, truly serviceable to the end for which they are designed, I do not sc.

see what apology is necessary; and if they be not so, I am sure none can be sufficient. Tillotson.

APOMECOMETRY. n. f. [ἀπόμωσις, from, μέτρον, distance, and μέτρον, to measure.] The art of measuring things at a distance. DiB.

APONEUROSIS. n. f. [ἀπόνευσις, from, and νῆρον, a nerve.] An expansion of a nerve into a membrane.

When a cyst rises near the orifice of the artery, it is formed by the aponeurosis that runs over the vessel, which becomes excessively expanded.

APOPHASMIS. n. f. [ἀποφασίς, a denying.] A figure in rhetoric, by which the orator, speaking ironically, seems to wave what he would plainly insinuate; as, Neither will I mention those things, which if I should, you notwithstanding could neither confute or speak against them. Smith's Rhetorick.

APOPHLEGMATICK. n. f. [ἀπόφλεγμα, and φλέγμα.] That which has the quality of drawing away phlegm.

APOPHLEGMATISM. n. f. [ἀπόφλεγμα, and φλέγμα.] A medicine of which the intention is to draw phlegm from the blood.

And so it is in apophlegmatism and gargarisms, that draw the rheum down by the palate. Bacon.

APOPHLEGMATIZANT. n. f. [ἀπόφλεγμα, and φλέγμα.] Any remedy which causes an evacuation of ferous or mucous humour by the nostrils, as particular kinds of sternutatories. Quincy.

APOPHTHEGM. n. f. [ἀποφθῆγμα.] A remarkable saying; a valuable maxim uttered on some sudden occasion.

We may magnify the apophthegms, or reputed replies of wisdom, whereof many are to be seen in Laertius and Lycophanes. Brown's Vul. Errors.

I had a mind to collect and digest such observations and apophthegms, as tend to the proof of that great assertion, All is vanity. Prior.

APOPHYGE. n. f. [ἀποφυγή, flight, or escape.] Is, in architecture, that part of a column, where it begins to spring out of its base; and was originally no more than the ring or ferrel, which anciently bound the extremities of wooden pillars, to keep them from splitting, and were afterwards imitated in stone work. We sometimes call it the spring of the column. Chambers.

APOPHYTIS. n. f. [ἀποφυτῖς.] The prominent parts of some bones; the same as process. It differs from an epiphytis, as it is a continuance of the bone itself; whereas the latter is somewhat adhering to a bone, and of which it is not properly a part. Quincy.

It is the apophytis, or head of the os tibiz, which makes the knee. Wise's Surgery.

APOPLETICAL. adj. [from apoplexy.] Relating to an apoplexy.

We meet with the same complaints of gravity in living bodies, when the faculty locomotive seems abolished; as may be observed in supporting persons inebriated, apopletical, or in lymphimies and swoonings. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

In an apopletical case, he found extravasated blood, making way from the ventricles of the brain. Derham.

APOPLETICK. adj. [from apoplexy.] Relating to an apoplexy.

A lady was seized with an apopletick fit, which afterward terminated in some kind of lethargy. Wise's Surgery.

APOPLEX. n. f. [See APOPLEXY.] Apoplexy. The last syllable is cut away, but this is only in poetry.

Present punishment pursues his maw,
When forfeited and swell'd, the peacock raw,
He bears into the bath; whence want of breath,
Repletions, apoplex, intestine death. Dryden.

APOPLEXED. adj. [from apoplex.] Seized with an apoplexy.

Sense, sure, you have,
Else could you not have motion: but sure that sense

Is apoplex'd. Shakespeare.

APOPLEXY. n. f. [ἀποπληξίς.] A sudden deprivation of all the internal and external sensation, and of all motion, unless of the heart and thorax. The cause is generally a repletion, and indicates evacuation, joined with stimuli. Quincy.

Apoplexy is a sudden abolition of all the senses, external and internal, and of all voluntary motion, by the stoppage of the flux and reflux of the animal spirits through the nerves destined for those motions. Arbutnot on Diet.

Peace is a very apoplexy, lethargy, muddled, deaf, sleepy, insensible. Shakespeare's Coriolanus.

A fever may take away my reason, or memory, and an apoplexy leave neither sense nor understanding. Locke.

APORLA. n. f. [ἀπορία.] Is a figure in rhetoric, by which the speaker shews, that he doubts where to begin for the multitude of matter, or what to say in some strange and ambiguous thing; and doth, as it were, argue the case with himself. Thus Cicero says, Whether he took them from his fellows more impudently, gave them to a harlot more lasciviously, removed them from the Roman people more wickedly, or altered them more presumptuously, I cannot well declare. Smith's Rhetorick.

APORRHŒA. n. f. [ἀπορροή.] Effluvium; emanation; something emitted by another: not in use.

The reason of this he endeavours to make out by atomical aporrhæas, which passing from the cruentate weapon to the wound, and being incorporated with the particles of the salve, carry them to the affected part. Glanville's Scepsis.

APOSIOPE'SIS. n. f. [ἀποσιώπησις, from ἀσώ, after, and σιώπησις, to be silent.] A form of speech, by which the speaker, through some affection, as sorrow, bashfulness, fear, anger, or vehemency, breaks off his speech before it be all ended. A figure, when, speaking of a thing, we yet seem to conceal it, though indeed we aggravate it; or when the course of the sentence begun is so stayed, as thereby some part of the sentence not being uttered, may be understood. Smith's Rhetorick.

APOSTASY. n. f. [ἀποστασία.] Departure from what a man has professed: it is generally applied to religion; sometimes with the particle from.

The canon law defines apostasy to be a wilful departure from their state of faith, which any person has professed himself to hold in the Christian church. Ayliffe's Parergon.

The affable archangel had forewarn'd
Adam, by due example, to beware

Apoflasy, by what befel in heav'n
To those apostates. Milton.

Vice in us were not only wickedness, but apoflasy, degenerate wickedness. Sprat.

Whoever do give different worships, must bring in more gods; which is an apoflasy from one God. Stillingfleet.

APOSTATE. n. f. [ἀποστάτης, Lat. apostata.] One that has forsaken his profession; generally applied to one that has left his religion.

The angels, for disobedience, thou hast reserved to a miserable immortality; but unto man, equally rebellious, equally apostate from thee and goodness, thou hast given a Saviour. Rogers's Sermons.

Apoflates in point of faith, are, according to the civil law, subject unto all punishments ordained against hereticks. Ayliffe.

APOSTATICAL. adj. [from apostate.] After the manner of an apostate.

To wear turbants is an apostatistical conformity. Sandys.

TO APOSTATIZE. v. n. [from apostate.] To forsake one's profession; it is commonly used of one who departs from his religion.

None revolt from the faith; because they must not look upon a woman to lust after her, but because they are restrained from the perpetration of their lusts. If wanton glances, and libidinous thoughts, had been permitted by the gospel, they would have apostatized nevertheless. Bentley.

TO APOSTEMATE. v. n. [from aposteme.] To become an aposteme; to swell and corrupt into matter.

There is care to be taken in abscesses of the breast and belly, in danger of breaking inwards; yet, by opening these too soon, they sometimes apostemate again, and become crude. Wise's Surgery.

APOSTEMAT'ION. n. f. [from apostemate.] The formation of an aposteme; the gathering of a hollow purulent tumour.

Nothing can be more admirable than the many ways nature hath provided for preventing, or curing of fevers; as, vomitings, apostematations, salivations, &c. Grew.

APOSTEME. n. f. [ἀποστήμα.] A hollow swelling filled with a purulent matter; an abscess.

With equal propriety we may affirm, that ulcers of the lungs, or apostemes of the brain, do happen only in the left side. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

The opening of apostemes, before the suppuration be perfected, weakeneth the heat, and renders them crude. Wise's Surgery.

APOSTLE. n. f. [apostolus, Lat. ἀπόστολος.] A person sent with mandates by another. It is particularly applied to them whom our Saviour deputed to preach the gospel.

But all his mind is bent to holiness;
His champions are the prophets and apostles.

I am far from pretending infallibility; that would be to erect myself into an apostle: a presumption in any one that cannot confirm what he says by miracles. Locke.

We know but a small part of the notion of an apostle, by knowing barely that he is sent forth: Watts's Logic.

APOSTLES'HIP. n. f. [from apostle.] The office or dignity of an apostle.

Where, because faith is in too low degree,
I thought it some apostles'hip in me
To speak things, which by faith alone I see. Dante.

God hath ordered it, that St. Paul hath writ epistles; which are all confined within the business of his apostles'hip; and to contain nothing but points of Christian instruction. Locke.

APOSTOLICAL. adj. [from apostolick.] Delivered or taught by the apostles; belonging to the apostles.

They acknowledge not, that the church keeps any thing as apostolical, which is not found in the apostles writings, in what other records soever it be found. Hooker.

Declare yourself for that church which is founded upon scripture, reason, apostolical practice, and antiquity. Hooker.

APOSTOLICALLY. adv. [from apostolical.] In the manner of the apostles.

APOSTOLICALNESS. n. f. [from apostolical.] The quality of relating to the apostles; apostolical authority.

APOSTOLICK. adj. [from apostle.] The accent is placed by Dryden on the antepenult.] Taught by the apostles; belonging to an apostle.

Their oppositions in maintenance of publick superstition against apostolick endeavours, were vain and frivolous. Hooker.

Or where did I at sure tradition strike,
Provided still it were apostolick? Dryden.

APOSTROPHE. n. f. [ἀποστροφή, from ἀπό, from, and στροφή, to turn.]

1. In rhetoric, a diversion of speech to another person than the speech appointed did intend or require; or, it is a turning of the speech from one person to another, many times abruptly. A figure when we break off the course of our speech, and speak to some new person, present or absent, as to the people or witnesses, when it was before directed to the judges, or opponent. Smith's Rhetorick.

2. In grammar, the contraction of a word by the use of a comma; as, tho', for though; rep', for reputation.

Many laudable attempts have been made, by abbreviating words with apostrophes; and by lopping polysyllables, leaving one or two words at most. Swift.

TO APOSTROPHIZE. v. n. [from apostrophe.] To address by an apostrophe.

There

There is a peculiarity in Homer's manner of apophorizing Eumæus; and speaking of him in the second person, it is generally applied only to men of account. Pope.

APOSTUME. n. f. See APOSTEME. [This word is properly apostem.] A hollow tumour filled with purulent matter.

How an apostume in the mesentery breaking, causes a consumption in the parts, is apparent. Harvey.

TO APOSTUME. v. n. [from apostume.] To apostumate. Diff.

APOTHECARY. n. f. [apotheca, Lat. a repository.] A man whose employment is to keep medicines for sale.

Give me an ounce of civet, good apothecary, to sweeten my imagination. Shakspeare. King Lear.

They have no other doctor but the sun and the fresh air, and that such an one, as never sends them to the apothecary. South.

Wandering in the dark,
Physicians, for the tree, have found the bark;
They, lab'ring for relief of human kind,
With sharpen'd sight some remedies may find;
Th' apothecary-train is wholly blind. Dryden.

APOTHEGM. n. f. [properly apophthegm; which see.] A remarkable saying.

By frequent conversing with him, and scattering short apothegms, and little pleasant stories, and making useful applications of them, his son was, in his infancy, taught to abhor vanity and vice as monsters. Walton's Life of Sanderson.

APOTHEOSIS. n. f. [ἀποθεωσις.] Deifications; the rite of adding any one to the number of gods.

As if it could be graven and painted omnipotent, or the nails and the hammer could give it an apothēsis. South.

Allots the prince of his celestial line,
An apothēsis, and rites divine. Garth.

APOTOME. n. f. [ἀποτομή, to cut off.]

1. In mathematics, the remainder or difference of two incommensurable quantities.

2. In music, it is the part remaining of an entire tone, after a greater semitone has been taken from it. The proportion in numbers of the apotome, is that of 2048 to 2187. The Greeks thought that the greater tone could not be divided into two equal parts; for which reason they called the first part σύντριψις, and the other λειτουργία. Chambers.

APPOZEM. n. f. [ἀποζέω, from, and ζέω, to boil.] A decoction; an infusion made by boiling ingredients.

During this evacuation, he took opening broths and apozems. Wise's Surgery.

Squirts read Garth 'till apozems grow cold. Gay.

TO APPAL. v. a. [appallir, Fr. It might more properly have been written appol.] To fright; to strike with sudden fear; to depress; to discourage.

Whilst the spake, her great words did appal
My feeble courage, and my heart opprest,
That yet I quake and tremble over all. F. Queen.
Give with thy trumpet a loud note to Troy,
Thou dreadful Ajax; that th' appall'd air
May pierce the head of thy great combatant. Shakspeare.

The house of peers was somewhat appall'd at this alarm; but took time to consider of it till next day. Clarendon.

Does neither rage inflame, nor fear appal,
Nor the black fear of death that saddens all? Pope.

The monster curls
His flaming crest, all other thirst appall'd,
Or shiv'ring flies, or choak'd at distance stands. Thomson.

APPALLEMENT. n. f. [from appal.] Depression; discouragement; impression of fear.

As the furious slaughter of them was a great discouragement and appallement to the rest. Bacon's Henry VII.

APPANAGE. n. f. [appanagium, low Latin; probably from panis, bread.] Lands set apart by princes for the maintenance of their younger children.

He became suitor for the earldom of Chester, a kind of appanage to Wales, and using to go to the king's son. Bacon.

Had he thought it fit,
That wealth should be the appanage of wit,
The God of light could ne'er have been so blind,
To deal it to the worst of human kind. Swift.

APPARATUS. n. f. [Latin.] Things provided as means to any certain end, as the tools of a trade; the furniture of a house; ammunition for war; equipage; &c.

There is an apparatus of things previous, to be adjusted before I come to the calculation itself. Woodward.

Ourselves are easily provided for; it is nothing but the circumstantial, the apparatus, or equipage of human life, that costs so much. Pope's Letters to Gay.

APPAREL. n. f. It has no plural. [appareil, Fr.]

1. Drefs; vesture.

I cannot cog and say, that thou art this and that, like many of those lipping hawthorn buds, that come like women in men's apparel, and smell like Bucklerbury in simpling time. Shakspeare's Merry Wives of Windsor.

2. External habiliments,

Our late burnt London, in apparel new,
Shook off her ashes to have treated you. Waller.

At public devotion, his resigned carriage made religion appear in the natural apparel of simplicity. Tatler.

TO APPAREL. v. a. [from appareil, the noun.]

1. To drefs; to cloath.

With such robes were the king's daughters that were virgins apparelled. 2 Sam. xiii. 18.

Both combatants were apparelled only in their doublets and hoses. Hayward.

2. To adorn with drefs.

She did apparel her apparel, and with the preciousness of her body made it most sumptuous. Sidney.

3. To cover or deck, as with drefs.

You may have trees apparelled with flowers, by boring holes in them, and putting into them earth, and setting seeds of violets. Bacon.

Shelves, and rocks, and precipices, and gulfs, being apparelled with a verdure of plants, would resemble mountains and valleys. Bentley's Sermons.

4. To fit out; to furnish; not in use.

It hath been agreed, that either of them should send ships to sea well manned and apparelled to fight. Sir J. Hayward.

APPARENT. adj. [apparent, Fr. apparens, Lat.]

1. Plain; indubitable; not doubtful.

The main principles of reason are in themselves apparent. For to make nothing evident of itself unto man's understanding, were to take away all possibility of knowing any thing. Hooker.

2. Seeming in appearance; not real.

The perception intellectual often corrects the report of phantasy, as in the apparent bigness of the sun, the apparent crookedness of the staff in air and water. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

3. Visible; in opposition to secret.

What secret imaginations we entertained is known to God; this is apparent, that we have not behaved ourselves, as if we preserved a graceful remembrance of his mercies. Atterbury.

The outward and apparent sanctity of actions should flow from purity of heart. Rogers.

4. Open; evident; known; not merely suspected.

As well the fear of harm, as harm apparent, in my opinion ought to be prevented. Shakspeare's Richard III.

5. Certain; not presumptive.

He is the next of blood,
And heir apparent to the English crown. Shakspeare's Henry VI.

APPARENTLY. n. f. Elliptically used for beir apparent.

Draw thy sword in right.—
—I'll draw it as apparent to the crown,
And in that quarrel use it. Shak. Henry VI.

APPARENTLY. adv. [from apparent.] Evidently; openly.

Arrest him, officer;
I would not spare my brother in this case,
If he should scorn me so apparently. Shakspeare's Comedy of Errors.

Vices apparently tend to the impairing of men's health. Tillotson.

APPARITION. n. f. [from appareo, Lat. to appear.]

1. Appearance; visibility.

When suddenly stood at my head a dream,
Whose inward apparition gently mov'd
My fancy. Milton.

My retirement tempted me to divert those melancholy thoughts which the new apparitions of foreign invasion and domestic discontent gave us. Denham.

2. The thing appearing; a form; a visible object.

I have mark'd
A thousand blushing apparitions
To start into her face; a thousand innocent flames
In angel whiteness bear away those blushes. Shakspeare.

A glorious apparition! had not doubt,
A carnal fear, that day dimn'd Adam's eyes. Milton.

Any thing besides may take from me the sense of what appeared; whilst apparition, it seems, was you. Tatler.

3. A spectre; a walking spirit.

Horatio says 'tis but our phantasy,
Touching this dreaded sight twice seen of us;
Therefore I have intreated him,
That if again this apparition come,
He may approve our eyes and speak to it. Shakspeare's Hamlet.

Tender minds should not receive early impressions of goblins, spectres, and apparitions, where-with maids fright them into compliance. Locke.

One of those apparitions had his right hand fitted with darts, which he brandished in the face of all who came up that way. Tatler.

4. Something only apparent, not real.

Still there's something
That checks my joys—
—Nor can I yet distinguish
Which is an apparition, this or that. Den. Sophy.

5. Astronomically, the visibility of some luminary, opposed to occultation.

A month of apparition is the space wherein the moon appeareth, deducting three days wherein it commonly disappeareth; and this containeth but twenty-six days and twelve hours. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

APPARITORS. n. f. [from appareo, Lat. to be at hand.]

1. Such persons as are at hand to execute the proper orders of the magistrate or judge of any court of judicature. Ayliffe.

2. The lowest officer of the ecclesiastical court.

They swallowed all the Roman hierarchy, from the pope to the apparitor. Ayliffe's Paragon.

TO APPAY. v. a. [appayer, old Fr. to satisfy.]

1. To satisfy; to content: whence well appayed, is pleased; ill appayed, is uneasy. It is now obsolete.

How well appaid she was her bird to find? Sidney.

I am well appaid that you had rather believe, than take the pain of a long pilgrimage. Camden.

So only can high justice rest appaid. Milton.

2. The sense is obscure in these lines:
Ay, Willy, when the heart is ill appaid,
How can bagpipe or joints be well appaid? Spenser.

TO APPEACH. v. a.

1. To accuse; to inform against any person.

He did, amongst many others, appeach Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain. Bacon's Henry VII.

Were he twenty times
My son, I would appeach him. Shakspeare's Richard II.

2. To accuse; to inform against any person.

He did, amongst many others, appeach Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain. Bacon's Henry VII.

Were he twenty times
My son, I would appeach him. Shakspeare's Richard II.

2. The sense is obscure in these lines:
Ay, Willy, when the heart is ill appaid,
How can bagpipe or joints be well appaid? Spenser.

TO APPEACH. v. a.

1. To accuse; to inform against any person.

He did, amongst many others, appeach Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain. Bacon's Henry VII.

Were he twenty times
My son, I would appeach him. Shakspeare's Richard II.

2. The sense is obscure in these lines:
Ay, Willy, when the heart is ill appaid,
How can bagpipe or joints be well appaid? Spenser.

TO APPEACH. v. a.

1. To accuse; to inform against any person.

He did, amongst many others, appeach Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain. Bacon's Henry VII.

Were he twenty times
My son, I would appeach him. Shakspeare's Richard II.

2. The sense is obscure in these lines:
Ay, Willy, when the heart is ill appaid,
How can bagpipe or joints be well appaid? Spenser.

TO APPEACH. v. a.

1. To accuse; to inform against any person.

He did, amongst many others, appeach Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain. Bacon's Henry VII.

Were he twenty times
My son, I would appeach him. Shakspeare's Richard II.

2. The sense is obscure in these lines:
Ay, Willy, when the heart is ill appaid,
How can bagpipe or joints be well appaid? Spenser.

TO APPEACH. v. a.

1. To accuse; to inform against any person.

He did, amongst many others, appeach Sir William Stanley, the lord chamberlain. Bacon's Henry VII.

Resolv'd to put away that lordly shame.

Fairy Queen.

Nor canst, nor durst thou, traitor, on the pain,
Appeach my honour, or thine own maintain.

Dryden.

APPEACHMENT. n. f. [from appeach.] Charge exhibited against any man; accusation.

A busy-headed man gave first light to this appeachment; but the earl did avouch it. Hayward.

The duke's answers to his appeachments, in number thirteen, I find civilly couched. Wotton.

TO APPEAL. v. n. [appello, Lat.]
1. To transfer a cause from one to another; with the particles to and from.

From the ordinary therefore they appeal to themselves. Hooker.

2. To refer to another as judge.

Force, or a declared sign of force, upon the person of another, where there is no common superior on earth to appeal to for relief, is the state of war; and it is the want of such an appeal gives a man the right of war, even against an aggressor, though he be in society and a fellow-subject.

Locke.

They knew no foe, but in the open field,
And to their cause and to the gods appeal'd.

Stepney.

3. To call another as witness.
Whether this, that the soul always thinks, be a self-evident proposition, I appeal to mankind.

Locke.

4. To charge with a crime; to accuse: a term of law.

One but flatters us,

As well appeareth by the cause you come,
Namely, t'appeal each other of high treason.

Shakespeare.

APPEAL. n. f. [from the verb To appeal.]

1. An appeal is a provocation from an inferior to a superior judge, whereby the jurisdiction of the inferior judge is for a while suspended, in respect of the cause; the cognizance being devolved to the superior judge.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

This ring

Deliver them, and your appeal to us
There make before them. Shaksf. Henry VIII.

Our reason prompts us to a future state,
The last appeal from fortune and from fate,
Where God's all righteous ways will be declar'd.

Dryden.

There are distributors of justice, from whom there lies an appeal to the prince.

Addison.

2. In the common law.
An accusation; which is a lawful declaration of another man's crime before a competent judge, by one that sets his name to the declaration, and undertakes to prove it, upon the penalty that may ensue of the contrary; more commonly used for the private accusation of a murderer, by a party who had interest in the party murdered, and of any felon, by one of his accomplices in the fact.

Cowel.

The duke's unjust,

Thus to retort your manifest appeal,
And put your trial in the villain's mouth,
Which here you come to accuse. Shaksf.

Hast thou, according to thy oath and bond,
Brought hither Henry Hereford, thy bold son,
Here to make good the boist'rous late appeal
Against the duke of Norfolk? Shakespeare.

3. A summons to answer a charge.
Nor shall the sacred character of king
Be urg'd to shield me from thy bold appeal,
If I have injur'd thee, that makes us equal.

Dryden.

4. A call upon any as witness.
The casting up of the eyes, and lifting up of the hands, is a kind of appeal to the Deity, the author of wonders. Bacon.

APPELLANT. n. f. [from appeal.] He that appeals.

Lords appellants,

Your differences shall all rest under gage,
Till we assign you to your days of trial. Shaksf.

APPELLER. n. f. [from appeal.] One who makes an appeal.

TO APPEAR. v. n. [appareo, Lat.]

1. To be in sight; to be visible.

As the leprosy appeareth in the skin of the flesh.

Lev. xiii. 43.

And half her knee, and half her breast appear,
By art, like negligence, disclos'd and bare. Prior.

2. To become visible as a spirit.
For I have appeared unto thee for this purpose,
to make thee a minister and a witness.

Acts, xxvi. 16.

3. To stand in the presence of another; generally used of standing before some superior.
When shall I come and appear before God?

Psalms, xlii. 2.

4. To be the object of observation.
Let thy work appear unto thy servants, and thy glory unto their children. Psalms xc. 16.

5. To exhibit one's self before a court of justice.
Keep comfort to you, and this morning see
You do appear before them.

Shakespeare's Henry VIII.

6. To be made clear by evidence.
Egfrid did utterly waste and subdue it, as appears out of Beda's complaint against him; and Edgar brought it under his obedience, as appears by an ancient record. Spenser's Ireland.

7. To seem in opposition to reality.
His first and principal care being to appear unto his people, such as he would have them be, and to be such as he appeared. Sidney.

My noble master will appear
Such as he is, full of regard and honour. Shaksf.

8. To be plain beyond dispute.
From experiments, useful indications may be taken, as will appear by what follows. Arbutnot.

APPEARANCE. n. f. [from To appear.]

1. The act of coming into sight; as, they were surprised by the sudden appearance of the enemy.

2. The thing seen; as, the remarkable appearances in the sky.

3. Phenomena; that quality of any thing which is visible.

The advancing day of experimental knowledge discloseth such appearances, as will not lie even in any model extant. Glanville's Scepis.

4. Semblance; not reality.
He encreased in estimation, whether by destiny, or whether by his virtues, or at least by his appearances of virtues. Hayward.

Heroic virtue did his actions guide,
And he the substance not the appearance chose.

Dryden.

The hypocrite would not put on the appearance of virtue, if it was not the most proper means to gain love. Addison.

5. Outside; show.
Under a fair and beautiful appearance there should ever be the real substance of good. Rogers.

6. Entry into a place or company.
Do the same justice to one another, which will be done us hereafter by those, who shall make their appearance in the world, when this generation is no more. Addison.

7. Apparition; supernatural visibility.
I think a person terrified with the imagination of spectres, more reasonable than one who thinks the appearance of spirits fabulous. Addison.

8. Exhibition of the person to a court.
I will not tarry; no, nor ever more
Upon this business my appearance make
In any of your courts. Shaksf. Henry VIII.

9. Open circumstance of a case,
Or grant her passion be sincere,
How shall his innocence be clear?
Appearances were all so strong,

The world must think him in the wrong. Swift.

10. Preference; mien.
Health, wealth, victory, and honour, are introduced;
wisdom enters the last, and so captivates with her appearance, that he gives himself up to her. Addison.

11. Probability; seeming; likelihood.
There is that which hath no appearance, that this priest being utterly unacquainted with the true person, according to whose pattern he should shape his counterfeit, should think it possible for him to instruct his player. Bacon.

APPEARER. n. f. [from To appear.] The person that appears.

That owls and ravens are ominous appearers, and presignify unlucky events, was an augurial conception. Brown.

APPEASABLE. adj. [from To appease.] That may be pacified; reconcilable.

APPEASABLENESS. n. f. [from To appease.] The quality of being easily appeased; reconcilableness.

TO APPEASE. v. a. [appaio, Fr.]

1. To quiet; to put in a state of peace.
By his counsel he appeaseth the deep, and planteth islands therein. Ecclesi. xliii. 23.

England had no leisure to think of reformation,
till the civil wars were appeased, and peace settled.

Davies on Ireland.

2. To pacify; to reconcile; to still wrath.
So Simon was appeased towards them, and fought no more against them. I Macc. xiii. 47.

O God! if my deep prayers cannot appease thee,
Yet execute thy wrath on me alone. Shaksf. Richard III.

The rest shall hear me call, and oft be warn'd
Their sinful state, and to appease betimes
Th' incensed Deity. Milton.

3. To still; to quiet.
The rest
They cut in legs and fillets for the feast,
Which drawn and serv'd, their hunger they appease.

Dryden.

APPEASEMENT. n. f. [from To appease.] A state of peace.

Being neither in numbers nor in courage great, partly by authority, partly by entreaty, they were reduced to some good appeasements. Hayward.

APPEASER. n. f. [from To appease.] He that pacifies others; he that quiets disturbances.

APPELLANT. n. f. [appello, Lat. to call.]
1. A challenger; one that summons another to answer either in the lists or in a court of justice.

In the devotion of a subject's love,
And free from other misbegotten hate,
Come I appellant to this princely preference.

Shakespeare.

This is the day appointed for the combat,
And ready are th' appellant and defendant,
Th' armourer and his man, to enter the lists.

Shakespeare.

These shifts refuted, answer thy appellant,
Though by his blindness maim'd for high attempts,
Who now defies thee thrice to single fight.

Milton.

2. One that appeals from a lower to a higher power.

An appeal transfers the cognizance of the cause to the superior judge; so that, pending the appeal, nothing can be attempted in prejudice of the appellant. Ayliffe's Parergon.

APPELLATE. n. f. [appellatus, Lat.] The person appealed against.

An appellatory libel ought to contain the name of the party appellant; the name of him from whose sentence it is appealed; the name of him to whom it is appealed; from what sentence it is appealed; the day of the sentence pronounced, and appeal interposed; and the name of the party appellate, or person against whom the appeal is lodged. Ayliffe's Parergon.

APPELLATION. n. f. [appellatio, Lat.] Name; word by which any thing is called.

Nor are always the same plants delivered under the same name and appellations. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Good and evil commonly operate upon the mind of man, by respective names or appellations, by which they are notified and conveyed to the mind. South.

APPELLATIVE. n. f. [appellativum, Lat.] Words and names are either common or proper.

Common names are such as stand for universal ideas, or a whole rank of beings, whether general or special. These are called appellatives. So fish, bird,

bird, man, city, river, are common names; and so are trout, eel, lobster; for they all agree to many individuals, and some to many species.

Watts's Logick.

APPELLATIVELY. adv. [from appellative.] According to the manner of nouns appellative; as, this man is a Hercules. Hercules is used appellatively to signify a strong man.

APPELLATORY. adj. [from appeal.] That which contains an appeal. See APPELLATE.

APPELLEE. n. f. [from appeal.] One who is appealed against, and accused. Dict.

TO APPE'ND. v. a. [appendo, Lat.] to hang to any thing.]

1. To hang any thing upon another; as, the inscription was appended to the column: the seal is appended to the record.

2. To add to something, as an accessory, not a principal part.

APPENDAGE. n. f. [French.] Something added to another thing, without being necessary to its essence, as a portico to the house.

Modesty is the appendage of sobriety, and is to chastity, to temperance, and to humility, as the fringes are to a garment.

Taylor's rule of living body.

None of the laws of motion now established, will serve to account for the production, motion, or number of bodies, nor their appendages, though they may help us a little to conceive their appearances.

Cheyne.

He was so far from over-valuing any of the appendages of life, that the thoughts of life did not affect him.

Atterbury.

APPENDANT. adj. [French.]

1. Hanging to something else.

2. Belonging to; annexed; concomitant.

He that despises the world, and all its appendant vanities, is the most secure.

Taylor.

He that looks for the blessings appendant to the sacrament, must expect them upon no terms, but of a worthy communion.

Taylor.

Riches multiplied beyond the proportion of our character, and the wants appendant to it, naturally dispose men to forget God.

Rogers.

3. In law.

Appendant is any thing belonging to another, as accessorium principali, with the civilians, or adjunctum subjectum, with the logicians. An hospital may be appendant to a manour; a common of fishing appendant to a freehold.

Corvel.

APPENDANT. n. f. That which belongs to another thing, as an accidental or adventitious part.

Pliny gives an account of the inventors of the forms and appendants of shipping.

Hale's Origin of Mankind.

A word, a look, a tread, will strike, as they are appendants to external symmetry, or indications of the beauty of the mind.

Grove.

TO APPENDICATE. v. a. [appendo, Lat.] To add to another thing.

In a palace there is the case or fabrick of the structure, and there are certain additaments; as, various furniture, and curious motions of divers things appendicated to it.

Hale.

APPENDICATION. n. f. [from appendicate.] Adjunct; appendage; annexion.

There are considerable parts and integrals, and appendications unto the mundus speculabilis, impossible to be eternal.

Hale.

APPENDIX. n. f. appendices, plur. [Lat.]

1. Something appended, or added to another thing.

The cherubim were never intended as an object of worship, because they were only the appendices to another thing. But a thing is then proposed as an object of worship, when it is set up by itself, and not by way of addition or ornament to another thing.

Stillington.

Normandy became an appendix to England, the nobler dominion, and received a greater conformity of their laws to the English, than they gave to it.

Hale's Civil Law of England.

2. An adjunct or concomitant.

All concurrent appendices of the action ought to be surveyed, in order to pronounce with truth concerning it.

Watts.

TO APPERTAIN. v. n. [appartenir, Fr.]

1. To belong to as of right; with to.

The honour of devising this doctrine, that religion ought to be enforced by the sword, would be found appertaining to Mahomed the false prophet.

Raleigh.

The Father, t' whom in heav'n supreme Kingdom, and power, and glory appertains, Hath honour'd me, according to his will.

Paradise Lost.

2. To belong to by nature or appointment.

If the foul of man did serve only to give him being in this life, then things appertaining to this life would content him, as we see they do other creatures.

Hooker.

And they roasted the passover with fire, as appertained: as for the sacrifices they fod them in brass pots.

1 Esdras.

Both of them seem not to generate any other effect, but such as appertaineth to their proper objects and fenes.

Bacon.

Is it expected, I should know no secrets

That appertain to you. Shaksp. Julius Caesar.

APPERTAINMENT. n. f. [from appertain.] That which belongs to any rank or dignity.

He sent our messengers, and we lay by

Our appertainments, visiting of him. Shaksp.

APPERTENANCE. n. f. [appartenance, Fr.] That which belongs or relates to another thing.

Can they which behold the controversy of divinity condemn our enquiries in the doubtful appertinencies of arts, and receptaries of philosophy?

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

APPERTINENT. adj. [from To appertain.] Belonging; relating.

You know how apt our love was to accord

To furnish him with all appertinents

Belonging to his honour. Shaksp. Henry V.

APPETENCE. n. f. [appetentia, Lat.] Carnal

APPETENCY. f. desire; sensual desire.

Bred only and completed to the taste

Of lustful appetence; to sing, to dance,

To dress, to trouble the tongue, and roll the eye.

Milton.

APPETIBILITY. n. f. [from appetible.] The quality of being desirable.

That elicitation which the schools intend, is a deducing of the power of the will into act, merely from the appetibility of the object, as a man draws a child after him with the sight of a green bough.

Bramhall against Hobbes.

APPETIBLE. adj. [appetibilis, Lat.] Desirable; that which may be the object of appetite.

Power both to slight the most appetible objects, and to controul the most unruly passions.

Bramhall against Hobbes.

APPETITE. n. f. [appetitus, Lat.]

1. The natural desire of good; the instinct by which we are led to seek pleasure.

The will properly and strictly taken, as it is of things which are referred unto the end that men desireth, differeth greatly from that inferior natural desire, which we call appetite. The object of appetite is whatsoever sensible good may be wished for; the object of will is that good which reason does lead us to seek.

Hooker.

2. The desire of sensual pleasure.

Why, she should hang on him,

As if increase of appetite had grown

By what it fed on. Shaksp. Hamlet.

Locke.

4. In law, to alienate a benefice. See APPROPRIATION.

Before Richard II. it was lawful to appropriate the whole fruits of a benefice to any abbey, the house finding one to serve the cure; that king redressed that horrid evil.

Ayliffe.

APPROPRIATE. adj. [from the verb.] Peculiar; assigned to some particular use or person; belonging peculiarly.

He did institute a band of fifty archers, by the name of yeomen of his guard; and that it might be thought to be rather a matter of dignity, than any matter of diffidence appropriate to his own case, he made an ordinance not temporary, but to hold in succession for ever.

Bacon.

The heathens themselves had an apprehension of the necessity of some appropriate acts of divine worship.

Stillingfleet.

APPROPRIATION. n. f. [from appropriate.]

1. The application of something to a particular purpose.

The mind should have distinct ideas of the things, and retain the particular name, with its peculiar appropriation to that idea.

Locke.

2. The claim of any thing as peculiar.

He doth nothing but talk of his horse, and make a great appropriation to his good parts, that he can shoe him himself.

Shakespeare.

3. The fixing a particular signification to a word.

The name of faculty may, by an appropriation that disguises its true sense, palliate the absurdity.

Locke.

4. In law, the severing of a benefice ecclesiastical to the proper and perpetual use of some religious house, or dean, and chapter, bishoprick, or college; because, as persons ordinarily have no right of fee simple, these, by reason of their perpetuity, are accounted owners of the fee simple; and therefore are called proprietors. To an appropriation, after the licence obtained of the king in chancery, the consent of the diocesan, patron, and incumbent, are necessary, if the church be full; but if the church be void, the diocesan and the patron, upon the king's licence may conclude.

Cowel.

APPROPRIATOR. n. f. [from appropriate.] He that is possessed of an appropriated benefice.

These appropriators, by reason of their perpetuities, are accounted owners of the fee simple; and therefore are called proprietors.

Ayliffe's Parergon.

There is a censor of justice and manners, without whose approval no capital sentences are to be executed.

Temple.

APPROVANCE. n. f. [from approve.] Approbation; a word not much used.

A man of his learning should not so lightly have been carried away with old wives' tales from approvance of his own reason.

Spenser.

Should she seem

Soft'ning the least approvance to bestow,
Their colours burnish, and by hope inspir'd,
They brisk advance.

Thomson.

To APPROVE. v. a. [approver, Fr. approbo, Lat.]

1. To like, to be pleased with.

There can be nothing possibly evil which God approveth, and that he approveth much more than he doth command.

Hooker.

What power was that, whereby Medea saw,
And well approv'd, and prais'd the better course
When her rebellious sense did so withdraw
Her feeble powers, that she pursu'd the worse?

Davies.

2. To express liking.

It is looked upon as insolence for a man to set up his own opinion against that of some learned doctor, or otherwise approved writer.

Locke.

3. To prove; to show; to justify.

His meaning was not, that Archimedes could simply in nothing be deceived; but that he had in such sort approved his skill, that he seemed worthy of credit for ever after, in matters appertaining to the science he was skilful in.

Hooker.

In religion,

What damned error, but some sober brow
Will bless it, and approve it with a text.

Shakespeare.

I'm sorry

That he approves the common liar, Fame,
Who speaks him thus at Rome.

Shakespeare.

Would'st thou approve thy constancy?
First thy obedience.

Milton.

Refer all the actions of this short life to that state which will never end; and this will approve itself to be wisdom at the last, whatever the world judge of it now.

Tillotson.

4. To experience; not in use.

Oh! 'tis the curse in love, and still approv'd,
When women cannot love, where they're belov'd.

Shakespeare.

5. To make, or show to be worthy of approbation.

The first care and concern must be to approve himself to God by righteousness, holiness, and purity.

Rogers.

Chambers.

If bodies revolve in orbits that are pretty near circles, and the apsides of these orbits be fixed, then the centripetal forces of those bodies will be reciprocally as the squares of the distances.

Cheyne.

APT. adj. [aptus, Lat.]

1. Fit.

This so eminent industry in making proselytes, more of that sex than of the other, groweth; for that they are deemed apter to serve as instruments in the cause. Apter they are through the eagerness of their affection; apter through a natural inclination unto piety; apter through sundry opportunities, &c. Finally, apter through a singular light which they take in giving very large and particular intelligence how all near about them and affected as concerning the same cause.

Hooker.

2. Having a tendency to; liable to.

Things natural, as long as they keep those forms which give them their being, cannot possibly be apt or inclinable to do otherwise than they do.

Hooker.

My vines and peaches on my best fourth walls were apt to have a foot or smuttiness upon their leaves and fruits.

Temple.

3. Inclined to; led to; disposed to.

AQUA. n. f. [Latin.] A word signifying water, very much used in chemical writings.

AQUA FORTIS. [Latin.] A corrosive liquor made by distilling purified nitre with calcined vitriol, or rectified oil of vitriol in a strong heat: the liquor, which rises in fumes red as blood, being collected, is the spirit of nitre or aqua fortis; which serves as a menstruum for dissolving of silver, and all other metals, except gold. But if sea salt, or sal ammoniac, be added to aqua fortis, it commences aqua regia, and will then dissolve no metal but gold.

Chambers.

The dissolving of silver in aqua fortis, and gold in aqua regia, and not vice versa would not be difficult to know.

Locke.

AQUA MARINA, of the Italian lapidaries, is of a sea or bluish green. This stone seems to me to be the beryllus of Pliny.

Woodward.

AQUA MIRABILIS. [Latin.] The wonderful water, is prepared of cloves, galangals, cubebs, mace, cardomums, nutmegs, ginger, and spirit of wine, digested twenty-four hours, then distilled.

AQUA REGIA, or AQUA REGALIS. [Latin.] An acid water, so called because it dissolves gold, the king of metals. Its essential ingredient, is common sea salt, the only salt which will operate on gold. It is prepared by mixing common sea salt, or sal ammoniac, or the spirit of them, with spirit of nitre, or common aqua fortis.

Chambers.

He adds to his complex idea of gold, that of fixedness or solubility in aqua regia.

Locke.

AQUA VITÆ. [Latin.] It is commonly understood of what is otherwise called brandy, or spirit of wine, either simple or prepared with aromatics. But some appropriate the term brandy to what is procured from wine or the grape; aqua vitæ, to that drawn after the same manner from malt.

Chambers.

I will rather trust a Fleming with my butter, an Irishman with my aqua vitæ bottle, or a thief to walk with my ambling gelding, than my wife with herself.

Shakspeare.

AQUATIC. adj. [aquaticus, Lat. from aqua, water.]

1. That which inhabits the water.

The vast variety of worms found in animals, as well terrestrial as aquatic, are taken into their bodies by meats and drinks.

2. Waggish; mirthful; triflingly mischievous.
This signification it seems to have gained, by being frequently applied to the boy most remarkable for his pranks; as, the arch rogue; unless it be derived from Archy, the name of the jester to Charles I.

Eugenio set out from the university; he had the reputation of an arch lad at school. Swift.

ARCH. in composition, signifies chief, or of the first class, [from ἀρχή, or ἀρχαί,] as, archangel, archbishop. It is pronounced variously with regard to the b, which before a consonant sounds as in cheese, as, archdeacon; before a vowel like k, as archangel.

ARCH'ANGEL. n. f. [archangelus, Lat.] One of the highest order of angels.

His form had yet not lost
All her original brightness, nor appear'd
Less than archangel ruin'd, and th' excess
Of glory obscur'd. Milton.

'Tis sure th' archangel's trump I hear,
Nature's great passing-bell, the only call
Of God's that will be heard by all. Norris.

ARCH'ANGEL. n. f. [lamiam, Lat.] The name of a plant, called also Dead nettle.

ARCHANGEL'ICK. adj. [from archangel.] Belonging to archangels.

Re ceas'd, and th' archangel'ick pow'r prepar'd
For swift descent; with him the cohort bright
Of watchful cherubim. Milton.

ARCHB'ACON. n. f. [from arch and beacon.]
The chief place of prospect, or of signal.

You shall win the top of the Cornish archbeacon Hainbrough, which may for prospect compare with Rama in Palestina. Carew.

ARCHBISHOP. n. f. [from arch and bishop.] A bishop of the first class, who superintends the conduct of other bishops his suffragans.

Cranmer is return'd with welcome,
Install'd lord archbishop of Canterbury. Shaksp.

The archbishop was the known architect of this new fabrick. Clarendon.

ARCHBISHOPRICK. n. f. [from archbishop.]
The state or jurisdiction of an archbishop.

'Tis the cardinal;
And merely to revenge him on the emperor,
For not bestowing on him, at his asking,
The archbishoprick of Toledo, this is purpos'd. Shaksp.

This excellent man, from the time of his promotion to the archbishoprick, underwent the envy and malice of men who agreed in nothing else. Clarendon.

ARCHCHA'NTER. n. f. [from arch and chanter.]
The chief chanter.

ARCHDE'ACON. n. f. [archidiaconus, Lat.] One that supplies the bishop's place and office in such matters as do belong to the episcopal function.

The law styles him the bishop's vicar, or vicegerent. Ayliffe's Parergon.

Left negligence might foist in abuses, an archdeacon was appointed to take account of their doings. Carew.

ARCHDE'ACONRY. n. f. [archidiaconatus, Lat.]
The office or jurisdiction of an archdeacon.

It oweth subjection to the metropolitan of Canterbury, and hath one only archdeaconry. Carew's Survey.

ARCHDE'ACONSHIP. n. f. [from archdeacon.]
The office of an archdeacon.

ARCHDU'KE. n. f. [archidux, Lat.] A title given to some sovereign princes, as of Austria and Tuscany.

Philip archduke of Austria, during his voyage from the Netherlands towards Spain, was weather-driven into Weymouth. Carew's Survey.

ARCHDU'CHESS. n. f. [from arch and duchess.]
A title given to the sister or daughter of the archduke of Austria, or to the wife of an archduke of Tuscany.

ARCH-PHILO'SOPHER. n. f. [from arch and philosopher.] Chief philosopher.

It is no improbable opinion therefore, which the arch-philosopher was of, that the chiefest person in every household was always as it were a king. Hooker.

ARCH-PRE'LATE. n. f. [from arch and prelate.]
Chief prelate.

May we not wonder that a man of St. Basil's authority and quality, an arch-prelate in the house of God, should have his name far and wide called in question? Hooker.

ARCH-PRESBYTER. n. f. [from arch and presbyter.] Chief presbyter.

As simple deacons are in subjection to presbyters, according to the canon law; so are also presbyters and arch-presbyters in subjection to these archdeacons. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ARCH-PRI'EST. n. f. [from arch and priest.]
Chief priest.

The word decanus was extended to an ecclesiastical dignity, which included the arch-priests. Ayliffe's Parergon.

ARCHAIO'LOGY. n. f. [from ἀρχαί, ancient, and λόγος, a discourse.] A discourse on antiquity.

ARCHAIOLOG'ICK. adj. [from archaioLOGY.] Relating to a discourse on antiquity.

ARCHAISM. n. f. [ἀρχαϊσμός.] An ancient phrase, or mode of expression.

I shall never use archaisms, like Milton. Watts.

ARCHED. participial adj. [from To arch.] Bent in the form of an arch.

I see how thine eye would emulate the diamond; thou hast the right arch'd bent of the brow. Shaksp.

Let the arch'd knife
Well sharpen'd, now assail the spreading shades
Of vegetables. Philips.

ARC

ARCHER. n. f. [archer, Fr. from arcus, Lat. a bow.] He that shoots with a bow; he that carries a bow in battle.

Draw, archers, draw your arrows to the head. Shaksp.

This Cupid is no longer an archer, his glory shall be ours, for we are the only love-gods. Shaksp.

Thou frequent bring'st the smitten deer;
For seldom, archers say, thy arrows err. Prior.

ARCHERY. n. f. [from archer.]

1. The use of the bow.
Among the English artillery, archery challengeth the pre-eminence, as peculiar to our nation. Camden.

2. The act of shooting with the bow.
Flower of this purple dye,
Hit with Cupid's archery,
Sink in apple of his eye. Shaksp.

3. The art of an archer.
Blest seraphims shall leave their quire,
And turn love's soldiers upon thee,
To exercise their archery. Grasshaw's Steps to Temple.

Say from what golden quivers of the sky
Do all thy winged arrows fly?
Swiftness and power by birth are thine.
'Tis I believe this archery to shew,
That so much cost in colours thou,
And skill in painting, dost bestow
Upon thy ancient arms the gaudy heavenly bow. Cowley.

ARCHES-COURT. n. f. [from arches and court.]
The chief and most ancient consistory that belongs to the archbishop of Canterbury, for the debating of spiritual causes, so called from Bow-church in London, where it is kept, whose top is raised of stone-pillars, built arch-wise. The judge of this court is termed the dean of the arches, or official of the arches-court: dean of the arches, because with this office is commonly joined a peculiar jurisdiction of thirteen parishes in London, termed a deanery, being exempted from the authority of the bishop of London, and belonging to the archbishop of Canterbury; of which the parish of Bow is one. Some others say, that he was first called dean of the arches, because the official to the archbishop, the dean of the arches, was his substitute in his court; and by that means the names became confounded. The jurisdiction of this judge is ordinary, and extends through the whole province of Canterbury: so that, upon any appeal, he forthwith, and without any further examination of the cause, sends out his citation to the party appealed, and his inhibition to the judge from whom the appeal is made. Cowley.

ARCHETYPE. n. f. [archetypum, Lat.] The original of which any resemblance is made.

Our souls, though they might have perceived images themselves by simple sense; yet it seems inconceivable, how they should apprehend their archetypes. Glanville's Scepsis.

As a man, a tree, are the outward objects of our perception, and the outward archetypes or patterns of our ideas; so our sensations of hunger, cold, are also inward archetypes or patterns of our ideas. But the notions or pictures of these things, as they are in the mind, are the ideas. Watts's Logic.

ARCHE'TYPAL. adj. [archetypus, Lat.] Origininal; being a pattern from which copies are made.

Through contemplation's optics I have seen
Him who is fairer than the sons of men:
The source of good, the light archetypal. Norris.

ARCHE'US. n. f. [probably from ἀρχή.] A word by which Paracelsus seems to have meant a power that presides over the animal œconomy, distinct from the rational soul.

ARCHIDIA'CONAL. adj. [from archidiaconus, Lat.]
an archdeacon. Belonging to an archdeacon; as, this offence is liable to be censured in an archidiaconal visitation.

ARCHIEPI'SCOPAL. adj. [from archiepiscopus,
Lat. an archbishop.] Belonging to an archbishop;
as, Canterbury is an archiepiscopal see; the suffragans are subject to archiepiscopal jurisdiction.

ARC

A'RGHITECT. n. f. [architectus, Lat.]

1. A professor of the art of building.
The architect's glory consists in the designment and idea of the work; his ambition should be to make the form triumph over the matter. Wotton.

2. A contriver of a building; a builder.

The hasty multitude

Admiring enter'd, and the work some praise,
And some the architect: his hand was known
In heav'n, by many a tow'rd structure high,
Where scepter'd angels held their residence,
And fat as princes. Milton.

3. The contriver or former of any compound body.

This inconvenience the divine architect of the body obviated. Ray on the Creation.

4. The contriver of any thing.

An irreligious Moor,

Chief architect and plotter of these woes. Shakespeare.

ARCHITE'CTIVE. adj. [from architect.] That performs the work of architecture.

How could the bodies of many of them, particularly the last mentioned, be furnished with architective materials. Derham's Physico-Theology.

ARCHITECTONICK. adj. [from ἀρχιτεκνῶν, chief, and τέκνω, an artificer.] That which has the power or skill of an architect; that which can build or form any thing.

To say that some more fine part of either, or all the hypostatical principle, is the architect of this elaborate structure, is to give occasion to demand, what proportion of the tria prima afforded this architectonick spirit, and what agent made so skilful and happy a mixture. Boyle.

ARCHITECTURE. n. f. [architectura, Lat.]

1. The art or science of building.

Architecture is divided into civil architecture, called by way of eminence architecture; military architecture, or fortification; and naval architecture, which, besides building of ships and vessels, includes also ports, moles, docks, &c. Chambers.

Our fathers next in architecture skill'd,

Cities for use, and forts for safety build:

Then palaces and lofty domes arose,

These for devotion, and for pleasure those. Blackmore.

2. The effect or performance of the science of building.

The formation of the first earth being a piece of divine architecture, ascribed to a particular providence. Burnet's Theory.

A'RGHITRAVE. n. f. [from ἀρχιτεράβη, chief, and τεράβη, Lat. a beam; because it is supposed to represent the principal beam in timber buildings.] That part of a column, or order of a column, which lies immediately upon the capital, and is the lowest member of the entablature. This member is different in the different orders; and in building architrave doors and windows, the workman frequently follows his own fancy. The architrave is sometimes called the reason-piece, or master beam, in timber buildings, as porticos, cloysters, &c. In chimnies it is called the mantle-piece; and over jambs of doors, and lintels of windows, hyperthyron. Builder's Dict.

The materials laid over this pillar were of wood; through the lightness whereof the architrave could not suffer, nor the column itself, being so substantial. Wotton's Architecture.

Westward a pompous frontispiece appear'd,
On Dorick pillars of white marble rear'd,
Crown'd with an architrave of antique mold,
And sculpture rising on the roughen'd gold. Pope.

A'RGHIVES. n. f. without a singular. [archiva, Lat.] the places where records or ancient writings are kept. It is perhaps sometimes used for the writings themselves.

Though we think our words vanish with the breath that utters them, yet they become records in God's court, and are laid up in his archives, as witnesses either for or against us. Government of the Tongue.

I shall now only look a little into the Mosaic archives, to observe what they furnish us with upon this subject. Woodward.

ARD

A'RGHWISE. adv. [from arch and wise.] In the form of an arch.

The court of arches, so called ab arcuata ecclesia, or from Bow church, by reason of the steeple or clochier thereof, raised at the top with stone pillars in fashion of a bow bent archwise. Ayliffe's Paragon.

ARCHITENENT. adj. [architenens, Lat.] Bow-bearing.

ARCTA'TION. n. f. [from arctos, to streighten.] Streightening; confinement to a narrower compass.

A'RGHICK. n. f. [from ἄρκτος, the northern constellation.] Northern; lying under the Arc-tos, or bear. See ARTICK.

Ever during snows, perpetual shades
Of darkness would congeal their livid blood,
Did not the arctick tract spontaneous yield
A cheering purple berry big with wine. Philips.

A'RGHICK Circle. The circle at which the northern frigid zone begins.

A'RGHATE. adj. [arcuatus, Lat.] Bent in the form of an arch.

The cause of the confusion in sounds, and the inconfusion of species visible, is, for that the sight worketh in right lines; but sounds that move in oblique and arcuate lines, must needs encounter and disturb the one the other. Bacon's Natural History.

In the gullet, where it perforate the midriff, the carneous fibres are inflected and arcuate. Ray on the Creation.

A'RGHATILE. adj. [from arcuate.] Bent; inflected. Dict.

ARCUA'TION. n. f. [from arcuate.]

1. The act of bending any thing; incurvation.

2. The state of being bent; curvity or crookedness.

3. [In gardening.] The method of raising by layers such trees as cannot be raised from feed, or that bear no feed, as the elm, lime, alder, willow; and is so called from bending down to the ground the branches which spring from the offsets or stools after they are planted. Chambers.

A'RGHATURE. n. f. [arcuatura, low Latin.] The bending or curvature of an arch. Dict.

A'RGHUALISTER. n. f. [from arcus, a bow, and balista, an engine.] A cross-bow-man.

King John was espied by a very good arcubalist, who said, that he would soon dispatch the cruel tyrant. God forbid, vile varlet, quoth the earl, that we should procure the death of the holy one of God. Camden's Remains.

ARD. [Saxon.] Signifies natural disposition; as, Goddard is a divine temper; Reinard, a sincere temper; Giffard, a bountiful and liberal disposition; Bernard, filial affection. Giffon's Camden.

A'RGHENCY. n. f. [from ardens.] Ardour, eagerness; warmth of affection.

Accepted our prayers shall be, if qualified with humility, and ardency, and perseverance, so far as concerns the end immediate to them. Hammond's Pract. Catechism.

The ineffable happiness of our dear Redeemer must needs bring an increase to ours, commensurate to the ardency of our love for him. Boyle.

A'RGHENT. adj. [ardens, Lat. burning.]

1. Hot; burning; fiery.

Chymists observe, that vegetables, as, lavender, rue, marjoram, &c. distilled before fermentation, yield oils without any burning spirits; but, after fermentation, yield ardent spirits without oils; which shews, that their oil is, by fermentation, converted into spirit. Newot. Opticks.

2. Fierce; vehement; having the appearance or quality of fire.

A knight of swarthy face,
High on a coal-black steed pursued the chase;
With flashing flames his ardent eyes were filled. Dryden.

3. Passionate; affectionate: used generally of desire.

Another nymph with fatal pow'r may rise,
To damp the sinking beams of Cælia's eyes;
With haughty pride may hear her charms confest,
And scorn the ardent vows that I have blest. Prior.

ARE

A'RGHENTLY. adv. [from ardens.] Eagerly; affectionately.

With true zeal may our hearts be most ardently inflamed to our religion. Spirit's Sermons.

A'RGHOUR. n. f. [ardor, Lat. heat.]

1. Heat.

Joy, like a ray of the sun, reflects with a greater ardour and quickness, when it rebounds upon a man from the breast of his friend. South.

2. Heat of affection; as love, desire, courage.

The soldiers shout around with generous rage; He prais'd their ardour, inly pleas'd to see His host. Dryden.

Unmov'd the mind of Ithacus remain'd,
And the vain ardours of our love restrain'd. Pope.

3. The person ardent or bright. This is only used by Milton.

Nor delay'd the winged faint,
After his charge receiv'd, but from among Thousand celestial ardours, where he stood
Veil'd with his gorgeous wings, up-springing light,

Flew thro' the midst of heav'n. Par. Lost.

A'RGHUTY. n. f. [from arduous.] Height; difficulty. Dict.

A'RGHDOUS. adj. [arduous, Lat.]

1. Lofly; hard to climb.

High on Parnassus' top her sons she shew'd,
And pointed out those arduous paths they trod. Pope.

2. Difficult.

It was a means to bring him up in the school of arts and policy, and so to fit him for that great and arduous employment that God designed him to. South.

A'RGHDOUSNESS. n. f. [from arduous.] Height; difficulty.

ARE. The third person plural of the present tense of the verb to be; as young men are rash, old are cautious.

ARE, or Alamire. The lowest note but one in Guido's scale of musick.

Gamut I am, the ground of all accord,

Are to plead Hortensio's passion;

B mi Bianca take him for thy lord,

C faut, that loves with all affection. Shakespeare.

A'RGHREA. n. f. [Latin.]

1. The surface contained between any lines or boundaries.

The area of a triangle is found by knowing the height and the base. Watts's Logick.

2. Any open surface, as, the floor of a room; the open part of a church; the vacant part or stage of an amphitheatre. An inclosed place, as lists, or a bowling-green, or grass-plot.

Let us conceive a floor or area of goodly length, with the breadth somewhat more than half the longitude. Wotton.

The Alban lake is of an oval figure, and by reason of the high mountains that encompass it, looks like the area of some vast amphitheatre. Addison.

In areas vary'd with Mosaic art,

Some whirl the disk, and some the jav'lin dart. Pope.

To A'RGHAD, or A'RGHED. v. a. [aperean, Sax. to counsel.] To advise; to direct.

Knights and ladies gentle deeds,
Whose praises having slept in silence long,
Me, all too meane, the sacred muse awakes
To blazon broad. Fairy Queen.

But mark what I aread thee now; avant,
Fly thither whence thou fled'st! If from this hour

Within these hallow'd limits thou appear,
Back to th' infernal pit I drag thee chain'd. Par. Lost.

A'RGHFA'CTION. n. f. [arefacio, Lat. to dry.]

The state of growing dry; the act of drying.

From them, and their motions, principally proceed arefaction, and most of the effects of nature. Bacon.

To A'RGHFA. v. a. [arefacio, Lat. to dry.] To dry; to exhaust of moisture.

Heat drieth bodies that do easily expire, a-parchs parchment, leaves, roots, clay, &c. and so doth time or age argfy, as in the same bodies, &c.

ARENACEOUS. adj. [from arena, Lat. sand.] Sandy: having the qualities of sand.

A piece of the stone of the same mines, of a yellowish brown colour, an arenaceous friable substance, and with some white spar mixed with it.

ARENATION. n. f. [from arena, Lat. sand.] Is used by some physicians for a sort of dry bath, when the patient sits with his feet upon hot sand.

ARENOSÉ. adj. [from arena, Lat.] Sandy; full of sand.

ARENULOUS. adj. [from arenula, Lat. sand.] Full of small sand; gravelly.

AREOTICK. adj. [from areotica, Lat.] Attenuant, applied to medicines that dissolve viscidities, so that the morbid matter may be carried off by sweat, or insensible perspiration.

ARETOLOGY. n. f. [from arete, virtue and logos, to discourse.] That part of moral philosophy which treats of virtue, its nature, and the means of arriving at it.

ARGAL. n. f. Hard lees sticking to the sides of wine vessels, more commonly called tartar.

ARGENT. adj. [from argentum, Lat. silver.] 1. The white colour used in the coats of gentlemen, knights, and baronets, supposed to be the representation of that metal.

As swift as fairy lightning kindled new,
His argent eagle with her silver wings
In field of azure, fair Britannia knew. Fairfax
In an argent field, the god of war
Was drawn triumphant on his iron car. Dryden

2. Silver; bright like silver.
Those argent fields more likely habitants,
Translated faints, or middle spirits hold,
Betwixt th' angelical and human kind. Milton

Or ask of yonder argent fields above,
Why Jove's satellites are less than Jove. Pope

ARGENTATION. n. f. [from argentum, Lat. silver.] An overlaying with silver.

ARGENTINE. adj. [from argentinus, Fr.] Sounding like silver.

ARGILLACEOUS. adj. [from argil, Lat.] Clayey; partaking of the nature of argil; consisting of argil, or potter's clay.

ARGILLOUS. adj. [from argil, Lat.] Consisting of clay; clayish; containing clay.
Albuquerque derives this redness from the sand and argillous earth at the bottom.

ARGOSY. n. f. [derived by Pope from Argo, the name of Jason's ship; supposed by others to be a vessel of Ragusa or Ragusa, a Ragazine, corrupted.] A large vessel for merchandize: a car-rack.

Your mind is tossing on the ocean;
There where your argosies with portly sail,
Like signiors and rich burghers on the flood,
Do overpeer the petty traffickers.

Shakespeare's Merchant of Venice.

TO ARGUE. v. a. [from arguo, Lat.]

1. To reason; to offer reasons.
I know your argosy has always in'd her
So dear in heart, not to deny her what
A woman of less of dear liberty by law;
Scholars allow'd argosy to argue for her.

Public argosy of argosy not only to exasperate
the mind, but to what the will of argosy.

An argosy of motion, not passing on, would perplexing one, who should argosy from such an idea. Locke

2. To persuade by argument.
It is a sort of practical logic, which I would make use of to argosy you into a protection of this play. Gang. Ded. to Old Batch.

3. To dispute; with the particles with or against before the opponent, and against before the thing opposed.

Why do Christians, of several persuasions, so fiercely argosy against the salvability of each other.

He that by often argosy against his own sense, imposes falsehoods on others, is not far from believing himself. Locke

I do not see how they can argosy with any one, without setting down strict boundaries. Locke

TO ARGUE. v. a.

1. To prove any thing by argument.

If the world's age and death be argued well,
By the sun's fall, which now towards earth doth bend,

Then we might fear that virtue, since she fell
So low as woman, should be near her end. Donne

2. To debate any question; as, to argue a cause.

3. To prove as an argument.
So many laws argue so many sins
Among them: how can God with such reside?

It argues distemper of the mind as well as of the body, when a man is continually tossing from one side to the other. South

This argues a virtue and disposition in those sides of the rays, which answers to that virtue and disposition of the chrystal. Newton's Opticks

4. To charge with, as a crime: with of.
I have pleaded guilty to all thoughts and expressions of mine, which can be truly argued of obscenity, profaneness, or immorality, and retract them. Dryden's Fables

The accidents are not the same, which would have argued him of a fervile copying, and total barrenness of invention; yet the seas were the same. Dryden's Fables

ARGUER. n. f. [from argue, Lat.] A reasoner; a disputer; a controvertist.

Men are ashamed to be profelytes to a weak arguer, as thinking they must part with their reputation as well as their sin. Decay of Piety

Neither good Christians nor good arguers.

ARGUMENT. n. f. [from argumentum, Lat.]

1. A reason alleged for or against any thing.
We sometimes see, on our theatres, vice rewarded, at least unpunished; yet it ought not to be an argument against the art. Dryden

When any thing is proved by as good arguments as that thing is capable of supposing it were; we ought not in reason to make any doubt of the existence of that thing. Tillotson

Our author's two great and only arguments to prove, that heirs are lords over their brethren.

2. The subject of any discourse or writing.
That he the who even but now was your best object,

Your praise's argument, balm of your age,
Dearest and best. Shakespeare's King Lear

To the height of this great argument
I may assert eternal providence,
And justify the ways of God to man. Milton

Sad task! yet argument
Not less, but more heroic than the wrath
Of stern Achilles. Milton

A much longer discourse my argument requires;
your merciful dispositions a much shorter.

3. The contents of any work summed up by way of abstract.

The argument of the work, that is, its principal action, the economy and disposition of it, are the things which distinguish copies from originals. Dryden

4. A controversy.
This day, in argument upon a case,
Some words there grew twixt Somerset and me.

An argument that fell out last night, where each of us fell in praise of our country mistresses.

If the idea be not agreed on betwixt the speaker and hearer, the argument is not about things, but names. Locke

5. It has sometimes the particle to before the thing to be proved, but generally for.

The best moral argument to patience, in my opinion, is the advantage of patience itself. Tillotson

This, before that revelation had enlightened the world, was the very best argument for a future state. Atterbury

6. [In astronomy.] An arch by which we seek another unknown arch, proportional to the first.

ARGUMENTAL. adj. [from argument, Lat.] Belonging to argument; reasoning.

Afflicted sense thou kindly dost set free,
Oppress'd with argumental tyranny,
And routed reason finds a safe retreat in thee.

ARGUMENTATION. n. f. [from argument, Lat.] Reasoning; the act of reasoning.

Argumentation is that operation of the mind, whereby we infer one proposition from two or more propositions premised. Or it is the drawing a conclusion, which before was unknown, or doubtful, from some propositions more known and evident; so when we have judged that matter cannot think, and that the mind of man doth think, we conclude, that therefore the mind of man is not matter. Watts's Logick

I suppose it is no ill topick of argumentation, to shew the prevalence of contempt, by the contrary influences of respect. South

His thoughts must be masculine, full of argumentation, and that sufficiently warm. Dryden

The whole course of his argumentation comes to nothing. Addison

ARGUMENTATIVE. adj. [from argument, Lat.]

1. Consisting of argument; containing argument.

This omission, considering the bounds within which the argumentative part of my discourse was confined, I could not avoid.

2. Sometimes with of, but rarely.
Another thing argumentative of providence is that pappous plumage growing upon the tops of some seeds, whereby they are wafted with the wind, and diffeminated far and wide. Ray

3. Applied to persons, disputatious; disposed to controversy.

ARGUTE. adj. [from argutus, Ital. argutus, Lat.]

1. Subtle; witty; sharp.

2. Shrill.

ARIA. n. f. [Ital. in musick.] An air, song, or tune.

ARMADA. n. f. [Span. a fleet of war.] An armament for sea; a fleet of war. It is often erroneously spelt armado.

In all the mid-earth seas was left no road Wherein the pagan his bold head untwines, Spred was the huge armada wide and broad, From Venice, Genes, and towns which them confines.

So by a roaring tempest on the flood, A whole armada of collected sail

Is scatter'd and disjoint'd from fellowship.

At length resolv'd t' assert the wat'ry ball, He in himself did whole armados bring:

Him aged seamen might their master call, And chose for general, were he not their king.

ARMADILLO. n. f. [Spanish.] A four-footed animal of Brasil, as big as a cat, with a snout like a hog, a tail like a lizard, and feet like a hedge-hog. He is armed all over with hard scales like armour, whence he takes his name, and retires under them like the tortoise. He lives in holes, or in the water, being of the amphibious kind. His scales are of a bony or cartilaginous substance; but they are easily pierced. This animal hides himself a third part of the year under ground. He feeds upon roots, fugar-canes, fruits, and poultry. When he is caught, he draws up his feet and head to his belly, and rolls himself up in a ball, which the strongest hand cannot open; and he must be brought near the fire before he will shew his nose. His flesh is white, fat, tender, and more delicate than that of a sucking pig.

ARMORER. n. f. [from armoir, Fr.]

1. He that makes armour, or weapons.

Now thrive the armorers, and honour's thought

Reigns solely in the breast of every man. Shaksp.

The armorers make their steel more tough and pliant, by a persion of water and juice of herbs.

The whole division that to Mars pertains,

All trades of death that deal in steel for gains,

Were there: The butcher, armorers, and smith,

Who forges sharpen'd fauchions, or the scythe.

When armers temper in the ford

The keen-edg'd pole-ax, or the shining sword,

The red hot metal hisses in the lake.

2. He that dresses another in armour.

The armorers accomplishing the knights,

With busy hammers closing rivets up,

Give dreadful note of preparation.

The morning he was to join battle with Harold, his armorers put on his backpiece before, and his breastplate behind.

ARMORY. n. f. [from armour.]

1. The place in which arms are repositied for use.

The sword

Of Michael, from the armory of God,

Was giv'n him temper'd so, that neither keen,

Nor solid might resist that edge.

With plain heroic magnitude of mind,

And celestial vigour arm'd,

Their armorers and magazines contemn.

Let a man consider these virtues, with the contrary fins, and then, as out of a full armory or magazine, let him furnish his conscience with texts of scripture.

2. Armour; arms of defence.

Celestial armory, shields, helms, and spears,

Hung high, with diamond flaming, and with gold.

2. Ensigns armorial.

Well worthy be you of that armory,

Wherein you have great glory won this day.

ARMOUR. n. f. [from armateur, Fr. armatura, Lat.]

Defensive arms.

Your friends are up, and buckle on their arm- our.

That they might not go naked among their enemies, the only armour that Christ allows them, is prudence and innocence.

Him Paris follow'd to the dire alarms.

Both breathing slaughter, both resolv'd in arms.

4. Action; the act of taking arms.

Up rose the victor angels, and to arms

The matin trumpet sung.

The seas and rocks and skies rebound,

To arms, to arms, to arms!

5. The ensigns armorial of a family.

ARMY. n. f. [from armée, Fr.]

1. A collection of armed men, obliged to obey one man.

Number itself importeth not much in armies,

where the people are of weak courage.

The meanest soldier, that has fought often in an army, has a truer knowledge of war, than he that has writ whole volumes, but never was in any battle.

The Tuscan leaders, and their army sing,

Which followed great Æneas to the war;

Their arms, their numbers, and their names declare.

2. A great number.

The fool hath planted in his memory an army of good words.

AROMATICAL. adj. [from aromatic.] Spicy;

fragrant; high scented.

All things that are hot and aromatic do preserve liquors or powders.

Volatile oils refresh the animal spirits, but likewise are endued with all the bad qualities of such substances, producing all the effects of an oily and aromatic acrimony.

AROMATICK. adj. [from aroma, Lat. spice.]

1. Spicy.

Amidst whole heaps of spices lights a ball,

And now their odours arm'd against them fly:

Some preciously by shatter'd porcelain fall,

And some by aromatic splinters die.

2. Fragrant; strong scented.

Or quick effluvia darting through the brain,

Die of a rose in aromatic pain.

AROMATICKS. n. f. Spices.

Mortimer's Husbandry.

ARRACK, OR ARACK. n. f. The word arack is an Indian name for strong waters of all kinds; for they call our spirits and brandy English arack. But what we understand by the name arack, is no other than a spirit procured by distillation from a vegetable juice called toddy, which flows by incision out of the cocoa-nut tree.

Chambers.

I send this to be better known for choice of china, tea, arack, and other Indian goods.

Spenser.

TO ARR'IGN. v. a. [arranger, Fr. to set in order.]

1. To set a thing in order, or in its place. One is said to arraign a writ in a county, that fits it for trial before the justices of the circuit. A prisoner is said to be arraigned, where he is indicted and brought forth to his trial.

Cowel.

Summon a session, that we may arraign

Our most disloyal lady; for as she hath

Been publicly accused, so shall she have

A just and open trial.

Shakespeare.

2. To accuse; to charge with faults in general, as in controversy, in a satire.

Reverse of nature! shall such copies then

Arraign th' originals of Maro's pen? Roscommon.

He that thinks a man to the ground, will quickly endeavour to lay him there: for while he despises him, he arraigns and condemns him in his heart.

South.

3. It has for before the fault.

My own enemies I shall never answer; and if your lordship has any, they will not arraign you for want of knowledge.

Dryden's Dedication to the Æneid.

ARRAYERS. n. f. [from array.] Officers who anciently had the care of seeing the soldiers duly appointed in their armour.

Cowel.

ARREAR. adv. [arriere, Fr. behind.] Behind. This is the primitive signification of the word, which, though not now in use, seems to be retained by Spenser. See REAR.

To leave with speed Atlanta swift arrear,

Through forests wild and unfrequented land,

To chase the lion, boar, or rugged bear.

Fairy Queen.

ARREAR. n. f. That which remains behind unpaid, though due. See ARREARAGE.

His boon is giv'n; his knight has gain'd the day,
But lost the prize; th' arrears are yet to pay.

Dryden.

If a tenant run away in arrear of some rent, the land remains; that cannot be carried away, or lost.

Locke.

It will comfort our grand-children, when they see a few rags hung up in Westminster-hall, which cost an hundred millions, whereof they are paying the arrears, and boasting, as beggars do, that their grandfathers were rich.

Swift.

ARREARAGE. n. f. a word now little used. [from arriere, Fr. behind.]

Arrearage is the remainder of an account, or a sum of money remaining in the hands of an accountant; or, more generally, any money unpaid at the due time, as arrearage of rent.

At length arriving on the banks of Nile, Worn with length of ways, and worn with toil, She laid her down. Dryden.

2. To reach any place by travelling.

When we were arrived upon the verge of his estate, we stopped at a little inn, to rest ourselves and our horses. Sidney.

3. To reach any point.

The bounds of all body we have no difficulty to arrive at; but when the mind is there, it finds nothing to hinder its progress. Locke.

4. To gain any thing, by progressive approach.

It is the highest wisdom by despising the world to arrive at heaven; they are blessed who converse with God. Taylor.

The virtuous may know in speculation, what they could never arrive at by practice, and avoid the snares of the crafty. Addison.

5. The thing at which we arrive is always supposed to be good.

6. To happen: with to before the person. This sense seems not proper.

Happy! to whom this glorious death arrives, More to be valued than a thousand lives. Waller.

To ARRO'DE. v. a. [arodo, Lat.] To gnaw or nibble. Dict.

ARSENAL. n. f. [arsenale, Ital.] A repository of things requisite to war; a magazine of military stores.

I would have a room for the old Roman instruments of war, where you might see all the ancient military furniture, as it might have been in an arsenal of old Rome. Addison.

ARSENICAL. adj. [from arsenick.] Containing arsenick; consisting of arsenick.

An hereditary consumption, or one engendered by arsenical fumes under ground, is incapable of cure. Harvey.

There are arsenical, or other like noxious minerals lodged underneath. Woodward.

ARSENICK. n. f. [arsenion.] A ponderous mineral substance, volatile and unflammable, which gives a whiteness to metals in fusion, and proves a violent corrosive poison; of which there are three sorts. Native or yellow arsenick, called also auripigmentum or orpiment, is chiefly found in copper mines. White or crystalline arsenick is extracted from the native kind, by subliming it with a proportion of sea salt; the smallest quantity of crystalline arsenick, being mixed with any metal, absolutely destroys its malleability; and a single grain will turn a pound of copper into a beautiful seeming silver, but without ductility. Red arsenick is a preparation of the white, made by adding to it a mineral sulphur. Chambers.

Arsenick is a very deadly poison; held to the fire it emits fumes, but liquates very little. Woodward on Fossils.

ART. n. f. [arte, Fr. ars, Lat.]

1. The power of doing something not taught by nature and instinct; as, to walk is natural, to dance is an art.

Art is properly an habitual knowledge of certain rules and maxims by which a man is governed and directed in his actions. South.

Blest with each grace of nature and of art. Pope.

Ev'n copious Dryden wanted, or forgot, The last and greatest art, the art to blot. Pope.

2. A science; as, the liberal arts.

Arts that respect the mind were ever reputed nobler than those that serve the body. Ben Jonson.

When did his pen on learning fix a brand, Or rail at arts he did not understand? Dryden.

3. A trade.

This observation is afforded us by the art of making sugar. Boyle.

4. Artfulness; skill; dexterity.

The art of our necessities is strange, That can make vile things precious. Shakespeare.

5. Cunning.

6. Speculation.

I have as much of this in art as you; But yet my nature could not bear it so. Shakespeare.

ARTERIAL. adj. [from artery.] That which relates to the artery; that which is contained in the artery.

Had not the Maker wrought the springy frame, The blood, defrauded of its nitrous food, Had cool'd and languish'd in the arterial road. Blackmore.

As this mixture of blood and chyle passeth through the arterial tube, it is pressed by two contrary forces; that of the heart driving it forward against the sides of the tube, and the elastic force of the air, pressing it on the opposite sides of those air-bladders; along the surface of which this arterial tube creeps. Arbutnot.

ARTERIO-TOMY. n. f. [from arteria, and tomy to cut.] The operation of letting blood from the artery: a practice much in use among the French.

ARTERY. n. f. [arteria, Lat.] An artery is a conical canal, conveying the blood from the heart to all parts of the body. Each artery is composed of three coats; of which the first seems to be a thread of fine blood vessels and nerves, for nourishing the coats of the artery; the second is made up of circular, or rather spiral fibres, of which there are more or fewer strata, according to the bigness bigness of the artery. These fibres have a strong elasticity, by which they contract themselves with some force, when the power by which they have been stretched out ceases. The third and innermost coat is a fine transparent membrane, which keeps the blood within its canal, that otherwise, upon the dilatation of an artery, would easily separate the spiral fibres from one another. As the arteries grow smaller, these coats grow thinner, and the coats of the veins seem only to be continuations of the capillary arteries. Quincy.

The arteries are elastic tubes, endued with a contractile force, by which they drive the blood full forward; it being hindered from going backward by the valves of the heart. Arbutnot.

ARTFUL. adj. [from art and full.]

1. Performed with art.

The last of these was certainly the most easy, but, for the same reason, the least artful. Dryden.

2. Artificial; not natural.

3. Cunning; skilful; dexterous.

O still the same, Ulysses, the rejoic'd,
Artful in speech, in action, and in mind. Pope.

ARTFULLY. adv. [from artful.] With art; skilfully; dexterously.

The rest in rank: Honoria chief in place,
Was artfully contrived to set her face,
To front the thicket, and behold the chace. Dryden.

Vice is the natural growth of our corruption. It will irresistibly must it prevail, when the seeds of it are artfully sown, and industriously cultivated. Rogers.

ARTFULNESS. n. f. [from artful.]

1. Skill.

Consider with how much artfulness his bulk and situation is contrived, to have just matter to draw round him these massy bodies. Cheyne.

2. Cunning.

ARTHRITIC. } adj. [from arthritia.]

ARTHRITICK. }

1. Gouty; relating to the gout.

Frequent changes produce all the arthritic diseases. Arbutnot.

2. Relating to joints.

Serpents, worms, and leaches, though some want bones, and all extended articulations, yet have they arthritic analogies; and, by the motion of fibrous and muscular parts, are able to make progression. Brown's Vulgar Err.

ARTHRITIS. n. f. [ἀρθριτις, from ἄρθρον, a joint.] Any distemper that affects the joints, but the gout particularly. Quincy.

ARTICHOKE. n. f. [artichaut, Fr.]

This plant is very like the thistle, but hath large scaly heads shaped like the cone of the pine tree; the bottom of each scale, as also at the bottom of the florets, is a thick fleshy eatable substance. Miller.

No herbs have curled leaves, but cabbage and cabbage lettuce; none have double leaves, one belonging to the stalk, another to the fruit or seed, but the artichoke. Bacon.

Artichokes contain a rich, nutritious, stimulating juice. Arbutnot on Aliments.

ARTICHOKE of Jerusalem. A species of sunflower.

ARTICK. adj. [It should be written artick, from ἀρκτικός.] Northern; under the bear. See ARCTICK.

But they would have winters like those beyond the artick circle; for the sun would be 80 degrees from them. Brown.

In the following example it is, contrary to custom, spelt after the French manner, and accented on the last syllable.

To you who live in chill degree,
As map informs of fifty-three,
And do not much for cold atone,
By bringing thither fifty-one,
Methinks all climes should be alike,
From tropick e'en to pole artique. Dryden.

ARTICLE. n. f. [articulus, Lat.]

1. A part of speech, as, the, an; the man,

ART

2. A single clause of an account; a particular part of any complex thing.

Laws touching matters of order are changeable by the power of the church; articles concerning doctrine not so. Hooker.

Have the summary of all our griefs,
When time shall serve to shew in articles. Shakespeare.

Many believe the article of remission of sins, but believe it without the condition of repentance. We believe the article otherwise than God intended it. Taylor's Holy Living.

All the precepts, promises, and threatenings of the gospel will rise up in judgment against us; and the articles of our faith will be for many articles of accusation; and the great weight of our charge will be this, That we did not obey the gospel which we professed to believe; that we made confession of the christian faith, but lived like heathens. Tillotson.

You have small reason to repine upon that article of life. Swift.

3. Terms; stipulations.

I embrace these conditions; let us have articles between us. Shakespeare.

It would have gall'd his furlly nature,

Which easily endures not article,

Tying him to aught. Shakespeare.

4. Point of time; exact time.

If Cansfield had not, in that article of time, given them that brisk charge, by which other troops were ready, the king himself had been in danger. Clarendon.

TO ARTICLE. v. n. [from the noun article.] To stipulate; to make terms.

Such in love's warfare is my case,

I may not article for grace,
Having put love at last to show this face. Donne.

He had not infringed the least title of what was articled, that they aimed at one mark, and their ends were concentrick. Howell's Vocal Forest.

If it be said, God chose the successor, that is manifestly not so in the story of Jephtha, where he articled with the people, and they made him judge over him. Locke.

TO ARTICLE. v. a. To draw up in particular articles.

He, whose life seems fair, yet if all his errors and follies were articled against him, the man would seem vicious and miserable. Taylor's Rule of living holy.

ARTICULAR. adj. [articulus, Lat.] Belonging to the joints. In medicine, an epithet applied to a disease, which more immediately affects the joints. Thus the gout is called morbus articularis.

ARTICULATE. adj. [from articulus, Lat.]

1. Distinct; divided; as the parts of a limb are divided by joints; not continued in one tone, as articulate sounds; that is, sounds varied and changed at proper pauses, in opposition to the voice of animals, which admit no such variety. An articulate pronunciation, a manner of speaking clear and distinct, in which one sound is not confounded with another.

In speaking under water, when the voice is reduced to an extreme exility, yet the articulate sounds, the words, are not confounded. Bacon.

The first, at least, of these I thought deny'd
To beasts; whom God, on their creation-day, Created mute to all articulate sound. Milton.

Antiquity expressed numbers by the fingers on either hand. On the left, they accounted their digits and articulate numbers unto an hundred; on the right hand, hundreds and thousands. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

2. Branched out into articles. This is a meaning little in use.

Henry's instructions were extreme curious and articulate; and, in them, more articles touching inquisition, than negotiation: requiring an answer in distinct articles to his questions. Bacon.

TO ARTICULATE. v. a. [from article.]

1. To form words; to utter distinct syllables; to speak as a man.

ART

The dogmatist knows not by what art he directs his tongue, in articulating sounds into voices. Glauvill.

They would advance in knowledge, and not deceive themselves with a little articulated air. Locke.

2. To draw up in articles.

These things, indeed, you have articulated,
Proclaim'd at market-crosses, read in churches;
To face the garment of rebellion
With some fine colour. Shakespeare.

3. To make terms; to treat. These two latter significations are unusual.

Send us to Rome

The best, with whom we may articulate
For their own good and ours. Shakespeare.

TO ARTICULATE. v. n. To speak distinctly.

ARTICULATLY. adv. [from articulate.] In an articulate voice.

Madam, were I as you, I'd take her counsel; I'd speak my own distress. A. Philips. Distressed Mother.

5. Under a particular consideration; with a particular respect.

Besides that law which concerneth men as men, and that which belongs unto men as they are men, linked with others in some society; there is a third which touches all several bodies politick, so far forth as one of them hath public concerns with another. Hooker's Ecclesiastical Polity.

Dar'st thou be as good as thy word now?—Why, Hal, thou knowest, as thou art but a man, I dare; but as thou art a prince, I fear thee, as I fear the roaring of the lion's whelp. Shakesp. Henry IV.

The objections that are raised against it as a tragedy, are as follow.

Gay's Pref. to What d'ye call it.

6. Like; of the same kind with.

A simple idea is one uniform idea, as sweet, bitter. Watts.

7. In the same degree with.

Where you, unless you are as matter blind, Conduct and beauteous disposition find. Blackmore.

Well hast thou spoke, the blue-eyed maid replies.

Thou good old man, benevolent as wife. Pope's Odyssey.

8. As if; according to the manner that would be if.

The squire began nigher to approach,

And wind his horn under the castle-wall, That with the noise it thook as it would fall. Fairy Queen.

They all contended to creep into his humour, and to do that, as of themselves, which they conceived he desired they should do. Hayward.

Contented in a nest of snow He lies, as he his bliss did know,

And to the wood no more would go. Waller.

So hot the assault, so high the tumult rose, As all the Dardan and Argolick race

Had been contracted in that narrow space. Dryden.

Can misery no place of safety know, The noise pursues me whereof'er I go,

As fate fought only me. Dryden's Aurengzebe.

9. According to what.

Who then is Paul, and who is Apollos, but ministers by whom ye believed, even as the Lord gave to every man. 1 Cor.

Their figure being printed, As just before, I think, I hinted,

Alma inform'd can try the case. Prior.

The republic is shut up in the great duke's dominions, who at present is very much incensed against it. The occasion is as follows. Addison on Italy.

10. As it were; in some sort.

As for the daughters of king Edward IV. they thought king Richard had said enough for them; and took them to be but as of the king's party, because they were in his power, and at his disposal. Bacon's Henry VII.

11. While at the same time that.

At either end, it whistled as it flew, And as the brands were green, so dropp'd the dew; Infected as it fell with sweat of sanguine hue. Dryden.

These haughty words Aleto's rage provoke, And frighted Turnus trembled as the spoke. Dryden.

So the pure limpid stream, when foul with stains

Of rushing torrents, and descending rains, Works itself clear, and as it runs refines. Addison's Cato.

12. Because.

He that commanded the injury to be done, is first bound; then he that did it; and they also are obliged who did so assist, as without them the thing could not have been done. Taylor.

13. Because it is, because they are.

The kernels draw out of the earth juice fit to nourish the tree, as those that would be trees themselves. Bacon.

14. Equally.

Before the place A hundred doors a hundred entries grace;

As many voices issue, and the sound Of Sybil's word as many times rebound. Dryden.

15. How; in what manner.

Men are generally permitted to publish books, and contradict others, and even themselves, as they please, with as little danger of being confuted, as of being understood. Boyle.

16. With; answering to like or same.

Sister, well met; whither away so fast?—Upon the like devotion as yourselves, To gratulate the gentle princes there. Shakesp. Rich. III.

17. In a reciprocal sense, answering to as.

Every offence committed in the state of nature, may, in the state of nature, be also punished, and as far forth as it may in a commonwealth. Locke.

As sure as it is good, that human nature should exist; so certain it is, that the circular revolutions of the earth and planets, rather than other motions which might as possibly have been, do declare God. Bentley.

18. Going before as, in a comparative sense; the first as being sometimes understood.

Sempronius is as brave a man as Cato. Addison.

Bright as the sun, and like the morning fair. Granville.

19. Answering to sub.

Vol. I. No. 4. O 15

Is it not every man's interest, that there should be such a governor of the world as designs our happiness, as would govern us for our advantage? Tillotson

20. Having so to answer it; in a conditional sense.

As far as they carry light and conviction to any other man's understanding, so far, I hope, my labour may be of use to him. Locke

21. So is sometimes understood. As in my speculations I have endeavoured to extinguish passion and prejudice, I am still desirous of doing some good in this particular. Spektor

22. Answering to so conditionally. So may th' auspicious queen of love, To thee, O sacred ship, be kind; As thou to whom the muse commends, The best of poets and of friends, Dost thy committed pledge restore. Dryden

23. Before how it is sometimes redundant; but this is in low language. As how, dear Syphax? Addison's Cato

24. It seems to be redundant before yet; to this time. Though that war continued nine years, and this hath as yet lasted but six, yet there hath been much more action in the present war. Addison

25. In a sense of comparison, followed by so. As when a dab-chick waddles through the copse On feet and wings, and flies, and wades, and hops; So lab'ring on, with shoulders, hands, and head, Wide as a windmill all his figure spread. Pope

26. As for; with respect to. As for the rest of those who have written against me, they deserve not the least notice. Dryden's Fables, Preface

27. As if; in the same manner that it would be if. Answering their questions, as if it were a matter that needed it. Locke

28. As to; with respect to. I pray thee, speak to me as to thy thoughts, As thou dost ruminate; and give thy worst of thoughts

The worst of words Shakespeare, Othello

They pretend, in general, to great refinements, as to what regards Christianity. Addison on Italy

I was mistaken as to the day, placing that accident about thirty-six hours sooner than it happened. Swift

29. As well as; equally with. Each man's mind has some peculiarity, as well as his face, that distinguishes him from all others. Locke

It is adorned with admirable pieces of sculpture, as well modern as ancient. Addison on Italy

30. As though; as if. These should be at first gently treated, as though we expected an imposition. Sharp's Surgery

ASA DULCIS. See BENZOIN.

ASA FOETIDA. n. f. A gum or resin brought from the East Indies, of a sharp taste, and a strong offensive smell; which is said to distil during the heat of summer, from a little shrub. Chambers

ASARABACCA. n. f. [asarum, Lat.] The name of a plant.

It was a rock Conspicuous far; winding with one ascent Accessible from earth, one entrance high. Milton

3. An eminence, or high place. No land like Italy erects the fight, By such a vast ascent, or swells to such a height. Addison

A wide flat cannot be pleasant in the Elysiac fields, unless it be diversified with depressed valleys and swelling ascents. Bentley

TO ASCERTAIN. v. a. [ascertener, Fr.]

1. To make certain; to fix; to establish. The divine law both ascertaineth the truth, and supplieth unto us the want of other laws. Hooker

Money differs from uncoined silver in this, that the quantity of silver in each piece is ascertained by the stamp. Locke

2. To make confident; to take away doubt: often with of. Right judgment of myself, may give me the other certainty, that is, ascertain me that I am in the number of God's children. Hammond's Practical Catechism

This makes us act with a repose of mind and wonderful tranquility, because it ascertains us of the goodness of our work. Dryden's Duſſy

ASCERTAINER. n. f. [from ascertain.] The person that proves or establishes.

ASCERTAINMENT. n. f. [from ascertain.] A settled rule; an established standard. For want of ascertainment, how far a writer may express his good wishes for his country, innocent intentions may be charged with crimes. Swift to Lord Middleton

ASCETICK. adj. [ἀσκητικός.] Employed wholly in exercises of devotion and mortification. None lived such long lives as monks and hermits, sequestered from plenty to a constant ascetick course of the severest abstinence and devotion. South

ASCETICK. n. f. he that retires to devotion and mortification; a hermit. I am far from commending those asceticks, that, out of a pretence of keeping themselves unspotted from the world, take up their quarters in deserts. Norris

He that preaches to man, should understand what is in man; and that skill can scarce be attained by an ascetick in his solitudes. Atterbury

ASCIL. n. f. It has no singular. [from a, without, and scil, a shadow.] Those people who, at certain times of the year, have no shadow at noon; such are the inhabitants of the torrid zone, because they have the sun twice a-year vertical to them. Diſt.

ASCITES. n. f. [from ἀσцитῆς, a bladder.] A particular species of dropsy; a swelling of the lower belly and depending parts, from an extravasation and collection of water broke out of its proper vessels. This case, when certain and inveterate, is universally allowed to admit of no cure but by means of the manual operation of tapping. Quincy

There

There are two kinds of dropsy, the anasarca, called also leucophlegmacy, when the extravasated matter swims in the cells of the membrana adiposa; and the ascites, when the water possesses the cavity of the abdomen. Sharp's Surgery.

I am fearful : wherefore frowns he thus ?
'Tis his aspect of terror. All's not well.
Shakespeare.
Yet had his aspect nothing of severe,
But such a face as promis'd him sincere. Dryden.
Then shall thy Craggs (and let me call him mine)
On the cast ore another Pollio shine ;
With aspect open shall erect his head. Pope.
3. Glance ; view ; act of beholding.
Fairer than fairest, in his faining eye,
Whose sole aspect he counts felicity. Spenser.
When an envious or an amorous aspect doth infect the spirits of another, there is joined both affection and imagination. Bacon's Natural History.
4. Direction towards any point ; view ; position.
The setting sun
Slowly descended ; and with right aspect
Against the eastern gate of paradise,
Levell'd his evening rays. Paradise Lost.
I have built a strong wall, faced to the south aspect with brick. Swift.
5. Disposition of any thing to something else ;
relation.
The light got from the opposite arguings of men of parts, shewing the different sides of things, and their various aspects and probabilities, would be quite lost, if every one were obliged to say after the speaker. Locke.
6. Disposition of a planet to other planets.
There's some ill planet reigns :
I must be patient till the heavens look
With an aspect more favourable.
Shakespeare's Winter's Tale.
Not unlike that which astrologers call a conjunction of planets, of no very benign aspect the one to the other. Wotton.
To the blank moon
Her office they preferrib'd : to th' other five
Their planetary motions, and aspects,
In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite.
Paradise Lost.
Why does not every single star shed a separate influence, and have aspects with other stars of their own constellation ? Bowly's Sermon.
To ASPECT. v. a. [aspicio, Lat.] To behold ;

And singly mad, asperse the sov'reign reign. Pope.
Unjustly poets we asperse,
Truth shines the brighter clad in verse. Swift.
ASPERSION. n. f. [aspersio, Lat.]
1. A sprinkling.
If thou dost break her virgin knot before
All sanctimonious ceremonies,
No sweet aspersions shall the heav'n's let fall,
To make this contract grow. Shakespeare.
It exhibits a mixture of new conceits and old,
whereas the instauration gives the new unmixed, otherwise than with some little aspersions of the old,
for taste's sake. Bacon.
2. Calumny ; censure.
The same aspersions of the king, and the same grounds of a rebellion. Dryden.
ASPHALTICK. adj. [from asphaltos.] Gummy ;
bituminous.
And with asphaltick slime, broad as the gate,
Deep to the roots of hell, the gathered beach
They fasten'd. Milton.
ASPHALTOS. n. f. [asphaltos, bitumen.] A solid, brittle, black, bituminous, inflammable substance, resembling pitch, and chiefly found swimming on the surface of the Lacus Asphaltites, or Dead Sea, where anciently stood the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah. It is cast up in the nature of liquid pitch, from the bottom of this sea ; and, being

being thrown upon the water, swims like other fat bodies, and condenses gradually.

ASPHALTUM. n. f. [Lat.] A bituminous stone found near the ancient Babylon, and lately in the province of Neuchâtel; which, mixed with other matters, makes an excellent cement, incorruptible by air, and impenetrable by water; supposed to be the mortar so much celebrated among the ancients, with which the walls of Babylon were laid. Chambers.

ASPHODEL. n. f. [hilio-asphodelus, Lat.] Day-lily.

Asphodels were by the ancients planted near burying-places, in order to supply the manes of the dead with nourishment.

By those happy souls who dwell
In yellow meads of asphodel. Pope.

ASPICK. n. f. [See ASP] the name of a serpent.

Why did I 'scape th' invenom'd aspick's rage,
And all the fiery monsters of the desert,
To see this day? Addison.

'Tis he; I ken the manner of his gate;
He rises on his toe: that spirit of his
In aspiration lifts him from the earth. Shakespeare.

3. The pronunciation of a vowel with full breath.

It is only a guttural aspiration, i. e. a more forcible impulse of the breath from the lungs. Hold.

TO ASPIRE. v. n. [aspiro, Lat.]

1. To desire with eagerness; to pant after something higher: sometimes with the particle to.

Most excellent lady, no expectation in others, nor hope in himself, could aspire to a higher mark, than to be thought worthy to be praised by you. Sidney.

His father's grave counsellors, by whose means he had aspired to the kingdom, he cruelly tortured. Knolls.

Hence springs that universal strong desire,
Which all men have of immortality:
Not some few spirits unto this thought aspire,
But all men's minds in this united be. Davies.

Horace did ne'er aspire to epic bays:
Nor lofty Maro stoop to lyric lays. Roscommon.

'Till then a helpless, hopeless, homely swain;
I sought not freedom, nor aspir'd to gain, Dryd.

Aspiring to be gods, if angels fell,
Aspiring to be angels, men rebel. Pope.

2. Sometimes with after.

Those are raised above sense, and aspire after immortality, who believe the perpetual duration of their souls. Tillotson.

There is none of us but who would be thought, throughout the whole course of his life, to aspire after immortality. Auerbury.

3. To rise; to tower.

There is betwixt that smile we would aspire to,
That sweet aspect of princes and our ruin,
More pangs and fears than war or women have. Shakespeare.

My own breath still foment the fire,
Which flames as high as fancy can aspire. Waller.

ASPIRER. n. f. [from aspire.] One that ambitiously strives to be greater than he is.

They ween'd
To win the mount of God; and on his throne,
To set the envious of his state, the proud
Aspirer: but their thoughts prov'd fond and vain. Milton.

ASPORTATION. n. f. [asportatio, Lat.] A carrying away.

ASQUINT. adv. [from a and squint.] Obliquely; not in the straight line of vision.

A single guide may direct the way better than five hundred who have contrary views, or look asquint, or flout their eyes. Swift.

ASS, n. f. [asinus, Lat.]

1. An animal of burden, remarkable for sluggishness, patience, hardness, coarseness of food, and long life.

You have among you many a purchas'd slave,
Which, like your asses, and your dogs and mules,
You use in abject and in slavish part,
Because you bought them. Shakespeare.

2. A stupid, heavy, dull fellow; a dolt.

I do begin to perceive that I am made an ass. Shakespeare.

That such a crafty mother
Should yield the world to this ass!—a woman that
Bears all down with her brain; and yet her son
Cannot take two from twenty for his heart,
And leave eighteen. Shakespeare.

TO ASSAULT. v. a. [assail, Fr.]

1. To attack in a hostile manner; to assault; to fall upon; to invade.

So when he saw his flatt'ring arts to fail,
With greedy force he 'gan the fort t' assail. Fairy Queen.

My gracious lord, here in the parliament
Let us assail the family of York. Shakespeare.

She will not stay the siege of loving terms,
Nor bide th' encounter of assailing eyes. Shakespeare.

How have I fear'd your fate! but fear'd it most,
When love assail'd you on the Libyan coast. Dryd.

All books he reads, and all he reads assails,
From Dryden's Fables down to D—y's Tales. Pope.

In vain Thales' wife with reproach assails;
For who can move when fair Belinda fails? Pope.

ASSAULTABLE. adj. [from assail.] That which may be attacked.

Banquo and his Fleance, lives.—
—But in them nature's copy's not eternal.—
—There's comfort yet, they are assailable. Shakespeare.

ASSAILANT. n. f. [assailant, Fr.] He that attacks in opposition to a defendant.

The same was so well encountered by the defendants, that the obtinacy of the assailants did but increase the loss. Hayward.

I'll put myself in poor and mean attire,
And with a kind of umber smirch my face,
The like do you: so shall we pass along,
And never stir assailants. Shakespeare.

ASSAILANT. adj. Attacking; invading.

And as evening dragon came,
Assailant on the perched roofs
Of tame villatick fowl. Milton.

ASSART. n. f. [assart, from assirter, Fr.] To clear away wood in a forest. An offence committed in the forest, by plucking up those woods by the roots, that are thickets or coverts of the forest, and by making them as plain as arable land. Corwel.

TO ASSART. v. a. [assartir, Fr.] To commit an assault. See ASSART.

ASSASSIN. n. f. [assassin, Fr.] A word brought originally from Asis, where about the time of the holy war, there was a set of men called assassins, as is supposed for asside, who killed any man, without regard to danger, at the command of their chief. A murderer; one that kills by treachery, or sudden violence.

In the very moment as the knight withdrew from the duke, this assassinate gave him, with a back blow, a deep wound into his left side. Watson.

The Syrian king, who, to surprize
One man, assassin like, had levied war,
War unproclaim'd, Milton.

The old king is just murdered, and the person that did it is unknown.

Let the soldiers seize him for one of the assassinates, and let me alone to accuse him afterwards. Dryden.

Here hir'd assassins for their gain invade,
And treach'rous pois'ners urge their fatal trade. Greech.

When she hears of a murder, she enlarges more on the guilt of the suffering person, than of the assassin. Addison.

Orestes brandish'd the revenging sword,
Slew the dire pair, and gave to fun'ral flame
The vile assassin, and adult'rous dame. Pope.

Useful, we grant, it serves what life requires,
But dreadful too, the dark assassin hires. Pope.

ASSASSINATE. n. f. [from assassin.] The crime of an assassin; murder.

Were not all assassinates and popular insurrections wrongfully chastised, if the meanness of the offenders indemnified them from punishment? Pope.

TO ASSASSINATE. v. a. [from assassin.]

1. To murder by violence.

Help, neighbours, my house is broke open by force, and I am ravished, and like to be assassinated. Dryden.

What could provoke thy madness
To assassinate so great, so brave a man. Philips.

2. To way-lay; to take by treachery. This meaning is perhaps peculiar to Milton.

Such usage as your honourable lords
Afford me, assassinated and betray'd,
Who durst not with your whole united pow'rs,
In fight withstand one single and unarmed. Milt.

ASSASSINATION. n. f. [from assassin.] The act of assassinating; murder by violence.

It were done quickly, if th' assassination
Could trammel up the consequence. Shakespeare.

The duke finish'd his course by a wicked assassination. Clarendon.

ASSASSINATOR. n. f. [from assassin.] Murderer; mankiller; the person that kills another by violence.

ASSAULT. n. f. [assaut, roasted, Lat.] Roasting.

The egg expiring less in the elixation or boiling; whereas, in the assault or roasting, it will sometimes abate a drachm. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ASSAULT. n. f. [assault, French.]

1. Attack; hostile onset: opposed to defence.

Her spirit had been invincible against all assaults of affection. Shakespeare.

Not to be shook thyself, but all assaults,
Baffling, like thy hoar cliffs the loud sea wave. Thomson.

2. Storm: opposed to sup or siège.

Jason took at least a thousand men, and suddenly made an assault upon the city. 2 Mac. v. 5.

After some days siege, he resolved to try the fortune of an assault: he succeeded therein so far, that he had taken the principal tower and fort. Bacon.

3. Hostile violence.

Themselves at discord fell,
And cruel combat join'd in middle space,
With horrible assault and fury fell. Fairy Queen.

4. Invasion; hostility; attack.

After some unhappy assaults upon the prerogative by the parliament, which produced its dissolution, there followed a compromise. Clarendon.

Theories built upon narrow foundations, are very hard to be supported against the assaults of opposition. Locke.

5. In

3. In law. A violent kind of injury offered to a man's person. It may be committed by offering of a blow, or by a fearful speech. Corvel.

6. It has upon before the thing assaulted. To ASSAULT. v. a. [from the noun.] To attack; to invade; to fall upon with violence.

The king granted the Jews to gather themselves together, and to stand for their life, to destroy all the power that would assault them. Eph. viii. 11.

Before the gates the cries of babes new-born, Whom fate had from their tender mothers torn, Assault his ears. Dryd.

New cursed steel, and more accursed gold, Gave mischief birth, and made that mischief bold: And double death did wretched man invade, By steel assaulted, and by gold betray'd. Dryden.

ASSAULTER. n. f. [from assault.] One who violently assaults another.

Neither liking their eloquence, nor fearing their might, we esteemed few swords in a just defence, able to resist many unjust assaulters. Sidney.

ASSAY. n. f. [assay, Fr. from which the ancient writers borrowed assay, according to the sound, and the latter, assay, according to the writing: but the senses now differing, they may be considered as two words.]

1. Examination; trial. This cannot be, By no assay of reason. 'Tis a pageant, To keep us in false gaze. Shakespeare.

2. In law. The examination of measures and weights used by the clerk of the market. Corvel.

3. The first entrance upon any thing; a taste for trial. For well he weened, that so glorious bait Would tempt his guest to take thereof assay. Fairy Queen.

4. Trial by danger or distress; difficulty; hardship. She heard with patience all unto the end, And strove to master sorrowful assay. Fairy Queen.

The men he prest but late, To hard assays unfit, unsure at need, Yet arm'd to point in well attempted plate. Fairf.

Be sure to find, What I foretel thee, many a hard assay Of dangers, and adversities, and pains, Ere thou of Israel's sceptre get fast hold. Milton.

To ASSAY. v. a. [assayer, Fr.]

1. To make trial of; to make experiment of. One that to bounty never cast his mind, Ne thought of honour ever did assay His baster breath. Spenser.

Gray and Bryan obtained leave of the general a little to assay them; and so with some horsemen charged them home. Hayward.

What unweighed behaviour hath this drunkard picked out of my conversation, that he dares in this manner assay me? Shakespeare.

2. To apply to, as the touchstone in assaying metals. Whom thus afflicted, when sad Eve beheld, Desolate where she sat, approaching nigh, Soft words to his fierce passion she assay'd. Milt.

2. To try; to endeavour. David girded his sword upon his armour, and he assayed to go, for he had not proved it. 1 Sam. xvii. 39.

ASSAYER. n. f. [from assay.] An officer of the mint, for the due trial of silver, appointed between the master of the mint and the merchants that bring silver thither for exchange. Corvel.

The smelters came up to the assayers within one in twenty. Woodward on Fossils.

ASSOCIATION. n. f. [associatio, Lat.] Attendance or waiting upon. Dix.

ASSOCIATION. n. f. [from associor, association, to obtain.] Acquisition; the act of obtaining. By the canon law, a person, after he has been in full possession of a second benefice, cannot return again to his first; because it is immediately void by his association of a second. Ashe's Par.

ASSOCIATION. n. f. [association, Fr.]

1. A collection; a number of individuals brought together. It differs from assembly, by being applied only, or chiefly, to things; assembly being used only, or generally, of persons.

All that we amass together in our thoughts is positive, and the assemblage of a great number of positive ideas of space or duration. Locke.

2. The state of being assembled. O Hartford, fitted or to shine in courts With unaffected grace, or walk the plains, With innocence and meditation join'd In soft assemblage, listen to my song! Thomson.

To ASSEMBLE. v. a. [assembler, Fr.] To bring together into one place. It is used both of persons and things. And he shall set up an ensign for the nations, and shall assemble the outcasts of Israel, and gather together the dispersed of Judah. Is. lii. 12.

He wonders for what end you have assembled Such troops of citizens to come to him. Shakespeare.

To ASSEMBLE. v. n. To meet together. These men assembled, and found Daniel praying. Daniel.

ASSEMBLY. n. f. [assemblee, Fr.] A company met together. They had heard, by fame, Of this so noble, and so fair assembly, This night to meet here. Shakespeare.

ASSENT. n. f. [assensus, Lat.]

1. The act of agreeing to any thing. Without the king's assent or knowledge, You wrought to be a legate. Shakespeare's Henry VIII.

Faith is the assent to any proposition, not thus made out by the deduction of reason, but upon the credit of the proposer. Locke.

All the arguments on both sides must be laid in balance, and, upon the whole, the understanding determine its assent. Locke.

2. Consent; agreement. To urge any thing upon the church, requiring thereunto that religious assent of christian belief, wherewith the words of the holy prophets are received, and not to shew it in scripture; this did the Fathers evermore think unlawful, impious, and execrable. Hooker.

The evidence of God's own testimony, added unto the natural assent of reason concerning the certainty of them, doth not a little comfort and confirm the same. Hooker.

To ASSENT. v. n. [assentire, Lat.] To concede; to yield to, or agree to. And the Jews also assented, saying, that these things were so. Acts, xxiv. 9.

ASSENTATION. n. f. [assentatio, Lat.] Compliance with the opinion of another out of flattery or dissimulation. Dix.

ASSENTMENT. n. f. [from assent.] Consent. Their arguments are but precarious, and subsist upon the charity of our assentments. Brown's Vul. Er.

To ASSERT. v. a. [asserere, Lat.]

1. To maintain; to defend either by words or actions. Your forefathers have asserted the party which they chose till death, and died for its defence. Dryden.

2. To affirm; to declare positive. 3. To claim; to vindicate a title to. Nor can the groveling mind, In the dark dungeon of the limbs confin'd, Assert the native skies, or own its heav'nly kind. Dryden.

ASSERTION. n. f. [from assert.] The act of asserting. If any affirm the earth doth move, and will not believe with us it standeth still; because he hath probable reasons for it, and I no infallible sense or reason against it, I will not quarrel with his assertion. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

ASSERTIVE. adj. [from assert.] Positive; dogmatical; peremptory. He was not so fond of the principles he undertook to illustrate, as to boast their certainty; proposing them not in a confident and assertive form, but as probabilities and hypotheses. Glanville.

ASSERTOR. n. f. [from assert.] Maintainer; vindicator; supporter; affirmer.

Among th' assertors of free reason's claim, Our nation's not the least in worth or fame. Dryden.

Faithful assertor of thy country's cause, Britain with tears shall bathe thy glorious wound. Prior.

It is an usual piece of art to undermine the authority of fundamental truths, by pretending to shew how weak the proofs are, which their assertors employ in defence of them. Antony.

To ASSEVER. v. a. [asserere, Lat.] To serve, help, or second. To ASSESS. v. a. [from assessare, Ital.] To make an equilibrium, or balance. To charge with any certain sum. Before the receipt of them in this office, they were assessed by the affidavit from the time of the inquisition found. Bacon.

ASSESSOR. n. f. [assessor, Lat.] A sitting down by one, to give assistance or advice. Dix.

ASSESSMENT. n. f. [from to assess.]

1. The sum levied on certain property. 2. The act of assessing. What greater immunity and happiness can there be to a people, than to be liable to no laws, but what they make themselves? To be subject to no contribution, assessment, or any pecuniary levy whatsoever, but what they vote, and voluntarily yield unto themselves? Howel.

ASSESSOR. n. f. [assessor, Lat.]

1. The person that sits by another; generally used of those who assist the judge. Minos, the strict inquisitor, appears; And lives and crimes, with his assessor, hears. Round in his urn the blended balls he rowls, Absolves the just, and dooms the guilty souls. Dryden.

2. He that sits by another as next in dignity. To his Son, Th' assessor of his throne, he thus began. Milton.

Twice stronger than his fire, who sat above, Assessor to the throne of thund'ring Jove. Dryden.

3. He that lays taxes; derived from assess. ASSETS. n. f. without the singular. [asset, Fr.] Goods sufficient to discharge that burden, which is cast upon the executor or heir, in satisfying the testators or ancestors debts or legacies. Whoever pleads assets, sayeth nothing; but that the person against whom he pleads, hath enough come to his hands, to discharge what is in demand. Corvel.

To ASSEVER. v. a. [asserere, Lat.] To To ASSEVERATE. v. a. [asserere, Lat.] To affirm with great solemnity, as upon oath. ASSEVERATION. n. f. [from asserere.] Solemn affirmation, as upon oath. That which you are persuaded of, ye have it no otherwise than by your own only probable collection; and therefore such bold asseverations, as in him were admirable, should, in your mouths, but argue rashness. Hooker.

Another abuse of the tongue I might add; vehement asseverations upon slight and trivial occasions. Ray on the Creation.

The repetition gives a greater emphasis to the words, and agrees better with the vehemence of the speaker in making his asseveration. Brown's Notes on the Odyssey.

ASSEHEAD. n. f. [from ass and head.] One slow of apprehension; a blockhead. Will you help an assehead, and a cockcomb, and a knave, a thin-faced knave, a gull? Shakespeare's Hamlet.

ASSIDUITY. n. f. [assiduité, Fr. assiduitas, Lat.] Diligence; closeness of application. I have, with much pains and assiduity, qualified myself for a nomenclator. Addison.

Can he, who has undertaken this, want conviction of the necessity of his utmost vigour and assiduity to acquit himself of it? Rogers.

We observe the address and assiduity they will use to corrupt us. Regent.

ASSIDUOUS. adj. [assiduus, Lat.] Constant in application. And if by pray'r Incessant I could hope to change the will

Of him who all things can; I would not cease
To weary him with my affiduous cries. Milton.
The most affiduous talebearers, and bitterest re-vilers, are often half-witted people.

Government of the Tongue.
In summer, you see the hen giving herself greater freedoms, and quitting her care for above two hours together; but in winter, when the rigour of the season would chill the principles of life, and decrease the young one, she grows more affiduous in her attendance, and stays away but half the time.

Each still renews her little labour,
Nor juttles her affiduous neighbour. Prior.
ASSIDUOUSLY. adv. [from affiduous.] Diligently; continually.

The trade, that obliges artificers to be assiduously conversant with their materials, is that of glass-men. Boyle.

The habitable earth may have been perpetually the drier, seeing it is assiduously drained and exhausted by the seas. Bentley.

bargain.] A contract or convention between the king of Spain and other powers, for furnishing the Spanish dominions in America with negro slaves. Spenser.

TO ASSIGN. v. a. [assigner, Fr. assigno, Lat.]
1. To mark out; to appoint.

He assigned Uriah unto a place where he knew that valiant men were. 2 Sam. xi. 16.

The two armies were assigned to the leading of two generals, both of them rather courtiers affured to the state, than martial men. Bacon.

Both joining,
As join'd in injuries, one enmity
Against a foe by doom express assign'd us,
That cruel serpent. Milton.

True quality is neglected, virtue is oppressed, and vice triumphant. The last day will assign to every one a station suitable to his character.

ADDISON.
2. To fix with regard to quantity or value.

There is no such intrinsic, natural, settled value in any thing, as to make any assigned quantity of it constantly worth any assigned quantity of another. Locke.

3. [In law.] In general, to appoint a deputy, or make over a right to another; in particular,
to appoint or set forth, as to assign error, is to shew in what part of the process error is committed:
to assign false judgment, is to declare how and where the judgment is unjust; to assign the cessor, is to shew how the plaintiff had ceased, or given over: to assign waste, is to shew wherein especially the waste is committed. Corwell.

ASSIGNABLE. adj. [from assign.] That which may be marked out or fixed.

Aristotle held that it streamed by connatural result and emanation from God; so that there was no instant assignable of God's eternal existence, in which the world did not also co-exist. South.

ASSIGNATION. n. f. [assignation, French.]

1. An appointment to meet; used generally of love appointments.

The lovers expected the return of this stated hour with as much impatience as if it had been a real assignation. Spenser.

Or when a whore, in her vocation,
Keeps punctual to an assignation. Swift.

2. A making over a thing to another.

ASSIGNEE. n. f. [assigne, Fr.] He that is appointed or deputed by another to do any act, or perform any business, or enjoy any commodity.
And an assignee may be either in deed or in law;
assignee in deed, is he that is appointed by a person;
assignee in law, is he whom the law maketh so,
without any appointment of the person. Corwell.

ASSIGNER. n. f. [from assign.] He that appoints.

The gospel is at once the assigner of our tasks,
and the magazine of our strength. Decay of Piety.

ASSIGNMENT. n. f. [from assign.] Appropriation of one thing to another thing or person.

The only thing which maketh any place publick, is the publick assignment thereof unto such duties. Hooker.

This institution, which assigns it to a person, whom we have no rule to know, is just as good as an assignment to no body at all. Locke.

ASSIMILABLE. adj. [from assimilate.] That which may be converted to the same nature with something else.

The spirits of many will find but naked habitations; meeting no assimilables wherein to re-act their natures. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

TO ASSIMILATE. v. n. [assimil, Lat.] To perform the act of converting food to nourishment.

Birds assimilate less, and excrete more, than beasts; for their excrements are ever liquid, and their flesh generally more dry. Bacon's Natural History.

Birds be commonly better meat than beasts, because their flesh doth assimilate more finely, and fecerneth more subtly. Bacon's Natural History.

TO ASSIMILATE. v. a.

1. To bring to a likeness, or resemblance.

A ferine and necessitous kind of life would easily assimilate at least the next generation to barbarism and ferineness. Hale.

They are not over-patient of mixture; but such, whom they cannot assimilate, soon find it their interest to remove. Swift.

2. To turn to its own nature by digestion.

Tasting concoct, digest, assimilate,
And corporeal to incorporeal turn. Milton.

Hence also animals and vegetables may assimilate their nourishment; moist nourishment easily changing its texture, till it becomes like the dense earth. Newton.

ASSIMILATENESS. n. f. [from assimilate.] Likeness. Dict.

ASSIMILATION. n. f. [from assimilate.]

1. The act of converting any thing to the nature or substance of another.

It furthers the very act of assimilation of nourishment, by some outward emollients that make the parts more apt to assimilate.

Bacon's Natural History.

2. The state of being assimilated, or becoming like something else.

A nourishment in a large acceptance, but not in propriety, conserving the body, not repairing it by assimilation, but preserving it by ventilation.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

It is as well the instinct as duty of our nature, to aspire to an assimilation with God; even the most laudable and generous ambition.

Decay of Piety.

TO ASSIMULATE. v. a. [assimulo, Lat.] To seign; to counterfeit.

ASSIMULATION. n. f. [assimulatio, Lat.] A dissembling; a counterfeiting. Dict.

help.

Receive her in the Lord, as becometh saints,
and assist her in whatsoever business the hath need.

Rom. xvi. 2.

It is necessary and assisting to all our other intellectual faculties. Locke.

Acquaintance with method will assist one in ranging human affairs. Watts's Logic.

She no sooner yielded to adultery, but she agreed to assist in the murder of her husband.

Bacon on the Odyssey.

ASSISTANCE. n. f. [assistance, French.] Help; furtherance.

The council of Trent commends recourse, not only to the prayers of the saints, but to their aid and assistance: What doth this aid and assistance signify? Strlingfleet.

You have abundant assurances for this knowledge, in excellent books.

Let us entreat this necessary assistance, that by his grace he would lead us. Rogers.

ASSISTANT. adj. [from assist.] Helping; lending aid.

Some perchance did adhere to the duke, and were assistent to him openly, or at least under hand. Hale's Common Law of England.

For the performance of this work, a vital or directive principle seemeth to be assistent to the corporeal. Grew.

ASSISTANT. n. f. [from assist.]

1. A person engaged in an affair not as principal, but as auxiliary or ministerial.

Some young towardsly noblemen or gentlemen were usually sent as assistants or attendants, according to the quality of the persons. Bacon.

2. Sometimes it is perhaps only a foster word for attendant.

The pale assistants on each ether star'd,
With gaping mouths for issuing words prepar'd.

Dryden.

ASSIZE. n. f. [assise, a fitting, Fr.]

men, with the bailiff or justice, in a certain place, and at a certain time.

2. A jury.

3. An ordinance or statute.

4. The court, place, or time, where and when the writs and processes of assize are taken. Corwell.

The law was never executed by any justices of assize, but the people left to their own laws.

Davies on Ireland.

At each assize and term we try
A thousand rascals of as deep a dye.

Dryden's Juvenal.

5. Any court of justice.

The judging God shall close the book of fate,
And there the last assizes keep,
For those who wake, and those who sleep.

Dryden.

6. Assize of bread, ale, &c. Measure, of price or rate. Thus it is said, when wheat is of such a price, the bread shall be of such assize.

7. Measure: for which we now use fise.

On high hill's top I saw a stately frame,
An hundred cubits high by just assize,
With hundred pillars. Spenser.

TO ASSIZE. v. a. [from the noun.] To fix the rate of any thing by an assize or writ.

ASSIZER, or ASSISER. n. f. [from assize.] Is an officer that has the care and oversight of weights and measures. Chambers.

They persuaded the king, now in old age, to make Piangus his associate in government with him.

Sidney.

2. A confederate, in a good or neutral sense;
an accomplice in ill.

Their defender, and his associates, have since proposed to the world a form such as themselves like. Hooker.

3. A companion; implying some kind of equality.

Ho.

He was accompanied with a noble gentleman,
no unfuitable associate. Wotton.

Sole Eve, associate sole, to me beyond
Compare, above all living creatures dear. Milton.
But my associates now my stay deplore,
Impatient. Pope's Odyssey.

ASSOCIATION. n. f. [from associatus.]

1. Union; conjunction; society.

The church being a society, hath the self same original grounds, which other politick societies have; the natural inclination which all men have unto sociable life, and consent to some certain bond of association; which bond is the law that appointeth what kind of order they shall be as- sociated in. Hooker.

2. Confederacy; union for particular purposes, good or ill.

This could not be done but with mighty opposition: against which, to strengthen themselves, they secretly entered into a league of association.
Hooker.

3. Partnership.

Self-denial is a kind of holy association with God; and, by making you his partner, interests you in all his happiness. Boyle.

4. Connection.

Association of ideas is of great importance, and may be of excellent use. Watts.

5. Apposition; union of matter.

The changes of corporeal things are to be placed only in the various separations, and new associations and motions of these permanent particles. Newton.

infatuate; to besot: a word out of use.

But whence they sprung, or how they were begot,

Uneath is to assure, uneath to weene
That monstrous error which doth some assort.
Spenser.

To ASSUA'GE. v. a. [The derivation of this word is uncertain; Minshew deduces it from ad- suadere, or assuaviare; Fonius, from græc. suave; from whence Skinner imagines apparan might have been formed.]

1. To mitigate; to soften; to allay.

Refreshing winds the summer's heats assuage,
And kindly warmth disarms the winter's rage.
Addison.

2. To appease; to pacify.

Yet is his hate, his rancour ne'er the less,
Since nought assuages malice when 'tis told.
Fairfax.

This was necessary for the securing the people from their fears, capable of being assuaged by no other means. Clarendon.

Shall I, t' assuage

Their brutal rage,
The regal stem destroy? Dryden's Allion.

3. To ease; as, the medicine assuages pain.

To ASSUA'GE. v. n. To abate.

God made a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters assuag'd. Gen. viii. 1.

ASSU'GEMENT. n. f. [from assuage.] Mitigation; abatement of evil.

Tell me, when shall these weary woes have end,
Or shall their ruthless torment never cease?

But all my days in pining languor spend,
Without hope of assuagement or release. Sp. Sonnet.

ASSU'GER. n. f. [from assuage.] One who pacifies or appeases.

ASSU'ASIVE. adj. [from assuage.] Softening; suming in conversation, and peremptory in answers. Collier.

ASSU'MPTION. n. f. [assumere, Lat.] A voluntary promise made by word, whereby a man taketh upon him to perform or pay any thing to another: It contains any verbal promise made upon consideration. Corwell.

ASSU'MPTION. n. f. [assumptio, Lat.]

1. The act of taking any thing to one's self.

The personal descent of God himself, and his assumption of our flesh to his divinity, more familiarly to insinuate his pleasure to us, was an enforcement beyond all methods of wisdom.

Hammond's Fundamentals.

2. The supposition, or act of supposing any thing without farther proof.

These by way of assumption, under the two general propositions, are intrinsically and naturally good or bad. Norris.

3. The thing supposed; a postulate.

Hold, says the Stoick, your assumption's wrong:
I grant, true freedom you have well defin'd.

Dryden.

For the assumption, that Christ did such miraculous and supernatural works, to confirm what he said, we need only repeat the message sent by him to John the Baptist. South.

4. The taking up any person into heaven, which is supposed by the Romish church of the Blessed Virgin.

Upon the feast of the assumption of the Blessed Virgin, the pope and cardinals keep the vespers.

Stillingfleet.

Adam, after a certain period of years, would have been rewarded with an assumption to eternal felicity.

ASSU'MPTIVE. adj. [assumptivus, Lat.] That is assumed.

ASSURANCE. n. f. [assurance, French.]

1. Certain expectation.

Though hope be, indeed, a lower and lesser thing than assurance, yet, as to all the purposes of a pious life, it may prove more useful. South.

What encouragement can be given to goodness, beyond the hopes of heaven, and the assurance of an endless felicity? Tillotson.

2. Secure confidence; trust.

What man is he that boasts of fleshly might,
And vain assurance of mortality,
Which all too soon as it doth come to fight Against spiritual foes, yields by and by.

Fair's Queen.

3. Freedom from doubt; certain knowledge.

Proof from the authority of man's judgment, is not able to work that assurance, which doth grow by a stronger proof. Hooker.

"Is far off,

And rather like a dream, than an assurance
That my remembrance warrants.

Shakespeare's Tempest.

The obedient, and the man of practice, shall outgrow all their doubts and ignorance, till perfection pass into knowledge, and knowledge advance into assurance. South.

Hath he found, in an evil course, that comfortable assurance of God's favour, and good hopes of his future condition, which a religious life would have given him? Tillotson.

4. Firmness; undebating steadiness.

Men whose consideration will relieve our modesty, and give us courage and assurance in the duties of our profession. Rogers.

5. Confidence; want of modesty; exemption from awe or fear.

My behaviour ill governed, gave you the first comfort; my affection ill hid, hath given you this last assurance. Sidney.

6. Freedom from vicious shame.

Conversation, when they come into the world,
will add to their knowledge and assurance. Locke.

7. Ground of confidence; security given.

The nature of desire itself is no easier to receive belief, than it is hard to ground belief; for as desire is glad to embrace the first shew of comfort, so is desire desirous of perfect assurance.
Sidney.

As the conquest was but slight and superficial;
so the pope's donation to the Irish submissions were but weak and fickle assurances.
Davies on Ireland.

None of woman born

Shall harm Macbeth.—

—Then live, Macduff, what need I fear of thee?
But yet I'll make assurance double sure,
And take a bond of fate; Thou shalt not live.

Shakespeare.

I must confess your offer is the best;

And, let your father make her the assurance,
She is your own, else you must pardon me.

If you should die before him, where's her dower? Shakespeare.

An assurance being passed through for a competent fine, hath come back again by reason of some overflight. Bacon.

8. Spirit; intrepidity.

They, like resolute men, stood in the face of the breach with more assurance than the wall itself. Knox.

With all th' assurance innocence can bring,
Fearless without, because secure within;
Arm'd with my courage, unconcern'd I see
This pomp, a shame to you, a pride to me.

Dryden.

9. Sanguineness; readiness to hope.

This is not the grace of hope, but a good natural assurance or confidence, which Aristotle observes young men to be full of, and old men not so inclined to. Hammond.

10. Testimony of credit.

I am a gentleman of blood and breeding,
And from some knowledge and assurance of
you,

Offer this office. Shakespeare's King Lear.

We have as great assurance that there is a God, as we could expect to have, supposing that he were. Tillotson.

11. Conviction.

Such

Such an assurance of things as will make men careful to avoid a lesser danger, ought to awaken men to avoid a greater. Tillotson.

12. [In theology.] Security with respect to a future state; certainty of acceptance with God.

13. The same with insurance. See INSURANCE. To ASSURE, v. a. [from assure, Fr. from asscurare, low Latin.]

1. To give confidence by a firm promise.

So when he had assured them with many words, that he would restore them without hurt, according to the agreement, they let him go for the saving of their brethren. 2 Mac. xii.

2. To secure to another; to make firm.

So irrefutable an authority cannot be reflected on, without the most awful reverence, even by those whose piety assures its favour to them. Rogers.

3. To make confident; to exempt from doubt or fear; to confer security.

And hereby we know, that we are of the truth, and shall assure our hearts before him. 1 John, iii. 19.

I revive

At this last sight; assured that man shall live With all the creatures, and their seed preserve. Milton.

4. To make secure: with of.

But what on earth can long abide in state? Or who can him assure of happy day? Spenser.

And, for that dowry, I'll assure her of Her widowhood, be it that she survives me, In all my lands and leaves whatsoever. Shaksp.

5. To affianse; to betroth.

This diviner laid claim to me, called me Dromio, swore I was assured to her. Shakspere's Comedy of Errors.

ASSURED, participial adj. [from assure.]

1. Certain; indubitable; not doubted.

It is an assured experience, that flint laid about the bottom of a tree makes it prosper. Bacon's Natural History.

2. Certain; not doubting.

Young princes, clove your hands, —And your lips too; for, I am well assured, That I did so, when I was first assur'd. Shakspere's King John.

As when by night the glass Of Galileo, less assured, observes Imagin'd lands, and regions, in the moon. Milton.

3. Immodest; viciously confident.

ASSUREDLY, adv. [from assured.] Certainly; indubitably.

They promis'd me eternal happiness, And brought me garlands, Griffith, which I feel I am not worthy yet to wear: I shall assuredly. Shakspere.

God is absolutely good, and so, assuredly, the cause of all that is good; but, of any thing that is evil, he is no cause at all.

Assuredly he will stop our liberty, till we restore him his worship. South.

ASSUREDNESS, n. f. [from assured.] The state of being assured; certainty.

ASSURER, n. f. [from assure.]

1. He that gives assurance.

2. He that gives security to make good any loss.

To ASSUAGE. See ASSUAGE.

ASTERISK, n. f. [from astrix, Gr.] A mark in printing or writing, in form of a little star; as *.

He also published the translation of the Septuagint by itself, having first compared it with the Hebrew, and noted by asterisks what was defective, and by obelisks what was redundant. Greav.

ASTERISM, n. f. [from astrix, Gr.]

1. A constellation.

Poetry had filled the skies with asterisms, and histories belonging to them; and then astrology devises the feigned virtues and influences of each. Bentley's Sermons.

2. An asterisk, or mark. This is a very improper use.

Dwell particularly on passages with an asterism; for the observations which follow such a note, will give you a clear light. Dryden's Dufres.

ASTHMA, n. f. [from asthma, Gr.] A frequent, difficult, and short respiration, joined with a hissing sound and a cough, especially in the night-time, and when the body is in a prone posture; because then the contents of the lower belly bear so against the diaphragm, as to lessen the capacity of the breast, whereby the lungs have less room to move. Quincy.

An asthma is the inflation of the membranes of the lungs, and of the membranes covering the muscles of the thorax. Floyer on the Humours.

ASTHMATICAL, adj. [from asthma.] Troubled with an asthma.

ASTHMATICK, adj. [from asthma.] Led with an asthma.

In asthmatical persons, though the lungs be very much stuffed with tough phlegm, yet the patient may live some months, if not some years. Boyle.

After drinking, our horses are most asthmatick; and, for avoiding the watering of them, we wet their hay. Floyer.

ASTERN, adv. [from a and stern.] In the hinder part of the ship; behind the ship.

The galley gives her side, and turns her prow, While those astern descending down the steep, Thro' gaping waves behold the boiling deep. Dryden.

To ASTERT, v. a. [a word used by Spenser, as it seems, for start, or startle.] To terrify; to startle; to fright.

We deem of death, as doom of ill desert; But knew we fools what it us brings until, Die would we daily, once it to expert;

No danger there the shepherd can astert. Spenser.

ASTONIED, part. adj. A word used in the version of the bible for astonished.

Many were astonied at thee. Isaiah, lii. 14.

To ASTONISH, v. a. [from astomere, Fr. from astomere, Lat.] To confound with some sudden passion, as with fear or wonder; to amaze; to surprise; to stun.

It is the part of men to fear and tremble, When the most mighty gods, by tokens, send Such dreadful heralds to astonish us. Shakspere.

Astonish'd at the voice, he stood amaz'd, And all around with inward horror gaz'd. Addis.

A genius universal as his theme, Astonishing as chaos. Thomson.

ASTONISHINGNESS, n. f. [from astonish.] Of a nature to excite astonishment.

ASTONISHMENT, n. f. [from astonnement, Fr.] Amazement; confusion of mind from fear or wonder.

We found, with no less wonder to us, than astonishment to themselves, that they were the two valiant and famous brothers. Sidney.

She esteemed this as much above his wisdom, as astonishment is beyond base admiration. South.

To ASTOUND, v. a. [from astomere, Fr.] To astonish; to confound with fear or wonder. This word is now somewhat obsolete.

These thoughts may startle well, but not astound The virtuous mind, that ever walks attended

By a strong siding champion, conscience. Milton.

ASTRADDLE, adv. [from a and straddle.] With one's legs across any thing. Dict.

ASTRACAL, n. f. [from astrix, Gr., the ankle or ankle-bone.] A little round member, in the form of a ring or bracelet, serving as an ornament at the tops and bottoms of columns. Builder's Dict.

We see none of that ordinary confusion, which is the result of quarter rounds of the astragal, and I know not how many other intermingled particulars. Spectator.

ASTRAL, adj. [from astrum, Lat.] Starry; relating to the stars.

Some astral forms I must invoke by pray'r, Fram'd all of purest atoms of the air; Not in their natures simply good or ill; But most subservient to bad spirits will. Dry.

ASTRAY, adv. [from a and stray.] Out of the right way.

May seem the wain was very evil led, When such an one had guiding of the way, That knew not, whether right he went, or else astray. Spenser.

You run astray, for whilst we talk of Ireland, you rip up the original of Scotland. Spenser on Ire.

Like one that had been led astray Through the heav'n's wide pathless way. Milton.

To ASTRICT, v. a. [from astrix, Lat.] To contract by applications, in opposition to relax: a word not so much used as constrict.

The solid parts were to be relaxed or astri'd, as they let the humours pass either in too small or too great quantities. Arbutnot on Aliments.

ASTRICTION, n. f. [from astrix, Lat.] The act or power of contracting the parts of the body by applications.

Astrixion is in a substance that hath a virtual cold; and it worketh partly by the same means that cold doth. Bacon.

This virtue requireth an astrixion, but such an astrixion as is not grateful to the body; for a pleasing astrixion doth rather bind in the nerves than expel them; and therefore such astrixion is found in things of a harsh taste. Bacon.

Lenitive substances are proper for dry atrabilarian constitutions, who are subject to astrixion of the belly and the piles. Arbutnot on Diet.

ASTRICTIVE, adj. [from astrix.] Stiptick; of a binding quality. Dict.

ASTRICTORY, adj. [from astrix, Lat.] Astringent; apt to bind. Dict.

ASTRIDE, adv. [from a and stride.] With the legs open.

To lay their native arms aside, Their modesty, and ride astride. Hudibras.

I saw a place where the Rhone is so straitened between two rocks, that a man may stand astride upon both at once. Boyle.

ASTRIFEROUS, adj. [from astrix, Lat.] Bearing or having stars. Dict.

ASTRIGEROUS, adj. [from astrix, Lat.] Carrying stars. Dict.

To ASTRINGE, v. a. [from astrix, Lat.] To press by contraction; to make the parts draw together.

Tears are caused by a contraction of the spirits of the brain; which contraction, by consequence, astrixing the moisture of the brain, and thereby sendeth tears into the eyes. Bacon.

ASTRINGENCY, n. f. [from astrix.] The power of contracting the parts of the body; opposed to the power of relaxation.

Astrixion prohibiteth dissolution; as, in medicines, astringents inhibit putrefaction; and, by astringency, some small quantity of oil of vitriol will keep fresh water long from putrefying. Bacon's Natural History.

Acid, acrid, austere, and bitter substances, by their astringency, create horror, that is, stimulate the fibres. Arbutnot.

ASTRINGENT, adj. [from astrix, Lat.] Binding; contracting; opposed to laxative: it is used sometimes of tastes which seem to contract the mouth.

Astringent medicines are binding, which act by the asperity of their particles, whereby they corrugate the membranes, and make them draw up closer. Quincy.

The myrobalan hath parts of contrary natures, for it is sweet and yet astringent. Bacon.

The juice is very astringent, and therefore of slow motion. Bacon's Natural History.

What diminisheth sensible perspiration, encreaseth the insensible; for that reason a strengthening and astringent diet often conduceth to this purpose. Arbutnot on Aliments.

ASTROGRAPHY, n. f. [from astron, and graphein.] The science of describing the stars. Dict.

ASTROLABE, n. f. [from astron, and labos, to take.]

1. An instrument chiefly used for taking the altitude of the pole, the sun or stars, at sea.

2. A stereographick projection of the circles of the sphere upon the plain of some great circle. Chambers.

ASTRO-

ASTROLOGER. n. f. [astrologus, Lat. from ἀστρον and λόγος.]

1. One that, supposing the influences of the stars to have a causal power, professes to foretell or discover events depending on those influences.

Not unlike that which astrologers call a conjunction of planets, of no very benign aspect the one to the other.

A happy genius is the gift of nature: it depends on the influence of the stars, say the astrologers; on the organs of the body, say the naturalists; it is the particular gift of heaven, say the divines, both christians and heathens.

Astrologers, that future fates foreflew. Pope.

I never heard a finer satire against lawyers, than that of astrologers, when they pretend, by rules of art, to tell when a suit will end, and whether to the advantage of the plaintiff or defendant.

2. It was anciently used for one that understood or explained the motions of the planets, without including prediction.

A worthy astrologer, by perspective glasses, hath found in the stars many things unknown to the ancients.

ASTROLOGIAN. n. f. [from astrology.] The same with astrologer.

The twelve houses of heaven, in the form which astrologians use.

The stars, they say, cannot dispose, No more than can the astrologian.

ASTROLOGICAL. } adj. [from astrology.]

1. Professing astrology.

Some seem a little astrological, as when they warn us from places of malign influence.

No astrologick wizard honour gains, Who has not oft been banish'd, or in chains.

2. Relating to astrology.

Astrological prayers seem to me to be built on as good reason as the predictions.

The poetical fables are more ancient than the astrological influences, that were not known to the Greeks till after Alexander the Great.

ASTROLOGICALLY. adv. [from astrology.] In an astrological manner.

To ASTROLOGIZE. v. n. [from astrology.] To practise astrology.

ASTROLOGY. n. f. [astrologia, Lat.] The practice of foretelling things by the knowledge of the stars; an art now generally exploded, as irrational and false.

I know the learned think of the art of astrology, that the stars do not force the actions or wills of men.

ASTRONOMER. n. f. [from ἀστρον, a star, and νόμος, a rule or law.] One that studies the celestial motions, and the rules by which they are governed.

The motions of factions under kings, ought to be like the motions, as the astronomers speak of, in the inferior orbs.

Astronomers no longer doubt of the motion of the planets about the sun.

The old and new astronomers in vain Attempt the heav'nly motions to explain.

ASTRONOMICAL. } adj. [from astronomy.] Be-

ASTRONOMICK. } longing to astronomy.

Our forefathers marking certain mutations to happen in the sun's progress through the zodiac, they register and set them down in their astronomical canons.

Can he not pass an astronomick line, Or dreads the sun th' imaginary sign,

That he should ne'er advance to either pole?

ASTRONOMICALLY. adv. [from astronomical.] In an astronomical manner.

ASTRONOMY. n. f. [ἀστρονομία, from ἀστρον, a star and νόμος, a law, or rule.] A mixed mathematical science teaching the knowledge of the celestial bodies, their magnitudes, motions, distances, periods, eclipses, and order. Pythagoras taught that the earth and planets turn round the sun, which stands immovable in the centre.

From the time of Pythagoras, astronomy sunk into neglect, till it was revived by the Ptolemys, kings of Egypt; and the Saracens brought it from Africa to Spain, and restored this science to Europe.

To this must be added the understanding of the globes, and the principles of geometry and astronomy.

ASTROSCOPY. n. f. [ἀστρον, a star, and σκοπεω, to view.] Observation of the stars.

ASTRO-THEOLOGY. n. f. [from astrum, a star, and theologia, divinity.] Divinity founded on the observation of the celestial bodies.

That the diurnal and annual revolutions are the motions of the terraqueous globe, not of the sun, I shew in the preface of my Astro-Theology.

ASUNDER. adv. [from apundhan, Sax.] Apart; i.e. separately; not together.

Two indirect lines, the further that they are drawn out, the further they go asunder.

Sense thinks the planet spheres not much asunder;

What tells us then their distance is so far.

Greedy hope to find His wish, and best advantage, us asunder.

The fall'n archangel, envious of our state, Seeks hid advantage to betray us worle;

Which, when asunder, will not prove too hard, For both together are each other's guard.

Borne far asunder by the tides of men, Like adamant and steel they meet again.

All this metallick matter, both that which continued asunder, and in single corpuscles, and that which was amass'd and concreted into nodules, subside.

ASYLUM. n. f. [Lat. asylum, from α, not, and συνα, to pillage.] A place out of which he that has fled to it, may not be taken; a sanctuary; a refuge; a place of retreat and security.

So sacred was the church to some, that it had the right of an asylum, or sanctuary.

ASYMMETRY. n. f. [from α, without, and συμμετρία, symmetry.]

1. Contrariety to symmetry; disproportion.

The asymmetries of the brain as well as the deformities of the legs or face, may be rectified in time.

2. This term is sometimes used in mathematicks, for what is more usually called incommensurability; when between two quantities there is no common measure.

ASYMPTOTE. n. f. [from α, priv. συν, with, and πτω, to fall; which never meet; incoincident.] Asymptotes are right lines, which approach nearer and nearer to some curve; but which, though they and their curve were infinitely continued, would never meet; and may be conceived as tangents to their curves at an infinite distance.

Asymptote lines, though they may approach still nearer together, till they are nearer than the least assignable distance, yet, being still produced infinitely, will never meet.

ASYMPTOTICAL. adj. [from asymptote.] Curves are said to be asymptotical, when they continually approach, without a possibility of meeting.

ASYNDETON. n. f. [ἀσύνδετον, of α, priv. and σύνδεσις, to bind together.] A figure in grammar, when a conjunction copulative is omitted in a sentence; as in veni, vidi, vici, &c. is left out.

nish all those who would seduce men to atheism.

ATHEIST. n. f. [ἀθεός, without God.] One that denies the existence of God.

To these, that sober race of men, whose lives Religious, titled them the sons of God,

Shall yield up all their virtue, all their fame,
Ignobly! to the trains, and to the smiles

Of these fair atheists.

Though he were really a speculative atheist, yet if he would but proceed rationally, he could not however be a practical atheist, nor live without God in this world.

ATHEIST, use thine eyes,
And having view'd the order of the skies,
Think, if thou canst, that matter blindly hurl'd,
Without a guide, should frame this wond'rous world.

No atheist, as such, can be a true friend, an affectionate relation, or a loyal subject.

lasses with gold and silver, or without.

ATMOSPHERE. n. f. [ἀτμός, vapour, and σφαῖρα, a sphere.]
The exterior part of this our habitable world is the air, or atmosphere; a light, thin, fluid, or springy body, that encompasses the solid earth on all sides.

Immense the whole excited atmosphere
Impetuous rushes o'er the sounding world.

ATMOSPHERICAL. adj. [from atmosphere.]
Consisting of the atmosphere; belonging to the atmosphere.

We did not mention the weight of the incumbent atmospherical cylinder, as a part of the weight resisted.

ATOM. n. f. [ἄτομος, Lat. ἀτομικός.]
1. Such a small particle as cannot be physically divided: and these are the first rudiments, or the component parts of all bodies.

Innumerable minute bodies are called atoms, because, by reason of their perfect solidity, they were really indivisible.

See plastick nature working to this end,
The single atoms each to other tend,
Attract, attracted to, the next in place,
Form'd and impell'd its neighbour to embrace.

2. Any thing extremely small.
It is as easy to count atoms, as to resolve the propositions of a lover.

ATOMICAL. adj. [from atom.]
1. Consisting of atoms.

ATR

from one place to another, what do they more than put one synonymous word for another.

Locke.

Now can judicious atomists conceive, Chance to the fun could his just impulse give?

Blackmore.

A' TOMY. n. f. An obsolete word for atom.

Drawn with a team of little atomies, Athwart men's noses, as they be asleep. Shakef. To ATO'NE. v. n. [from at one, as the etymologists remark, to be at one, is the same as to be in concord. This derivation is much confirmed by the following passage of Shakespeare, and appears to be the sense still retained in Scotland.]

1. To agree; to accord.

He and Aufidius can no more atone, Than violentest contrariety. Shakef. Coriolanus.

2. To stand as an equivalent for something; and particularly used of expiatory sacrifices; with the particle for before the thing for which something else is given.

From a mean stock the pious Decii came; Yet such their virtues, that their loss alone, For Rome and all our legions did atone.

Dryden's Juvenal.

The good intention of a man of weight and worth, or a real friend, seldom atones for the unreasonableness produced by his grave representations.

Locke.

Let thy sublime meridian course For Mary's setting rays atone:

Our lustre, with redoubled force, Must now proceed from thee alone.

Prior.

His virgin sword Ægyptus' veins imbrued; The murderer fell, and blood atoned for blood.

Pope.

To ATO'NE. v. a.

1. To reduce to concord.

If any contention arose, he knew none fitter to be their judge to atone and take up their quarrels but himself.

Drummond.

2. To expiate; to answer for.

Soon should you' boasters cease their haughty strife, Or each atone his guilty love with life.

Pope.

ATO'NEMENT. n. f. [from atone.]

1. Agreement; concord.

He seeks to make atonement

Between the duke of Gloucester and your brothers.

Shakespeare.

2. Expiation; expiatory equivalent; with for.

And the Levites were purified, and Aaron made an atonement for them to cleanse them.

Numbers.

Surely it is not a sufficient atonement for the writers, that they profess loyalty to the government, and sprinkle some arguments in favour of the dissenters, and, under the shelter of popular politics and religion, undermine the foundations of all piety and virtue.

Swift.

ATO'P. adv. [from a and top.] On the top; at the top:

Atop whereof, but far more rich, appear'd

The work as of a kingly palace-gate.

To ATTAIN. v. a. [attenter, Fr.]

1. To disgrace; to cloud with ignominy.

His warlike shield

Was all of diamond perfect pure and clean,
For so exceeding shone his glistering ray,
That Phoebus golden face it did attain,
As when a cloud his beams doth overlay.

Fairy Queen.

2. To attain is particularly used for such as are found guilty of some crime or offence, and especially of felony or treason. A man is attained two ways, by appearance, or by process. Attainder by appearance is by confession, battle, or verdict. Confession is double; one at the bar before the judges, when the prisoner, upon his indictment read, being asked guilty or not guilty, answers guilty, never putting himself upon the verdict of the jury. The other is before the coroner or sanctuary, where he, upon his confession, was in former times constrained to abjure the realm; which kind is called attainder by abjuration. Attainder by battle is, when the party appealed, and choosing to try the truth by combat rather than by jury, is vanquished. Attainder by verdict is, when the prisoner at the bar, answering to the indictment not guilty, hath an inquest of life and death passing upon him, and is by the verdict pronounced guilty. Attainder by process is, where a party flies, and is not found till five times called publickly in the county; and at last outlawed upon his default.

Were it not an endless trouble, that no traitor or felon should be attained, but a parliament must be called.

I must offend before I be attained.

3. To taint; to corrupt.

My tender youth was never yet attained

With any passion of inflaming love.

ATTAIN. n. f. [from the verb.]

1. Any thing injurious; as illness, weariness.

This sense is now obsolete.

Nor doth he dedicate one jot of colour

Unto the weary and all-watched night;

But freshly looks, and overbears attain

With cheerful semblance.

2. Stain; spot; taint.

No man hath a virtue that he has not a glimpse of; nor any man an attain, but he carries some stain of it.

3. In horsemanship. A blow or wound in the hinder feet of an horse.

ATTAINURE. n. f. [from attain.] Legal censure; reproach; imputation.

ATTORNEY. n. f. [attornatus, low Lat. from tour, Fr. Celui qui vient à tour d'autrui; qui alterius vices facit.]

1. Such a person as by consent, commandment, or request, takes heed, fees, and takes upon him the charge of other men's business, in their absence. Attorney is either general or special: Attorney general is he that by general authority is appointed to all our affairs or suits; as the attorney general of the king, which is nearly the same with Procurator Caesaris in the Roman empire. Attorneys general are made either by the king's letters patent, or by our appointment before justices in eyre, in open court. Attorney special or particular, is he that is employed in one or more causes particularly specified. There are also, in respect of the divers courts, attorneys at large, and attorneys special, belonging to this or that court only. Corwell.

Attorneys in common law, are nearly the same with proctors in the civil law, and solicitors in courts of equity. Attorneys sue out writs or process, or commence, carry on, and defend actions, or other proceedings, in the names of other persons, in the courts of common law. None are admitted to act without having served a clerkship for five years, taking the proper oath, being enrolled, and and examined by the judges. The attorney general pleads within the bar. To him come warrants for making out patents, pardons, &c. and he is the principal manager of all law affairs of the crown.

Chambers.

I am a subject,

And challenge law: attorneys are deny'd me,
And therefore personally I lay my claim
To mine inheritance.

Shakespeare.

The king's attorney, on the contrary,
Urg'd on examinations, proofs, confessions.

Shakespeare.

Despairing quacks with curses fled the place,
And vile attorneys, now an useless race.

Pope.

2. It was anciently used for those who did any business for another; now only in law.

I will attend my husband; it is my office;
And will have no attorney but myself;
And therefore let me have him home.

Shakespeare.

To ATTORNEY. v. a. [from the noun; the verb is now not in use.]

1. To perform by proxy.

Their encounters, though not personal, have been royally attended with interchange of gifts.

Shakespeare.

2. To employ as a proxy.

As I was then

Advertising, and holy to your business,
Not changing heart with habit, I am still attended to your service.

Shakespeare.

ATTORNEYSHIP. n. f. [from attorney.] The office of an attorney; proxy; vicarious agency.

But marriage is a matter of more worth,
Than to be dealt in by attorneyship.

Shakespeare.

ATTORNEMENT. n. f. [attournement, Fr.] A yielding of the tenant to a new lord, or acknowledgment of him to be his lord; for, otherwise, he that buyeth or obtaineth any lands or tenements of another, which are in the occupation of a third, cannot get possession.

Cowell.

To ATTRACT. v. a. [attrabo, attrahum, Lat.]

1. To draw to something.

A man should scarce persuade the affections of the loadstone, or that jet and amber *attract*eth straws and light bodies.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

The single atoms each to other tend,
Attract, attracted to, the next in place
Form'd and impell'd its neighbour to embrace.

Pope.

2. To allure; to invite.

Adorn'd

She was indeed, and lovely, to attract
Thy love; not thy subjection.

Milton.

Show the care of approving all actions so, as may most effectually attract all to this profession.

Hammond.

Deign to be lov'd, and ev'ry heart subdue!
What nymph could e'er attract such crowds as you!

Pope.

ATTRACT. n. f. [from To attract.] Attraction; the power of drawing: not in use.

Feel darts and charms, attracts and flames,
And woe and contract in their names.

Hudibras.

ATTRACTICAL. adj. [from attract.] Having the power to draw to it.

Some stones are endued with an electrical or attractual virtue.

Ray on the Creation.

ATTRACTION. n. f. [from attract.]

1. The power of drawing any thing.

The drawing of amber and jet, and other electrick bodies, and the attraction in gold of the spirit of quicksilver at distance; and the attraction of heat at distance; and that of fire to naphtha; and that of some herbs to water, though at distance; and divers others, we shall handle.

Bacon.

Loadstones and touched needles, laid long in quicksilver, have not omitted their attraction.

Brown's Vulgar Errors.

Attraction may be performed by impulse, or some other means; I use that word, to signify any force by which bodies tend towards one another.

Newton's Opticks.

2. The power of alluring or enticing.

Setting the attraction of my good parts aside, I have no other charms.

Shakespeare.

ATTRACTIVE. adj. [from attract.]

1. Having the power to draw any thing.

What if the sun

Be centre to the world; and other stars,
By his attractive virtue, and their own,
Incited, dance about him various rounds?

Milton.

Some the round earth's cohesion to secure,
For that hard task employ magnetick power;
Remark, say they, the globe with wonder own
Its nature, like the fam'd attractive stone.

Blackmore.

Bodies act by the attractions of gravity, magnetism, and electricity; and these instances make it not improbable but there may be more attractive powers than these.

Newton.

2. Inviting; alluring; enticing.

Happy is Hermia, where'er she lies;
For the hath blessed and attractive eyes.

Shakespeare.

I pleas'd, and with attractive graces won,
The most averse, thee chiefly.

Milton.

ATTRACTIVE. n. f. [from attract.] That which draws or incites; allurements; except that attractive is of a good or indifferent sense, and allurement generally bad.

The condition of a servant staves him off to a distance; but the gospel speaks nothing but attractives and invitation.

Hale.

To ATTRIBUTE. v. a. [attribuo, Lat.]

1. To ascribe; to give; to yield as due.

To their very bare judgment somewhat a reasonable man would attribute, notwithstanding the common imbecillities which are incident unto our nature.

Hooker.

We attribute nothing to God that hath any repugnancy or contradiction in it. Power and wisdom have no repugnancy in them.

Tillotson.

2. To impute, as to a cause.

I have observed a Campania determine contrary to appearances, by the caution and conduct of a general, which were attributed to his infirmities.

Temple.

The imperfection of telescopes is attributed to spherical glasses; and mathematicians have propounded to figure them by the conical sections.

Newton's Opticks.

ATTRIBUTE. n. f. [from To attribute.]

1. The thing attributed to another, as perfection to the Supreme Being.

Power, light, virtue, wisdom, and goodness, being all but attributes of one simple essence, and of one God, we in all admire, and in part discern.

Raleigh.

Your vain poets after did mistake,
Who ev'ry attribute a god did make.

Dryden.

All the perfections of God are called his attributes; for he cannot be without them.

Watts's Logick.

2. Quality; characteristic disposition.

They must have these three attributes; they must be men of courage, fearing God, and hating covetousness.

Bacon.

3. A thing belonging to another; an appendant; adherent.

His sceptre shews the force of temporal pow'r,
The attribute to awe and majesty:
But mercy is above this scepter'd sway,
It is an attribute to God himself.

Shakespeare.

The sculptor, to distinguish him, gave him, what the medallists call his proper attributes, a spear and a shield.

Addison.

4. Reputation; honour.

It takes

From our achievements, though perform'd at height,
The pith and marrow of our attribute.

Shakespeare.

ATTRIBUTION. n. f. [from To attribute.] Commendation; qualities ascribed.

If speaking truth,

In this fine age, were not thought flattery,
Such attribution should the Douglas have,
As not a foldier of this season's stamp
Should go to general current through the world.

Shakespeare.

We suffer him to persuade us we are as Gods, and never suspect these glorious attributions may be no more than flattery.

Decay of Piety.

ATTRITE. adj. [atritus, Lat.] Ground; worn by rubbing.

Or by collision of two bodies, grind

The air atrite to fire.

Milton.

ATTRITENESS. n. f. [from atrite.] The being much worn.

ATTRITION. n. f. [atritio, Lat.]

1. The act of wearing things, by rubbing one against another.

This vapour, ascending incessantly out of the abyss, and pervading the strata of gravel, and the rest, decays the bones and vegetables lodged in those strata; this fluid, by its continual attrition, fretting the said bodies.

Of love on high Dodona's holy hill,
What means might best his safe return avail.

Pope.

To AVAIL. v. n. To be of use; to be of advantage.

Nor can my strength avail, unless by thee
Endu'd with force, I gain the victory.

Dryden.

When real merit is wanting, it avails nothing to have been encouraged by the great.

Pope's Preface to his Works.

AVAIL. n. f. [from To avail.] Profit; advantage; benefit.

For

A V A

For all that else did come were sure to fail;
Yet would he further none but for avail.

Spenser.

I charge thee,
As heav'n shall work in me for thine avail,
To tell me truly. Shakespeare.
Truth, light upon this way, is of no more avail
to us than error. Locke.

AVAILABLE, adj. [from avail.]

1. Profitable; advantageous.
Mighty is the efficacy of such intercessions to avert judgments; how much more available then may they be to secure the continuance of blessings?
Atterbury.

All things subject to action, the will does so far incline unto, as reason judges them more available to our bliss. Hooker.

2. Powerful; in force; valid.

Laws human are available by consent. Hooker.
Drake put one of his men to death, having no authority nor commission available. Raleigh.

van; the first body of an army.

The horsemen might issue forth without disturbance of the foot, and the avant-guard without shuffling with the battail or arriere. Hayward.

AVARICE, n. f. [avarice, Fr. avaritia, Lat.]
Covetousness; insatiable desire.

There grows

In my most ill-compos'd affection, such
A stanchless avarice, that were I king,
I should cut off the nobles for their lands.

Shakespeare.

This avarice of praise in times to come,
Those long inscriptions crowded on the tomb.

Dryden.

Nor love his peace of mind destroys,
Nor wicked avarice of wealth. Dryden.
Avarice is insatiable; and so he went still pushing on for more. L'Estrange.

Be niggards of advice on no pretence,

For the worst avarice is that of sense. Pope.

AVARICIOUS, adj. [avaricieux, Fr.] Covetous; insatiably desirous.

Luxurious, avaricious, false, deceitful.

boldness; confidence.

Lean, raw-bon'd rascals! who would e'er suppose

They had such courage and audacity? Shakespeare.

Great effects come of industry and perseverance; for audacity doth almost bind and mate the weaker sort of minds. Bacon's Natural History.

For want of that freedom and audacity, necessary in commerce with men, his personal modesty overthrew all his public actions. Tatler.

AUDIBLE, adj. [audibilis, Lat.]

1. That which may be perceived by hearing.

Visibles work upon a looking-glass, and au-dibles upon the places of echo, which resemble in some sort the cavern of the ear.

Bacon's Natural History.

Eve, who unseen,

Yet all had heard, with audible lament
Discover'd soon the place of her retire. Milton.

Every sense doth not operate upon fancy with the same force. The conceits of visibles are clearer and stronger than those of audibles.

Grew.

2. Loud enough to be heard.

One leaning over a wall twenty-five fathom deep, and speaking softly, the water returned an audible echo. Bacon.

AUDIBLENESS, n. f. [from audible.] Capable-kind. Atterbury.

4. The reception of any man who delivers a solemn message.

In this high temple, on a chair of state,

The seat of audience, old Latinus fate. Dryden.

AUDIENCE COURT. A court belonging to the the archbishop of Canterbury, of equal authority with the arches court, though inferior both in dignity and antiquity. The original of this court was, because the archbishop of Canterbury heard several causes extrajudicially at home in his own palace; which he usually committed to be discussed by men learned in the civil and canon laws, whom he called his auditors: and so in time it became the power of the man, who is called causarum negotiorumque audientie Cantuariensis auditor, seu officialis. Cowell.

AUDIT, n. f. [from audit, he hears, Lat.] A final account.

If they, which are accustomed to weigh all things, shall here sit down to receive our audit, the sum, which truth amounteth to, will appear to be but this. Hooker.

He took my father grossly, full of bread,
With all his crimes broad blown, and flush as May;

And how his audit stands, who knows save heav'n?

Hamlet.

I can make my audit up, that all,

From me do back receive the flow'r of all,
And leave me but the bran. Shakespeare.

To AUDIT, v. a. [from audit.] To take an account finally.

Bishops ordinaries auditing all accounts, take twelve pence. Ayliffe's Parergon.

This neglected fear

Signal avengence, such as overtook

A miser. Philips.

AVENGEMENT. n. f. [from avenge.] Vengeance; revenge.

That he might work th' avengement for his shame

On those two caitives which had bred him blame. Sponfer.

All those great battles which thou boasts to win
Through strife and bloodshed, and avengement
Now praised, hereafter thou shalt repent. Fairy Queen.

AVENGER. n. f. [from avenge.]

1. Punisher.

That no man go beyond and defraud his brother, because that the Lord is the avenger of all such. 1 Thess.

Ere this he had return'd, with fury driv'n
By his avengers; since no place like this
Can fit his punishment, or their revenge. Milton.

2. Revenger; taker of vengeance for.

The just avenger of his injured ancestors, the victorious Louis was darting his thunder. Dryden.

But just disease to luxury succeeds

And ev'ry death its own avenger breeds. Pope.

AVENUE. n. f. [avenue, Fr. It is sometimes pronounced with the accent on the second syllable, as Watts observes; but has it generally placed on the first.]

1. A way by which any place may be entered.

Good guards were set up at all the avenues of the city to keep all people from going out. Clar.

Truth is a strong hold, and diligence is laying siege to it; so that it must observe all the avenues and pass to it. South.

2. An alley, or walk of trees before a house.

To AVE. v. a. [averer, Fr. from verum, truth, Lat.] To declare positively, or peremptorily.

The reason of the thing is clear;

Would Jove the naked truth aver. Prior.

Then vainly the philosopher avers,

That reason guides our deed, and instinct theirs.

How can we justly diff'rent causes frame,

When the effects entirely are the same? Prior.

We may aver, though the power of God be infinite, the capacities of matter are within limits. Bentley.

AVERAGE. n. f. [averagium, Lat.]

1. In law, that duty or service which the tenant is to pay to the king, or other lord, by his beasts and carriages. Chambers.

2. In navigation, a certain contribution that merchants proportionably make towards the losses of such as have their goods cast overboard for the safety of the ship in a tempest; and this contribution seems so called, because it is so proportioned, after the rate of every man's average or goods carried. Cowel.

3. A small duty which merchants, who send goods in another man's ship, pay to the master thereof for his care of them, over and above the freight. Chambers.

4. A medium; a mean proportion.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

AUSTERE. adv. [from austere.] Severely; rigidly.
Ah! Luciana, did he tempt thee so?
Might'st thou perceive, austerely in his eye,
That he did plead in earnest? Shakespeare.

Hypocrites austerely talk
Of purity, and place, and innocence. Par. Lost.

AUSTERE. n. f. [from austere.]

1. Severity; strictness; rigour.
My unfoi'd name, th' *austere*ness of my life,
May vouch against you; and my place i' th' state
Will to your accusation overweigh. Shakespeare.

If an indifferent and unridiculous object could draw this *austere*ness into a smile, he hardly could resist the proper motives thereof. Brown's Vul. Err.

2. Roughness in taste.

AUSTERITY. n. f. [from austere.]

1. Severity; mortified life; strictness.
Now, Marcus Cato, our new consul's spy,
What is your fower austerity sent t' explore?
Ben Jonson.

What was that snake-headed Gorgon shield
That wife Minerva wore, unconquer'd virgin,
Wherewith the freez'd her foes to congeal'd stone,
But rigid looks of chaste austerity,
And noble grace, that dash'd brute violence
With sudden adoration and blank awe? Milton.

This prince kept the government, and yet lived in this convent with all the rigour and austerity of a capuchin. Addison.

2. Cruelty; harsh discipline.
Let not austerity breed servile fear;
No wanton sound offend her virgin ear. Reformation.

AUTHOR. n. f. [auctor, Lat.]

1. The first beginner or mover of any thing; he to whom any thing owes its original.
That law, the author and observer whereof is one only God, to be blessed for ever. Hooker.

The author of that which causeth another thing to be, is author of that thing also which thereby is caused. Hooker.

I'll never
Be such a gosling to obey instinct; but stand
As if a man was author of himself,
And knew no other kin. Shakespeare. Coriol.

Thou art my father, thou my author, thou
My being gav'st me; whom should I obey,
But thee? Milton's Paradise Lost.

But Faunus came from Picus, Picus drew
His birth from Saturn, i' records be true.
Thus king Latinus, in the third degree,
Had Saturn author of his family. Dryden.

If the worship of false gods had not blinded the heathens, instead of teaching to worship the sun, and dead heroes, they would have taught us to worship our true Author and benefactor, as their ancestors did under the government of Noah and his sons, before they corrupted themselves. Newton.

2. The efficient; he that effects or produces any thing.
That which is the strength of their amity, shall prove the immediate author of their variance. Shakespeare.

Now while the tortur'd savage turns around,
And flings about his foam, impatient of the wound;
The wound's great author clofe at hand provokes
His rage. Dryden's Fables.

From his loins
New authors of diffention spring; from him
Two branches, that in hosting long contend
For sov'reign sway. Philips.

3. The first writer of any thing; distinct from the translator or compiler.
To stand upon every point in particulars, belongeth to the first author of the story. 2 Macc. ii. 30.

An author has the choice of his own thoughts and words, which a translator has not. Dryden.

4. A writer in general.
Yet their own authors faithfully affirm,
That the land Salike lies in Germany. Shakespeare.

AUTHORITATIVE. adj. [from authority.]

1. Having due authority.
2. Having an air of authority.

AUT

I dare not give them the authoritative title of aphorisms, which yet may make a reasonable moral prognostick. Wotton.

The mock authoritative manner of the one, and the insipid mirth of the other. Swift's Examin.

AUTHORITATIVELY. adv. [from authoritative.]

1. In an authoritative manner; with a shew of authority.

No law foreign binds in England, till it be received, and authoritatively engrafted, into the law of England. Hale.

AUTHORITATIVENESS. n. f. [from authoritative.] An acting by authority; authoritative appearance. Dict.

AUTHORITY. n. f. [auctoritas, Lat.]

1. Legal power.
Idle old man,
That still would manage those authorities
That he hath given away! Shakespeare. K. Lear.

Adam's sovereignty, that by virtue of being proprietor of the whole world, he had any authority over men, could not have been inherited by any of his children. Locke.

2. Influence; credit.
Power arising from strength, is always in those that are governed, who are many: but authority arising from opinion, is in those that govern, who are few. Temple.

The woods are fitter to give rules than cities, where those that call themselves civil and rational go out of their way, by the authority of example. Locke.

3. Power; rule.
I know, my Lord,
If law, authority, and pow'r deny not,
It will go hard with poor Antonio. Shakespeare.

But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence. 1 Tim. ii. 12.

4. Support; justification; countenance.
Do it thou expect th' authority of their voices,
Whose silent wills condemn thee? Ben Jonson.

5. Testimony.
Something I have heard of this, which I would be glad to find by to sweet an authority confirmed. Sidney.

We urge authorities in things that need not, and introduce the testimony of ancient writers, to confirm things evidently believed. Brown's Vulg. Errors.

Having been so hardy as to undertake a charge against the philosophy of the schools, I was liable to have been overcome by a torrent of authorities. Glanville's Sceptis.

6. Weight of testimony; credibility; cogency of evidence.
They consider the main consent of all the churches in the whole world, witnessing the sacred authority of the scriptures, ever since the first publication thereof, even till this present day and hour. Hooker.

AUTHORIZATION. n. f. [from authorize.] Establishment by authority.
The obligation of laws arises not from their matter, but from their admission and reception, and authorization in this kingdom. Hale.

TO AUTHORIZE. v. a. [autoriser, Fr.]

1. To give authority to any person.
Making herself an impudent sutor, authorizing herself very much, with making us see, that all favour and power depended upon her. Sidney.

Deaf to complaints they wait upon the ill.
Till some safe crisis authorize their skill. Dryden.

2. To make any thing legal.
Yourself first made that title which I claim,
First bid me love, and authorize my flame. Dryden.

I have nothing farther to desire,
But Sancho's leave to authorize our marriage. Dryden.

To have countenance in him irregularity and disobedience to that light which he had, would have been, to have authorized disorder, confusion, and wickedness in his creatures. Locke.

3. To establish any thing by authority.
Lawful it is to devise any ceremony, and to authorize authorize any kind of regiment, no special commandment being thereby violated. Hooker.

Those forms are best which have been longest received and authorized in a nation by custom and use. Temple.

4. To justify; to prove a thing to be right. All virtue lies in a power of denying our own desires, where reason does not authorize them. Locke.

5. To give credit to any person or thing. Although their intention be sincere, yet doth it notoriously strengthen vulgar error, and authorize opinions injurious unto truth. Brown's Vulg. Errors.

Be a person 'in vogue with the multitude, he shall authorize any nonsense, and make incoherent stuff, seasoned with twang and tautology, pass for rhetoric. South.

AUTOPTICAL. adj. [from autopsy.] Perceived by one's own eyes.

AUTOPTICALLY. adv. [from autoptical.] By means of one's own eyes.

Were this true, it would autoptically silence that dispute. Brown.

That the galaxy is a meteor, was the account of Aristotle; but the telescope hath autoptically confuted it; and he, who is not Pyrrhonian enough to the disbelief of his senses, may see that it is no exhalation. Glanville's Scipis.

AUTUMN. n. f. [autumnus, Lat.] The season of the year between summer and winter, beginning astronomically at the equinox, and ending at the solstice; popularly, autumn comprises August, September, and October.

For I will board her though she chide as loud

As thunder, when the clouds in autumn crack. Shakspeare.

I would not be over-confident, till he hath passed a spring or autumn. Wise man's Surgery.

The starving brood,
Void of sufficient sustenance, will yield

A slender autumn. Philips.

Autumn nodding o'er the yellow plain,
Comes jovial on. Thomson.

AUTUMNAL. adj. [from autumn.] Belonging to autumn; produced in autumn.

No spring, or summer's beauty, hath such grace,
As I have seen in one autumnal face. Donne.

Thou shalt not long
Rule in the clouds; like an autumnal star,

O'light'ning, thou shalt fall. Milton.

Bind now up your autumnal flowers, to prevent sudden gusts, which will prostrate all. Evelyn's Calendar.

Not the fair fruit that on yon branches glows,
With that ripe red th' autumnal sun bestows. Pope.

AVULSION. n. f. [avulsio, Lat.] The act of pulling one thing from another.

Spare not the little offsprings, if they grow
Redundant; but the thronging clusters thin

By kind avulsion. Philips.

The pressure of any ambient fluid can be no intelligible cause of the cohesion of matter; though such a pressure may hinder the avulsion of two polished superficies one from another, in a line perpendicular to them, Locke.

AUXESIS. n. f. [Latin.] An increasing; an exornation, when, for amplification, a more grave and magnificent word is put instead of the proper word. Smith's Rhetoric.

AUXILIAR. } adj. [from auxilium, Lat.] As-

AUXILIARY. } sistant; helping; confederate.

The giant brood,
That fought at Thebes, and Ilium on each side,

Mix'd with auxiliary gods. Milton's Par. Lost.

Their tractates are little auxiliary unto ours,
nor afford us any light to detenebrate this truth.

There is not the smallest capillary vein but it is present with, and auxiliary to it, according to its use. Hale's Origin of Mankind.

Nor from his patrimonial heav'n alone
Is Jove content to pour his vengeance down;

Aid from his brother of the seas he craves,
To help him with auxiliary waves. Dryden.

AUXILIAR. } n. f. [from auxilium, Lat.]

AUXILIARY. } Helper; assistant; confederate.

In the strength of that power, he might, without the auxiliaries of any further influence, have determined his will to a full choice of God. South.

There are, indeed, a sort of underling auxiliaries to the difficulty of a work, called commentators and critics. Pope.

AUXILIARY Verb. A verb that helps to conjugate other verbs.

In almost all languages, some of the commonest nouns and verbs have many irregularities; such are the common auxiliary verbs, to be and to have, to do and to be done, &c. Wallis.

AUXILIATION. n. f. [from auxiliatus, Lat.] Help; aid; succour. Dist.

TO AWAITE. v. a. [from a and wait. See WAIT.]

1. To expect; to wait for.

Even as the wretch condemn'd to lose his life,
Awaits the falling of the murd'ring knife. Fairf.

Between the rocky pillars Gabriel sat,
Chief of th' angelick guards, awaiting night. Milt.

2. To attend; to be in store for.

To shew thee what reward
Awaits the good; the rest, what punishment. Milton.

Unless his wrath be appeas'd, an eternity of torments awaits the objects of his displeasure. Rogers.

AWAITE. n. f. [from the verb.] Ambush. See WAIT.

And least mishap the most bliss alter may?
For thousand perils lie in close await

About us daily, to work our decay. Spenser.

TO AWAKE. v. a. [peccan, Sax. To awake has the preterite awoke, or, as we now more commonly speak, awaked.]

1. To rouse out of sleep.

Take heed,
How you awake our sleeping sword of war. Shak.

Our friend Lazarus sleepeth; but I go that I may awake him out of sleep. John, xi. 11.

2. To raise from any state resembling sleep.

Hark, hark, the horrid sound
Has rais'd up his head:

As awak'd from the dead,
And amaz'd he stares round. Dryden's St. Cecil.

3. To put into new action.

The spark of noble courage now awake,
And strive your excellent self to excel. Fairy Q.

The fair

Repairs her smiles, awakens ev'ry grace,
And calls forth all the wonders of her face. Pope.

TO AWAKE. v. n. To break from sleep; to cease to sleep.

Alack, I am afraid they have awak'd;
And 'tis not done! Shakspeare. Macbeth.

I awak'd up last of all, as one that gathereth after the grape-gatherers. Ecclus. xxxiii. 16.

AWAKE. adj. [from the verb.] Not being asleep; not sleeping.

Imagination is like to work better upon sleeping men, than men awake. Bacon.

Cares shall not keep him on the throne awake,
Nor break the golden slumbers he would take. Dryden.

TO AWA'KEN. v. a. and v. n. The same with Awake.

Awake Argantyr, Hervor the only daughter
Of thee and Suafu doth awaken thee. Hickes.

TO AWA'RD. v. a. [derived by Skinner, somewhat improbably, from peapn, Sax. towards.]

To adjudge; to give any thing by a judicial sentence.

A pound of that same merchant's flesh is thine;
The court awards it, and the law doth give it. Shakspeare.

It advances that grand business, and according to which their eternity hereafter will be awarded. Decay of Fifty.

A church which allows salvation to none without it, nor awards damnation to almost any without it. South.

Satisfaction for every affront cannot be awarded by stated laws. Collier on Duelling.

TO AWA'RD. v. n. To judge; to determine.

Th' unwife award to lodge it in the tower's,
An off'ring sacred. Pope's Odyssey.

AWA'RD. n. f. [from the verb.] Judgment; sentence; determination.

Now hear th' award, and happy may it prove
To her, and him who best deserves her love. Dryden.

Affection bribes the judgment, and we cannot expect an equitable award, where the judge is made a party. Glanville.

To urge the foe,
Prompted by blind revenge and wild despair,

Were to refuse th' awards of Providence. Addison's Cato.

AWA'RE. adv. [from a and ware; an old word for cautious; it is however, perhaps, an adjective; gepapuan, Sax.] Excited to caution; vigilant; in a state of alarm; attentive.

Ere I was aware, I had left myself nothing but the name of a king. Sidney.

Eere sorrow was aware, they made his thoughts bear away something else besides his own sorrow. Sidney's Arcadia.

Temptations of prosperity insinuate themselves; so that we are but little aware of them, and less able to withstand them. Atterbury.

TO AWA'RE. v. n. To beware; to be cautious.

So warn'd he then aware themselves; and Instant, without disturb, they took alarm. Purcell's Lull.

This passage is by others understood thus, He warned those who were aware, of themselves.

AWA'Y. adv. [apez, Sax.]

1. In a state of absence; not in any particular place.

They could make
Love to your dress, although your face were away. Ben Jonson's Cataline.

It is impossible to know properties that are so annexed to it, that any of them being away, that essence is not there. Locke.

2. From any place or person.

I have a pain upon my forehead here—
—Why that's with watching; 'twill away again. Shakspeare.

When the fowls came down upon the carcases,
Abraham drove them away again. Gen. xv. 11.

Would you youth and beauty stay,
Love hath wings, and will away. Waller.

Summer suns roll unperceiv'd away. Pope.

3. Let

A W F

3. Let us go.

Awy, old man; give me thy hand : awy ;
King Lear hath lost, he and his daughter ta'en ;
Give me thy hand. Come on.

Shakespeare's King Lear.

4. Begone.

Awy, and glister like the god of war,
When he intendeth to become the field.

Shakespeare's King John.

I'll to the woods among the happier brutes :
Come, let's awy ; hark, the shrill horn refoounds.

Smith's Phædra and Hippolitus.

Awy, you flatt'rer !

Nor charge his gen'rous meaning.

Roscoe's Jane Shore.

5. Out of one's own hands ; into the power of something else.

It concerns every man, who will not trifle awy his soul, and fool himself into irrecoverable mi-tery, to enquire into these matters.

Tillotson.

6. It is often used with a verb ; as, to drink awy an estate ; to idle awy a manor ; that is, to drink or idle till an estate or manor is gone.

He play'd his life awy. Pope.

7. On the way ; on the road : perhaps this is the original import of the following phrase.

Sir Valentine, whither awy to fast ? Shakef.

8. Perhaps the phrase, he cannot awy with, may mean he cannot travel with ; he cannot bear the company.

She never could awy with me.—Never, never : she would always say, she could not abide mafter Shallow. Shakespeare.

9. Awy with. Throw away ; take away.

If you dare think of deservng our charms, Awy with your sneephooks, and take to your arms. Dryden.

AWE. n. f. [eye, oza, Saxon.] Reverential fear ; reverence.

They all be brought up idly, without awe of parents, without precepts or masters, and without fear of offence. Spenser's State of Ireland.

This thought fixed upon him who is only to be feared, God : and yet with a filial fear, which at the same time both fears and loves : It was awe without amazement, and dread without distraction.

South.

What is the proper awe and fear, which is due from man to God ? Regers.

To AWE. v. a. [from the noun.] To strike with reverence, or fear ; to keep in subjection.

If you will work on any man, you must either know his nature and fashions, and so lead him :
or his ends, and to persuade him ; or his weaknesses and disadvantages, and so awe him ; or those that have interest in him, and so govern him.

Bacon.

Why then was this forbid ? Why, but to awe ?
Why, but to keep you low, and ignorant,

His worshippers. Milton.

Heav'n that hath plac'd this island to give law,
To balance Europe, and her states to awe.

Waller.

The rods and axes of princes, and their deputies, may awe many into obedience ; but the fame of their goodness, justice, and other virtues, will work on more.

Atterbury.

AWEBAND. n. f. [from awe and band.] A check. Ditt.

AWEFUL. adj. [from awe and full.]

1. That which strikes with awe, or fills with reverence.

So awful, that with honour thou may'st love
Thy mate ; who sees, when thou art seen least wife. Milton's Paradise Lost.

I approach thee thus, and gaze
Infatiate : I thus single ; nor have fear'd
Thy awful brow, more awful thus retir'd,
Fairest resemblance of thy Maker fair. Milton.

2. Worshipful ; in authority ; invested with dignity. This sense is obsolete.

Know then, that some of us are gentlemen,
Such as the fury of ungovern'd youth
Thrust from the company of awful men.

Shakespeare.

3. Struck with awe ; timorous ; scrupulous.
This sense occurs but rarely.

A W K

It is not nature and strict reason, but a weak and awful reverence for antiquity, and the vogue of fallible men. Watts.

AWEFULLY. adv. [from awful.] In a reverential manner.

It will concern a man, to treat this great principle awfully and warily, by still observing what it commands, but especially what it forbids.

South.

AWEFULNESS. n. f. [from awful.]

1. The quality of striking with awe ; solemn-nity.

These objects naturally raise seriousness ; and night heightens the awfulness of the place, and pours out her supernumerary horrors upon every thing. Addison.

2. The state of being struck with awe : little used.

An help to prayer, producing in us reverence and awfulness to the divine majesty of God.

Taylor's Rule of living holy.

TO AWHOLE. v. a. [This word I have met with only in Spenser, nor can I discover whence it is derived ; but imagine, that the Teutonic language had anciently swapan, to smite, or some such word, from which weapons, or offensive arms, took their denomination.] To strike ; to confound ; to terrify.

Ah ! my dear gossip, answer'd then the ape,
Deeply do your sad words my wits awhale,
Both for because your grief doth great appear,
And eke because myself am touched near.

Hubbard's Tale.

AWHOLE. adv. [This word, generally reputed an adverb, is only awhile, that is, a time, an interval.] Some time ; some space of time.

Stay, stay, I say ;
And if you love me, as you say you do,
Let me persuade you to forbear awhile. Shakef.

Into this wild abyss the wary fiend
Stood on the brink of hell, and look'd awhile, Pond'ring his voyage. Milton's Paradise Lost.

AWK. adj. [A barbarous contraction of the word awkward.] Odd ; out of order.

We have heard as arrant jangling in the pulpits, as the steeple ; and professors ringing as awk as the bells to give notice of the conflagration.

L'Estrange.

AWKWARD. [adj. απαρῆς, Saxon ; that is,
backward, untoward.]

1. Inelegant ; unpolite ; untaught ; ungenteel.

Proud Italy,
Whose manners fill our tardy, apish nation
Limps after in base awkward imitation. Shakef.

Their own language is worthy their care ; and they are judged of by their handsome or awkward way of expressing themselves in it. Locke.

An awkward shame, or fear of ill usage, has a share in this conduct. Swift.

2. Unready ; unhandy ; not dexterous ; clumsy.

Slow to resolve, but in performance quick ;
So true, that he was awkward at a trick. Dryden.

3. Perverse ; untoward ;
A kind and constant friend
To all that regularly offend ;
But was implacable, and, awkward,
To all that interlop'd and hawker'd. Hadibras.

A'WKWARDLY. adv. [from awkward.] Clumsily ; unready ; inelegantly ; ungainly.

Dametas nodding from the waite upwards, and swearing he never knew man go more awkwardly to work. Sidney.

When any thing is done awkwardly, the common saying will pass upon them, that it is suitable to their breeding. Locke.

If any pretty creature is void of genius, and would perform her part but awkwardly, I must nevertheless insist upon her working. Addison.

She still renews the ancient scene ;
Forgets the forty years between ;
Awkwardly gay, and oddly merry ;
Her scarf pale pink, her headknot cherry.

Prior.

If a man be taught to hold his pen awkwardly, yet writes sufficiently well, it is not worth while to teach him the accurate methods of handling that instrument. Watts's Improvement of the Mind.

A W R

A'WKWARDNESS. n. f. [from awkward.] Inelegance ; want of gentility ; oddness ; unfuitable-
ness.

One may observe awkwardness in the Italians, which easily discovers their airs not to be natural.

Addison.

All his airs of behaviour have a certain awkwardness in them ; but these awkward airs are worn away in company.

Watts's Improvement of the Mind.

AWL. n. f. [ale, ale, Sax.] A pointed instrument to bore holes.

He which was minded to make himself a perpetual servant, should, for a visible token thereof, have also his ear bored through with an awl.

Hecker.

You may likewise prick many holes with an awl, about a joint that will lie in the earth.

Motimer's Husbandry.

A'WLESS. adj. [from awe, and the negative less.]

1. Wanting reverence ; void of respectful fear.

Against whose fury, and th' unmatched force,
The awless lion could not wage the fight. Shakef.

He claims the bull with awless infolence,
And having seiz'd his horns, accosts the prince.

Dryden.

2. Wanting the power of causing reverence.

Ah me ! I see the ruin of my house ;
The tyger now hath seiz'd the gentle hind ;
Insulting tyranny begins to jut
Upon the innocent and awless throne.

Shakespeare's Richard III.

AWME, or AUME. n. f. A Dutch measure of capacity for liquids, containing eight steekians, or twenty verges or verteels ; answering to what in England is called a tierce, or one-sixth of a ton of France, or one-seventh of an English ton. Chambers.

AWN. n. f. [awila, Lat.] The beard growing out of the corn or grafs.

A'WNING. n. f. A cover spread over a boat or

And she said, the Philistines be upon thee,
Sampson. And he awke out of his sleep.

Judges, xvi. 20.

A'W'RK. adv. [from a and work.] On work ;
into a state of labour ; into action.

So after Pyrrhus' pause,
Aroused vengeance sets him new awork. Shakef.

By prescribing the condition, it sets us awork to the performances of it, and that by living well.

Hammond.

A'WORKING. adj. [from awork.] Into the state of working.

Long they thus travelled, yet never met
Adventure which might them aworking set.

Hubbard's Tale.

A'WRY. adv. [from a and wry.]

1. Not in a straight direction ; obliquely.

But her sad eyes still fast'ned on the ground,
Are governed with goodly modesty ;
That suffers not one look to glance awry,
Which may let in a middle thought unfound.

Spenser.

Like perspectives, which rightly gaz'd upon,
Shew nothing but confusion ; ey'd awry,
Distinguish form. Shakef. Richard II.

A violent cross wind, from either coast,
Blows them transverse ; ten thousand leagues awry
Into the devious air. Milton.

2. Atiquant ; with oblique vision.

You know the king
With jealous eyes has look'd awry

On his son's actions. Denham's Sophy.

I hap to step awry, where I see no path, and can discern but few steps afore me. Brewster.

4. Not equally between two points ; unevenly.

Not tyrant's fierce that unrepenting die,
Not Cynthia when her manteau's pinn'd awry,
Ere felt such rage. Pope.

5. Not according to right reason ; perversely.

All awry, and which wried it to the most wry course of all, wit abused, rather to feign reason why

A X I

why it should be amiss, than how it should be amended. Sidney.

Much of the foul they talk, but all away,
And in themselves seek virtue, and to themselves
All glory arrogate, to God give none. Milton.

AXE. n. f. [eas, acre, Sax. afra, Lat.] An instrument consisting of a metal head, with a sharp edge, fixed in a helve or handle, to cut with. No metal can,

No, not the hangman's axe, bear half the keenness
Of thy sharp envy. Shakespeare.

There stood a forest on the mountain's brow,
Which overlook'd the shaded plains below;
No founding axe presum'd these trees to bite,
Coeval with the world, a venerable fight. Dryden.

AXILLA. n. f. [axilla, Lat.] The cavity under the upper part of the arm, called the arm-pit. Quincy.

AXILLAR. adj. [from axilla, Lat.] Belonging to the arm-pit.
AXILLARY. adj. [from axilla, Lat.] Belonging to the arm-pit.

AXILLARY. adj. [from axilla, Lat.] Belonging to the arm-pit.

AXIOM. n. f. [axioma, Lat. ἀξίωμα, from ἀξίω, Gr.]

1. A proposition evident at first sight, that cannot be made plainer by demonstration.

Axioms, or principles more general, are such as this, that the greater good is to be chosen before the lesser. Hooker.

2. An established principle to be granted without new proof.

The axioms of that law, whereby natural agents are guided, have their use in the moral. Hooker.

Their affirmations are no axioms; we esteem thereof as things unaided, and account them but in list of nothing. Brown.

AXIS. n. f. [axis, Lat.] The line real or imaginary that passes through any thing, on which it may revolve.

But since they say our earth, from morn to morn,

On its own axis is oblig'd to turn;
That swift rotation must disperse in air
All things which on the rapid orb appear. Blackmore.

A Y E

It might annually have compassed the sun, and yet never have once turned upon its axis. Bentley.

On their own axis as the planets run,
And make at once the circle round the sun;
So two consistent motions act the soul,
And one regards itself, and one the whole. Pope.

AXLE. n. f. [axis, Lat.] The pin which

AXLE-TREE. n. f. [axis, Lat.] The pin which passes through the midst of the wheel, on which the circumvolutions of the wheel are performed.

Venerable Nestor
Should with a bond of air, strong as the axle-tree
On which heav'n rides, knit all the Grecians ears
To his experienc'd tongue. Shakespeare.

The fly sat upon the axle-tree of the chariot-wheel, and said, What a dust do I raise! Bacon.

And the gilded car of day
His glowing axle doth allay
In the steep Atlantick stream. Milton.

He saw a greater fun appear,
Than his bright throne or burning axle-tree could bear. Milton's Christ's Nativity.

AY. adv. [perhaps from aio, Lat.]

1. Yes; an adverb of answering affirmatively.

Return you thither?
—Ay, madam, with the swiftest wing of speed. Shakespeare.

What say'st thou? Wilt thou be of our comfort?
Say ay; and be the captain of us all. Shakespeare.

2. It is a word by which the sense is enforced; even; yes, certainly; and more than that.

Remember it, and let it make thee crest fall'n;
Ay, and allay this thy abortive pride. Shakespeare.

AYE. adv. [aya, Saxon.] Always; to eternity; for ever. It is now rare used, and only in poetry.

And now in darksome dungeon, wretched thrall,
Remediless for aye he doth him hold. Fairy Queen.

Either prepare to die,
Or on Diana's altar to protest,
For aye, austerly and single life. Shakespeare.

The foul, though made in time, survives for aye;
And though it hath beginning, fees no end. Sir J. Davies.

A Z U

And hears the mufes, in a ring,
Eye round about Jove's altars sing. Milton.

Th' astonish'd mariners aye ply the pump;
No stay, nor rest, till the wide breach is clos'd. Philips.

A'Y GREEN. n. f. The fame with boufeleek; which see. DiG.

A'YRY. n. f. The nest of the hawk.
I should discourse on the brancher, the haggard, and then treat of their several ayries. Walton's Angler.

A'ZIMUTH. n. f. [Arab.]

1. The azimuth of the sun, or of a star, is an arch between the meridian of the place, and any given vertical line.

2. Magnetical Azimuth, is an arch of the horizon contained between the sun's azimuth circle and the magnetical meridian; or it is the apparent distance of the sun from the north or south point of the compass.

3. Azimuth Compass, is an instrument used at sea for finding the sun's magnetic azimuth.

4. Azimuth Dial, is a dial whose stile or gnomon is at right angles to the plane of the horizon.

5. Azimuths, called also vertical circles, are great circles intersecting each other in the zenith and nadir, and cutting the horizon at right angles, in all the points thereof. Chambers.

AZURE. adj. [azur, Fr. azzurro, Span. azul, Arab. from lazuli, a blue stone.] Blue; faint blue.

Like pomels round of marble clear,
Where azure'd veins well mixt appear. Sidney.

The blue of the first order, though very faint and little, may be the colour of some substance; and the azure colour of the skies seems to be this order. Newton.

Thus replies
Minerva, graceful with her azure eyes. Pope.

The sea,
Far through his azure turbulent domain,
Your empire owns. Thomson.

B.

B A B

B. The second letter of the English alphabet, is pronounced as in most other European languages, by pressing the whole length of the lips together, and forcing them open with a strong breath. It has a near affinity with the other labial letters, and is confounded by the Germans with P, and by the Gascons with V; from which an epigrammatist remarks, that bibere and vivere are in Gascony the same. The Spaniards, in most words, use B or V indifferently.

BAA. n. f. [See the verb.] The cry of a sheep.

—Therefore thou art a sheep—
Such another proof would make me cry baa. Shakespeare.

To BAA. v. n. [bala, Lat.] To cry like a sheep.

Or like a lamb, whose dam away is fet,
He treble baas for help, but none can get. Sidney.

To B'BBLE. v. n. [babbeln, Germ. babiller, Fr.]

1. To prattle like a child; to prate imperfectly.

My babbling praises I repeat no more,
But hear, rejoice, stand silent, and adore. Prior.

2. To talk idly, or rationally.

John had conned over a catalogue of hard words: these he used to babble indifferently in all companies. Arbuthnot.

B A B

Let the silent sanctuary show,
What from the babbling schools we may not know. Prior.

3. To talk thoughtlessly; to tell secrets.

There is more danger in a reserved and silent friend, than in a noisy babbling enemy. L'Estrange.

4. To talk much.

The babbling echo mocks the hounds,
Replying thrilly to the well tun'd horns,
As if a double hunt were heard at once. Shakespeare.

And had I power to give that knowledge birth,
In all the speeches of the babbling earth. Prior.

The babbling echo had defc'd his face;
She, who in other's words her silence breaks. Add.

B'BBLE. n. f. [babil, Fr.] Idle talk; senseless prattle.

This babble shall not henceforth trouble me;
Here is a coil with protestation! Shakespeare.

Come, no more,
This is meer moral babble. Milton.

With volleys of eternal babble,
And clamour more unanswerable. Hudibras.

The babble, impertinence and folly, I have taken notice of in disputes. Glanville.

B'BBLEMENT. n. f. [from babble.] Senseless prate: empty words.

Deluded all this while with ragged notions and babblements, while they expected worthy and delightful knowledge. Milton.

B A B

B'BBLER. n. f. [from babble.]

1. An idle talker; an irrational prattler.

We hold our time too precious to be spent
With such a babbler. Shakespeare.

The apostle had no sooner proposed it to the masters at Athens, but he himself was ridiculed as a babbler. Rogers.

2. A teller of secrets.

Utterers of secrets he from thence debar'd;
Babblers of folly, and blazers of crime. Fairy Q.

Great babblers, or talkers, are not fit for trust. L'Estrange.

BABE. n. f. [baban, Welch; balbaard, Dutch.] An infant; a child of either sex.

Those that do teach your babes,
Do it with gentle means; and easy talks;
He might have chid me so: for, in good faith,
I am a child to chiding. Shakespeare.

Nor shall Sebastian's formidable name
Be longer us'd, to lull the crying babe. Dryden.

The babe had all that infant care beguiles,
And early knew his mother in her smiles. Dryden.

B'BBERY. adj. [from babe.] Finery to please a babe or child. 33

So have I seen trim books in velvet dight,
With golden leaves and painted babery.
Of feely boys, please unacquainted fight. Sidney.
BABISH. adj. [from babe.] Childish.
If he be bawful, and will soon bluff, they call him a babish and ill brought up thing. Ascham.
BABOON. n. f. [babouin, Fr.] It is supposed by Skinner to be the augmentation of babe, and to import a great babe. A monkey of the largest kind.
You had looked through the grate like a geminy of baboons. Shakespeare.
He cast every human feature out of his countenance, and became a baboon. Addison.
BABY. n. f. [See BABE.]
1. A child; an infant.

acini, or round soft balls, set close together like a bunch of grapes; as the uva marina. Ray.
BACCVOROUS. adj. [from bacca, a berry, and voros, to devour, Lat.] Devouring berries. Dict.
BACHELOR. n. f. [This is a word of very uncertain etymology, it not being well known what was its original sense. Junius derives it from baccator, foolish; Menage from bas chevalier, a knight of the lowest rank; Spelman, from baculus, a staff; Gujas, from bacellus, an allowance of provision. The most probable derivation seems to be from bacca laurus, the berry of a laurel or bay; bachelors being young, are of good hopes, like laurels in the berry. Dr. Lawrence observed, that Menage's etymology is much confirmed by the practice in our universities of calling a bachelor, Sir. In Latin, baccalaureus.]
1. A man unmarried.
Such separation
Becomes a virtuous bachelor and a maid. Shakespeare.
The haunting of dissolute places, or resort to courtesans, are no more punished in married men than in bachelors. Bacon.

sorrows of things, and to view in my mind the beginning and progress of a rising world. Burnet.
5. Again; in return.

The lady's mad; yet if 'twere so,
She could not sway her house, command her followers,
Take and give back affairs, and their dispatch,
With such a smooth, discreet, and stable bearing. Shakespeare.
6. Again; a second time.
This Cæsar found, and that ungrateful age,
With losing him, went back to blood and rage. Wallor.
The epistles being written from ladies forsaken by their lovers, many thoughts came back upon us in divers letters. Dryden.

BAGPIPE. n. f. [from bag and pipe; the wind being received in a bag.] A musical instrument, consisting of a leathern bag, which blows up like a foot-ball, by means of a port vent or little tube fixed to it, and stopped by a valve; and three pipes or flutes, the first called the great pipe or drone, and the second the little one; which pass the wind out only at the bottom; the third has a reed, and is played on by compressing the bag under the arm, when full; and opening or stopping the holes, which are eight, with the fingers. The bagpipe takes in the compass of three octaves. Chambers.

No banners but shirts, with some bad bagpipes instead of drum and fife. Sidney.

He heard a bagpipe, and saw a general animated with the sound. Addison's Freeholder.

BAGPIPER. n. f. [from bagpipe.] One that plays on a bagpipe.

Some that will evermore peep thro' their eyes, And laugh, like parrots, at a bagpiper. Shakespeare.

BAGUETTE. n. f. [Fr. a term of architecture.] A little round moulding, less than an astragal; sometimes carved and enriched.

TO BAIGNE. v. a. [bagner, Fr.] To drench; to soak: a word out of use.

B A I

The women forflow not to baigue them, unless they plead their heels, with a worie perfume than Jugurth found in the dungeon. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.

BAIL. n. f. [Of this word the etymologists give many derivations; it seems to come from the French bailler, to put into the hand; to deliver up, as a man delivers himself up in surety.]

Bail is the freeing or setting at liberty one arrested or imprisoned upon action either civil or criminal, under security taken for his appearance. There is both common and special bail; common bail is in actions of small prejudice, or flight proof, called common, because any sureties in that case are taken: whereas, upon causes of greater weight, or apparent speciality, special bail or surety must be taken. There is a difference between bail and mainprize; for he that is mainprized, is at large, until the day of his appearance: but where a man is bailed, he is always accounted by the law to be in their ward and custody for the time: and they may, if they will, keep him in ward or in prison at that time, or otherwise at their will. Corv.

Worry'd with debts, and past all hopes of bail, Th' unpy'd wretch lies rotting in a jail. Refcom.

And bribe with presents, or when presents fail, They fend their prostituted wives for bail. Dry.

TO BAIL. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To give bail for another.

Let me be their bail—

They shall be ready at your highness' will, To answer their suspicion—

Thou shalt not bail them. Shakespeare. Titus Andronicus.

2. To admit to bail.

When they had bailed the twelve bishops who were in the Tower, the house of commons, in great indignation, caused them immediately to be recommitted to the Tower. Clarendon.

BAILEY. adj. [from bail.] That may be set at liberty by bail or sureties.

BAILLIF. n. f. [a word of doubtful etymology in itself, but borrowed by us from baillie, Fr.]

1. A subordinate officer.

Lausanne is under the canton of Berne, governed by a bailiff sent every three years from the senate of Berne. Addison.

2. An officer whose business it is to execute arrests.

It many times happeneth, that, by the undersheriffs and their bailiffs, the owner hath incurred the forfeiture, before he cometh to the knowledge of the process that runneth against him. Bacon.

A bailiff, by mistake, seized you for a debtor, and kept you the whole evening in a spunging-house. Swift.

Swift as a bard the bailiff leaves behind. Pope.

3. An under-steward of a manor.

BAILLIWICK. n. f. [of baillie, Fr. and wic, Sax.] The place of the jurisdiction of a bailiff within his hundred, or the lord's franchise. It is that liberty which is exempted from the sheriff of the county, over which the lord of the liberty appointeth a bailiff. Corv.

A proper officer is to walk up and down his bailiwicks. Spenser.

There issued writs to the sheriffs, to return the names of the several land-owners in their several bailiwicks. Hale.

TO BAIT. v. a. [batan, Sax. baitzen, Germ.]

1. To put meat upon a hook, in some place, to tempt fish or other animals.

Oh, cunning enemy, that to catch a faint With faints dost bait thy hook! most dangerous Is that temptation that doth goad us on To sin in loving virtue. Shakespeare's Measure for Measure.

Let's be revenged on him; let's appoint him a meeting, give him a show of comfort in his suit, and lead him on with a fure baited delay, till he hath pawned his horses to mine host of the garter. Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor.

Many sorts of fishes feed upon insects, as is well known to anglers, who bait their hooks with them. Ray.

How

BAK

How are the sex improv'd in am'rous arts !
What new-found snares they bait for human hearts !
2. To give meat to one's self, or horses, on the road.

What so strong,
But wanting rest, will also want of might ?
The sun, that measures heaven all day long,
At night doth bait his steeds the ocean waves among.

To BAIT. v. a. [from baitre, Fr. to beat.]
1. To attack with violence.
Who seeming sorely chafed at his band,
As chained bear, whom cruel dogs do bait,
With idle force did fain them to withstand. Fairy Q.
I will not yield
To kiss the ground before young Malcolm's feet;
And to be baited with the rabble's curse.

2. To harass by the help of others; as, we bait a boar with matiffs, but a bull with bull-dogs.
To BAIT. v. n. To stop at any place for refreshment; perhaps this word is more properly bate; to abate speed.
But our desires tyrannical extortion,
Doth force us there to set our chief delightfulness,
Where but a baiting place is all our portion. Sid.
As one who on his journey baits at noon,
Tho' bent on speed: so here th' archangel paus'd.

In all our journey from London to his house,
we did not so much as bait at a whig inn.

To BAIT. v. n. [as an hawk.] To clap the wings; to make an offer of flying; to flutter.
All plum'd like estridges, that with the wind
Bated like eagles having lately bath'd;
Glittering in golden coats like images. Shakefp.
Hood my woman'd blood baiting in my cheeks
With thy black mantle; till strange love, grown bold, Thinks true love acted simple modesty. Shakef.

Another way I have to man my haggard,
To make her come, and know her keeper's call;
That is, to watch her, as we watch these kites,
That bait and beat, and will not be obedient.

BAIT. n. f. [from the verb.]
1. Meat set to allure fish, or other animals, to a snare.

The pleasant'st angling is to see the fish
Cut with her golden oars the silver stream,
And greedily devour the treacherous bait. Shakef.
2. A temptation; an enticement; allurements.
And that same glorious beauty's idle boast,
Is but a bait: such wretches to beguile. Spenser.
Taketith therewith the fowls of men, as with the baits. Hooker.
Sweet words I grant, baits and allurements sweet,
But greatest hopes with greatest crosses meet. Fairfax.

Fruit, like that
Which grew in paradise, the bait of Eve
Us'd by the tempter. Milton.

Secure from foolish pride's affected state,
And specious flattery's more pernicious bait. Ros.
Her head was bare,
But for her native ornament of hair,
Which in a simple knot was ty'd above:
Sweet negligence! unheeded bait of love! Dry.
Grant that others could with equal glory,
Look down with pleasures, and the baits of sense. Addison.

3. A refreshment on a journey.
BAIT. n. f. A kind of coarse open cloth stuff, having a long nap; sometimes frized on one side, and sometimes not frized. This stuff is without wale, being wrought on a loom with two treddles, like flannel. Chambers.
To BAKE. v. a. participle passive, baked or taken bacan, Sax. becken, Germ. supposed by Wachter to come from ba, which, in the Phrygian language, signified bread.]

1. To heat any thing in a close place; generally in an oven.

He will take thereof, and warm himself: yea he kindleth it, and baketh bread. Isaiah.
The difference of prices of bread proceeded from their delicacy in bread, and perhaps something in their manner of baking. Arbutnot.
2. To harden in the fire.
The work of the fire is a kind of baking; and whatsoever the fire baketh, time doth in some degree dissolve. Bacon.
3. To harden with heat.
With vehement furs
When dusty summer bakes the crumbling clods,
How pleasant 't, beneath the twisted arch,
To ply the sweet carouse! Philips.
The sun with flaming arrows pierc'd the flood,
And, darting to the bottom, bak'd the mud. Dry.

1. One of the six simple powers in mechanics, used principally for determining the difference of weight in heavy bodies. It is of several forms. Chambers.
2. A pair of scales.
A balance of power, either without or within a state, is best conceived by considering what the nature of a balance is. It supposes three things; first, the part which is held, together with the hand that holds it; and then the two scales, with whatever is weighed therein. Swift.
For when on ground the burden balance lies,
The empty part is lifted up the higher. Davies.
3. A metaphorical balance, or the mind employed in comparing one thing with another.
I have in equal balance justly weighed,
What wrongs our arms may do, what wrongs we suffer:
Griefs heavier than our offences. Shakef. Hen. IV.
4. The act of comparing two things, as by the balance.
Comfort arises not from others being miserable, but from this inference upon the balance, that we suffer only the lot of nature. L'Estrange.
Upon a fair balance of the advantages on either side, it will appear, that the rules of the gospel are more powerful means of conviction than such message. Atterbury.
5. The overplus of weight; that quantity by which, of two things weighed together, one exceeds the other.
Care being taken, that the exportation exceed in value the importation; and then the balance of trade must of necessity be returned in coin or bullion. Bacon's Advice to Villiers.
6. That which is wanting to make two parts of an account even; as, he stated the account with his correspondent, and paid the balance.
7. Equipoise; as, balance of power. See the second sense.
Love, hope, and joy, fair pleasure's smiling train,
Hate, fear, and grief, the family of pain;
These mix'd with art, and to due bounds confin'd,
Make and maintain the balance of the mind. Pope.

BALANCE. n. f. [balance, Fr. bilanx, Lat.]
1. One of the six simple powers in mechanics, used principally for determining the difference of weight in heavy bodies. It is of several forms. Chambers.
2. A pair of scales.
A balance of power, either without or within a state, is best conceived by considering what the nature of a balance is. It supposes three things; first, the part which is held, together with the hand that holds it; and then the two scales, with whatever is weighed therein. Swift.
For when on ground the burden balance lies,
The empty part is lifted up the higher. Davies.
3. A metaphorical balance, or the mind employed in comparing one thing with another.
I have in equal balance justly weighed,
What wrongs our arms may do, what wrongs we suffer:
Griefs heavier than our offences. Shakef. Hen. IV.
4. The act of comparing two things, as by the balance.
Comfort arises not from others being miserable, but from this inference upon the balance, that we suffer only the lot of nature. L'Estrange.
Upon a fair balance of the advantages on either side, it will appear, that the rules of the gospel are more powerful means of conviction than such message. Atterbury.
5. The overplus of weight; that quantity by which, of two things weighed together, one exceeds the other.
Care being taken, that the exportation exceed in value the importation; and then the balance of trade must of necessity be returned in coin or bullion. Bacon's Advice to Villiers.
6. That which is wanting to make two parts of an account even; as, he stated the account with his correspondent, and paid the balance.
7. Equipoise; as, balance of power. See the second sense.
Love, hope, and joy, fair pleasure's smiling train,
Hate, fear, and grief, the family of pain;
These mix'd with art, and to due bounds confin'd,
Make and maintain the balance of the mind. Pope.

BALE. n. f. [from bal, Welsh.]
1. To do the work of baking.
I keep his house, and I wash, wring, brew, bake, scour, dress meat, and make the beds, and do all myself. Shakespeare.

B A L

Hobbes, in the preface to his own bald translation, begins the praise of Homer when he should have ended it. Dryden's Fables, Preface.

And that, though labour'd, line must bald appear,

That brings ingrateful musick to the ear. Creech.

5. Mean; naked; without dignity; without value; bare.

What should the people do with these bald tribunes?

On whom depending, their obedience fails To th' greater bench. Shakespeare.

6. Bald was used by the northern nations, to signify the same as audax, bold; and is still in use. So Baldwin, and by inversion Winbald, is bald conqueror; Ethelbald, nobly bold; Eadbold, happily bold; which are of the same import as Thrasceas, Thrasymachus, and Thrasylulus, &c. Gibson.

BALDACHIN. n. f. [baldachino, Ital.] A piece of architecture, in form of a canopy, supported with columns, and serving as a covering to an altar. It properly signifies a rich silk. Du Cange.

A canopy carried over the host. Builder's Dictionary.

BA'LDOMONY. n. f. The same with GENTIAN.

BA'LDNESS. n. f. [from bald.]

1. The want of hair.

2. The loss of hair.

Which happen'd on the skin to light,

And there corrupting to a wound,

Spreads leprosy and baldness round. Swift.

3. Meanness of writing; inelegance.

BA'LDRICK. n. f. [Of uncertain etymology.]

1. A girdle. By some Dictionaries it is explained a braiche; but I have not found it in that sense.

Athwart his breast a baldrick brave he wore,

That shin'd like twinkling stars, with stones most precious rare. Fairy Queen.

A radiant baldrick o'er his shoulders ty'd,

Sustain'd the sword that glitter'd at his side. Pope.

2. The zodiac.

That like the twins of Jove, they seem'd in fight,

Which deck the baldrick of the heavens bright. Spenser.

BALE. n. f. [balle, Fr.] A bundle or parcel of goods packed up for carriage.

One hired an ass in the dog-days, to carry certain bales of goods to such a town. L'Estrange.

brought over from China. Woodward.

BALE. n. f. [bali, Sax. bale, Dan. bal, bol, Ice-landish.] Misery; calamity.

She look'd about, and seeing one in mail,

Arm'd to point, fought back to turn again;

For light she hated as the deadly bale. Fairy Q.

To BALE. v. n. A word used by the sailors, who bid bale out the water; that is, lave it out,

by way of distinction from pumping. Stinner.

I believe from baller, Fr. to deliver from hand to hand.

To BALE. v. n. [emballer, Fr. imballare, Ital.]

To make up into a bale.

BA'LEFUL. adj. [from bale.]

1. Full of misery; full of grief; sorrowful;

sad; woful.

Ah! luckless babe, born under cruel star,

And in dead parents baleful ashes bred. Fairy Q.

But when I feel the bitter baleful smart,

Which her fair eyes unawares do work in me,

I think that I a new Pandora see. Spenser.

Round he throws his baleful eyes,

That witness'd huge affliction and dismay,

Mix'd with obdurate pride and stedfast hate. Milton.

2. Full of mischief; destructive.

But when he saw his threat'ning was but vain,

He turn'd about, and search'd his baleful books again. Fairy Queen.

B A L

Boiling choler chokes,

By sight of these, our baleful enemies. Shakesp.

Unseen, unfelt, the fiery serpent skims;

Betwixt her linen and her naked limbs;

His baleful breath inspiring, as he glides. Dryd.

Happy lérne, whose most wholesome air

Poisons evenenom'd spiders, and forbids

The baleful toad, and vipers from her shore. Phil.

BA'LEFULLY. adv. [from baleful.] Sorrowful-ly; mischievously.

BALK. n. f. [balk, Dutch and Germ.] A great beam such as is used in building; a rafter over an outhouse or barn.

BALK. n. f. [derived by Skinner from valicare, Ital. to pass over.] A ridge of land left unploughed between the furrows, or at the end of the field.

To BALK. v. a. [See the noun.]

1. To disappoint; to frustrate; to elude.

Another thing in the grammar schools I see no use of, unless it be to balk young lads in learning languages. Locke.

Every one has a desire to keep up the vigour of his faculties, and not to balk his understanding by what is too hard for it. Locke.

But one may balk this good intent,

And take things otherwise than meant. Prior.

The prices must have been high; for a people so rich would not balk their fancy. Arbutnot.

Balk'd of his prey, the yelling monster flies,

And fills the city with his hideous cries. Pope.

Is there a variance? enter but his door,

Balk'd are the courts, and contest is no more. Pope.

2. To miss any thing; to leave untouched.

By grisly Pluto he doth swear,

He rent his clothes, and tore his hair;

And as he runneth here and there,

An acorn cup he greeteth;

Which soon he taketh by the stalk,

About his head he lets it walk,

Nor doth he any creature balk,

But lays on all he meeteth. Drayt. Nymphid.

knights,

Balk'd in their own blood, did Sir Walter see,

On Holmedon's plains. Shakesp.

BA'LKERS. n. f. [In fishery.] Men who stand on a cliff, or high place on the shore, and give a sign to the men in the fishing-boats, which way

the passage or shoal of herrings is. Cowel.

The pilchards are pursued by a bigger fish, called a plather, who leapeth above water, and bewrayed them to the balker.

Garcet's Survey of Cornwall.

BALL. n. f. [bol, Dan. bol, Dutch.]

Bal, diminutively Belin, the sun, or Apollo of the Celts, was called by the ancient Gauls Abellio.

Whatever was round, and in particular the head, was called by the ancients either Bál, or Bel, and likewise Bel and Bill. Among the modern Persians, the head is called Pole; and the Flemings still call the head Boile. Pole is the head or poll, and poll, is to turn. Ból, likewise signifies a round ball, whence bocul, and bell, and ball, which the Welsh term bol. By the Scotch also the head is named bol; whence the English bill is derived, signifying the beak of a bird. Figuratively, the Phrygians and Thuriens, by βᾶλον understood a king. Hence also, in the Syriack dialects, βᾶλ βᾶλ, and likewise Bál, signifies lord, and by this name also the sun; and in some dialects, ἡλ and ἡλ, whence ἡλ, and ἡλ, and ἡλ, and ἡλ, and also in the Celtick diminutive way of expression, ἡλ, ἡλ, and ἡλ, signified the sun;

and ἡλ, ἡλ, and ἡλ, the moon. Among the Teutonicks bol and bill have the same meaning; whence the adjective bolig, or bellig, is de-derived, and signifies divine or holy; and the aspiration being changed into f, the Romans form their

Sol. Baxter.

B A L

1. Any thing made in a round form, or approaching to round.

Worms with many feet, round themselves into balls under logs of timber, but not in the timber. Bacon.

Nor arms they wear, nor swords and bucklers wield,

But whirl from leathern strings huge balls of lead. Dryden.

Like a ball of snow tumbling down a hill, he gathered strength as he pass'd. Howell.

Still unripen'd in the dewy mines,

Within the ball a trembling water thines,

That through the crystal darts. Addison.

Such of those corpuscles as happened to combine into one mass, formed the metallick and mineral balls, or nodules, which we find. Woodward.

2. A round thing to play with, either with the hand or foot, or a racket.

Balls to the stars, and thralls to fortune's reign,

Turn'd from themselves, infected with their cage,

Where death is fear'd, and life is held with pain. Sidney.

Those I have seen play at ball, grow extremely earnest who should have the ball. Sidney.

3. A small round thing, with some particular mark, by which votes are given, or lots cast.

Let lots decide it.

For ev'ry number'd captive put a ball

Into an urn; three only black be there,

The rest, all white, are safe. Dryden.

Minos, the strict inquisitor appears;

Round in his urn the blended balls he rolls;

Absoves the just, and dooms the guilty souls. Dry.

4. A globe as, the ball of the earth.

Julius and Antony, those lords of all,

Low at her feet present the conquer'd ball. Gran.

Ye gods, what justice rules the ball?

Freedom and arts together fall. Pope.

5. A globe borne as an ensign of sovereignty.

Hear the tragedy of a young man, that by right ought to hold the ball of a kingdom; but, by fortune, is made himself a ball, tossed from misery to misery, from place to place. Bacon.

6. Any part of the body that approaches to roundness; as the lower and swelling part of the thumb, the apple of the eye.

Be subject to no sight but mine; invisible

To every eye ball elfe. Shakesp.

To make a stern countenance, let your brow bend so, that it may almost touch the ball of the eye. Peacham.

7. The skin spread over a hollow piece of wood, stuffed with hair or wool, which the printers dip

in ink, to spread it on the letters.

BALL. n. f. [bal, Fr. from ballare, low Lat.

from βᾶλ, to dance.] An entertainment of dancing, at which the preparations are made at the expence of some particular person.

If golden sconces hang not on the walls,

To light the costly suppers and the balls. Dryd.

He would make no extraordinary figure at a ball; but I can assure the ladies, for their consolation, that he has writ better verses on the sex than any man. Swift.

BA'LLAD. n. f. [balade, Fr.] A song.

Ballad once signified a solemn and sacred song,

as well as trivial, when Solomon's Song was called the ballad of ballads; but now it is applied to nothing but trifling verse. Watts.

An' I have not ballads made on you all, and sung to filthy tunes, may a cup of sack be my poison. Shakesp.

Like the sweet ballad, this amusing lay

Too long detains the lover on his way. Gay.

To BALLAD. v. n. [from the noun.] To make or sing ballads.

Saucy listers

Will catch at us like strumpets, and scall'd rhimers

Ballad us out o' tune. Shakesp.

BA'LLAD SINGER. n. f. [from ballad and sing.] One whose employment is to sing ballads in the streets.

No sooner 'gan he raise his tuneful song,

But lads and ladies round about him throng.

Not ballad-singer plac'd above the crowd,

Sings with a note so thrilling, sweet, and loud. Gay.

BAL'LEAST. n. f. [ballast, Dutch.]

1. Something put at the bottom of the ship to keep it steady to the centre of gravity.

There must be middle counsellors to keep things steady; for, without that ballast, the ship will roll too much. Bacon.

As for the ascent of a submarine vessel, this may be easily contrived, if there be some great weight at the bottom of the ship, being part of its ballast; which, by some cord within, may be loosened from it. Wilkins.

As when empty barks or billows float, With fandy ballast sailors trim the boat; So bees bear gravel stones, whose poising weight Steers through the whistling winds their steady flight. Dryden.

2. That which is used to make any thing steady. Why should he sink where nothing seem'd to press;

His lading little, and his ballast less. Swift.

To BAL'LAST. v. a. [from the noun.]

1. To put weight at the bottom of a ship, in order to keep her steady.

If this be so ballasted, as to be of equal weight with the like magnitude of water, it will be moveable. Wilkins.

2. To keep any thing steady.

Whilst thus to ballast love, I thought, And so more steadily I have gone, I saw I had love's pinnace overfraught. Donne.

Now you have given me virtue for my guide, And with true honour ballasted my pride. Dryden.

BALLETTE. n. f. [ballette, Fr.] A dance in which some history is represented.

BAL'LIARDS. n. f. [from ball and yard, or stick to push it with.] A play at which a ball is driven by the end of a stick; now corruptly called billiards.

With dice, with cards, with balliards, far unfit, With shuttlecocks, misseeming manly wit. Spenser.

2. [In architecture.] A ball or globe placed on the top of a pillar.

3. [In fireworks.] A ball of pasteboard, stuffed with combustible matter, which, when fired, mounts to a considerable height in the air, and then bursts into bright sparks of fire, resembling stars.

BALLOT. n. f. [ballote, Fr.]

1. A little ball or ticket used in giving votes, being put privately into a box or urn.

2. The act of voting by ballot.

To BALLOT. v. n. [balloter, Fr.] To choose by ballot, that is, by putting little balls or tickets, with particular marks, privately in a box; by counting which it is known what is the result of the poll, without any discovery by whom each vote was given.

No competition arriving to a sufficient number of balls, they fell to ballot some others. Wotton.

Giving their votes by balloting, they lie under no awe. Swift.

BALLOTA'TION. n. f. [from ballot.] The act of voting by ballot.

The election is intricate and curious, consisting of ten several ballotations. Wotton.

BALM. n. f. [baume, Fr. balsamum, Lat.]

BALM. } n. f. [melissa, Lat.] The name of BALM Mint. } a plant.

The species are, 1. Garden balm. 2. Garden balm, with yellow variegated flowers. 3. Stinking Roman balm, with softer hairy leaves. Miller.

BALM of Gilead.

1. The juice drawn from the balsam tree, by making incisions in its bark. Its colour is first white, soon after green; but when it comes to be old, it is of the colour of honey. The smell of it is agreeable and very penetrating; the taste of it bitter sharp, and astringent. As little issues from the plant by incision, the balm sold by the merchants, is made of the wood and green branches of the tree, distilled by fire, which is generally adulterated with turpentine. Culmet.

It seems to me, that the zori of Gilead, which we render in our bible by the word balm, was not the same with the balsam of Mecca, but only a better sort of turpentine, then in use for the cure of wounds and other diseases. Prideaux's Connections.

2. A plant remarkable for the strong balsamick scent, which its leaves emit, upon being bruised; whence some have supposed erroneously, that the balm of Gilead was taken from this plant. Miller.

To BALM. v. a. [from balm.]

1. To anoint with balm; or with any thing medicinal.

Balm his foul head with warm distilled waters, And burn sweet wood. Shakespeare.

2. To soothe; to mitigate; to allunge. Opprest nature sleeps:

This rest might yet have balm'd thy senses. Shakespeare.

BALMY. adj. [from balm.]

1. Having the qualities of balm.

Soft on the flow'ry herb I found me laid, In balm sweat; which with his beams the sun Soon dry'd. Milton.

2. Producing balm.

Let India boast her groves, nor envy we The weeping amber, and the balm tree. Pope.

The balnearies, and bathing-places, he exposteth unto the summer setting. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

BALNEATION. n. f. [from balneum, Lat. a bath.] The act of bathing.

As the head may be disturbed by the skin, it may the same way be relieved as is observable in balneations, and fomentations of that part. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

BALNEATORY. adj. [balnearius, Lat.] Belonging to a bath or stove.

BALLOTADE. n. f. The leap of an horse, so that when his fore-feet are in the air, he shews nothing but the shoes of his hinder-feet, without jerking out. A balloade differs from a capriole; for when a horse works at caprioles, he jerks out his hinder legs with all his force. Farrier's Dict.

BALSAM. n. f. [balsamum, Lat.] Ointment; unguent; an unctuous application thicker than oil, and softer than salve.

Christ's blood our balsam; if that cure us here, Him when our judge, we shall not find severe. Denham.

BALSAM Apple. [momordica, Lat.] An annual Indian plant.

BALSAM Tree.

This is a shrub which scarce grows taller than the pomegranate tree; the blossoms are like small stars, very fragrant; whence spring out little pointed pods, inclosing a fruit like an almond, called carpobalsamum, as the wood is called xylobalsamum, and the juice opobalsamum. Gelsert.

BALSA'MICAL. } adj. [from balsam.] Having the BALSA'MICK. } qualities of balsam; unctuous; mitigating; soft; mild; oily.

If there be a wound in my leg, the vital energy of my soul thrusts out the balsamical humour of my blood to heal it. Hale.

The aliment of such as have fresh wounds ought to be such as keeps the humours from putrefaction, and renders them oily and balsamick. Arbutnot.

BAL'USTER. n. f. [according to du Cange, from balustrum, low Lat. a bathing-place.] A small column or pilaster from an inch and three quarters to four inches square or diameter. Their dimensions and forms are various; they are frequently adorned with mouldings; they are placed with rails on stairs, and in the fronts of galleries in churches.

This should first have been planched over, and railed about with balusters. Carew.

BAL'USTRADE. n. f. [from baluster.] An assemblage of one or more rows of little turned pillars, called balusters, fixed upon a terras, or the top of a building, for separating one part from another.

BAM, BEAM, being initials in the name of any place, usually imply it to have been woody; from the Saxon beam, which we use in the same sense to this day. Gibson.

BAMBOO. n. f. An Indian plant of the reed kind. It has several shoots much larger than our ordinary reeds, which are knotty, and separated from space to space by joints. The bamboo is much larger than the sugar-cane.

To BAMBOOZLE. v. a. [a cant word not used in pure or in grave writings.] To deceive; to impose upon; to confound.

After Nick had bamboozled about the money, John called for counters. Arbutnot.

BAMBOOZLER. n. f. [from bamboozle.] A tricking fellow; a cheat.

There are a set of fellows they call banterers and bamboozlers, that play such tricks. Arbutnot.

BAN. n. f. [ban, Teut. a publick proclamation, as of proscription, interdiction, excommunication, publick sale.]

1. Publick notice given of any thing whereby any thing is publickly commanded or forbidden. This word we use especially in the publishing matrimonial contracts in the church, before marriage, to the end that if any man can say against the intention of the parties, either in respect of kindred or otherwise, they may take their exception in time. And, in the canon law, banna sunt proclamationes sponsi & sponsæ in ecclesiis fieri soliti. Corwell.

I bar it in the interest of my wife; 'Tis she is subcontracted to this lord, And I her husband contradict your bans. Shakespeare.

To draw her neck into the bans. Hudibras.

2. A curse; excommunication. Thou mixture rank of midnight weeds collected, With Hecate's ban thrice blasted, thrice infected. Hamlet.

A great oversight it was of St. Peter that he did not accurse Nero, whereby the pope might have got all; yet what need of such a ban, since friar Vincent could tell Atabalipa, that kingdoms were the pope's. Raleigh.

3. Interdiction.

Bold deed to eye The sacred fruit, sacred to abstinence, Much more to taste it, under bans to touch. Milton.

4. Ban of the Empire; a publick capture by which the privileges of any German prince are suspended.

He proceeded so far by treaty, that he was proffered to have the imperial ban taken off Ad-tapinus, upon submission. Horvel.

To BAN. v. a. [bannen, Dut. to curse.] To curse; to excommunicate.

Shall we think that it bans the work which they they leave behind them, or taketh away the use thereof? Hooker.

It is uncertain whether this word, in the foregoing sense, is to be deduced from ban, to curse, or bane, to poison.

In thy closet pent up, rue my shame
And ban our enemies, both mine and thine. Shakesp.

Before these Moors went a Numidian priest, bel-lowing out charms, and casting scrowls of paper on each side, wherein he curst and banned the Christians. Knolles.

BANA'NA Tree. A species of plantain.

BAND. n. f. [bende, Dutch; band, Saxon.]

1. A tie; a bandage; that by which one thing is joined to another.

You shall find the band, that seems to tie their friendship together, will be the very frangler of their amity. Shakesp.

2. A chain by which any animal is kept in restraint. This is now usually spelt, less properly, band.

So wild a beast, so tamely taught to be,
And buxom to his bands, is joy to see.

Hubbard's Tale.

Since you deny him entrance, he demands
His wife, whom cruelly you hold in bands. Dryden.

3. Any means of union or connexion between persons.

Here's eight that must take hands

To join in Hymen's bands. Shakesp.

4. Something worn about the neck; a neck-cloth. It is now restrained to a neckcloth of particular form worn by clergymen, lawyers, and students in colleges.

For his mind I do not care,

That's a toy that I could spare:

Let his title be but great,

His cloaths rich, and band fit neat. Ben Jonson.

He took his lodging at the mansion-house of a tailor's widow, who waxes and can clear-starch his bands. Addison.

5. Any thing bound round another.

In old statues of stone in cellars, the feet of them being bound with leaden bands, it appeared that the lead did swell. Bacon.

6. In architecture. Any flat low member of moulding, called also fascia, face, or plinth.

7. A company of soldiers.

And, good my lord of Somerset, unite

Your troops of horsemen with his bands of foot.

Shakesp.

8. A company of persons joined together in any common design.

We few, we happy few, we band of brothers.

Shakesp.

The queen in white array before her band,
Saluting took her rival by the hand. Dryden.

On a sudden, methought this select band sprang forward, with a resolution to climb the ascent, and follow the call of that heavenly musick. Tatler.

Strait the three bands prepare in arms to join,
Each band the number of the sacred Nine. Pope.

To BAND. v. a. [from band.]

1. To unite together into one body or troop.

The bishop, and the duke of Gloster's men,
Have fill'd their pockets full of pebble stones,
And banded themselves in contrary parts,
Do pelt at one another's pates. Shakesp.

Some of the boys banded themselves as for the major, and others for the king, who, after six days skirmishing, at last made a composition, and departed. Carew.

They to live exempt
From heaven's high jurisdiction, in new league
Banded against his throne. Milton.

2. To bind over with a band.

And by his mother stood an infant lover,
With wings unfeeld, his eyes were banded over.

Dryden.

BANDS of a Saddle, are two pieces of iron nailed upon the bows of the saddle, to hold the bows in the right situation.

BANDAGE. n. f. [bandage, Fr.]

1. Something bound over another.

Zeal too had a place among the rest, with a bandage over her eyes; though one would not have expected to have seen her represented in frow. Addison.

Cords were fastened by hooks to my bandages,
which the workmen had girt round my neck.

Gulliver.

2. It is used, in surgery, for the fillet or roller wrapped over a wounded member; and, sometimes, for the art or practice of applying bandages.

BANDBOX. n. f. [from band and box.] A flight box used for bands and other things of small weight.

My friends are surprised to find two bandboxes among my books, till I let them see that they are lined with deep erudition. Addison.

With empty bandbox she delights to range,
And feigns a distant errand from the 'Change.

Gay's Trivia.

BANDITTO. n. f. in the plural banditti [bandito, Ital.]

A Roman sworder, and banditto slave, Murder'd sweet Tully. Shakesp.

BANDOG. n. f. [from ban, or band, and dog. The original of this word is very doubtful. Caius, De Canibus Britannicis, derives it from band, that is, a dog chained up. Skinner inclines to deduce it from bana, a murderer. May it not come from ban, a curse, as we say a curst cur; or rather from band, swelled or large, a Danish word; from whence,
in some counties they call a great nut a ban-nut.]
A kind of large dog.

The time of night when Troy was set on fire,
The time when screech-owls cry, and bandogs
howl. Shakesp.

Or privy, or pert, if any bin,
We have great bandogs will tear their skin. Spens.

BANDOLIERS. n. f. [bandouliers, Fr.] Small wooden cases covered with leather, each of them containing powder that is a sufficient charge for a musket.

streamer; the little fringed silk flag that hangs on a trumpet.

BANDY. n. f. [from bander, Fr.] A club turned round at bottom for striking a ball at play.

To BANDY. v. a. [probably from bandy, the instrument with which they strike balls at play, which being crooked, is named from the term
bander; as, bander un arc, to string or bend a bow.]

1. To beat to and fro, or from one to another.

They do cunningly, from one hand to another,
bandy the service like a tennis ball. Spenser.

And like a ball bandy'd 'twixt pride and wit,
Rather than yield, both sides the prize will quit.

Denham.

What, from the tropicks, can the earth repel?
What vigorous arm, what repercussive blow
Bandy the mighty globe still to and fro? Blackmore.

2. To exchange; to give and take reciprocally.

Do you bandy looks with me, you rascal? Shakesp.

'Tis not in thee
To grudge my pleasures, to cut off my train,
To bandy hasty words. Shakesp.

3. To agitate; to toss about.

This hath been to banded amongst us, that one can hardly miss books of this kind. Locke.

the most plain and certain propositions, be banded about in a disputation. Watts.

To BANDY. v. n. To contend, as at some game, in which each strives to drive the ball his own way.

No simple man that sees
This factious bandy of their favourites,
But that he doth preface some ill event. Shakesp.

A valiant son-in-law thou shalt enjoy:
One fit to bandy with thy lawless sons,
To ruffle in the commonwealth. Shakesp.

Could set up grandee against grandee,
To squander time away, and bandy;
Made lords and commoners lay sieges
To one another's privileges. Hudibras.

After all the bandying attempts of resolution, it is as much a question as ever. Glanville.

BANDYLEG. n. f. [from bander, Fr.] A crooked leg.

He tells aloud your greatest failing,
Nor makes a scruple to expose
Your bandyleg, or crooked nose. Swift.

BANDYLEGGED. adj. [from bandyleg.] Having crooked legs.

The Ethiopians had an one-eyed bandylegged prince; such a person would have made but an odd figure. Collier.

BANE. n. f. [bana, Sax. a murderer.]

1. Poison.

Begone, or else let me. 'Tis bane to draw
The fume air with thee. Ben Jonson.

All good to me becomes Bane; and in heav'n much worse would be my state. Milton.

They with speed,
Their course through thickest constellations held,
Spreading their bane. Milton.

Thus, am I doubly arm'd; my death and life,
My bane and antidote, are both before me:

This, in a moment, brings me to my end;
But that informs me I shall never die. Addison.

2. That which destroys; mischief; ruin.

And proves the source of all my miseries. Milton.

So entertain'd those odorous sweets the fiend,
Who came their bane. Milton.

Who can omit the Gracchi, who declare
The Scipios' worth, those thunderbolts of war,
The double bane of Carthage? Dryden.

False religion is, in its nature, the greatest bane and destruction to government in the world. South.

To BANE. v. a. [from the noun.] To poison.

What if my house be troubled with a rat,
And I be pleased to give ten thousand ducats
To have it ban'd? Shakesp.

BANEFUL. adj. [from bane and full.]

1. Poisonous.

For voyaging to learn the direful art,
To taint with deadly drugs the barbed dart;
Observant of the gods, and sternly just,
Thus refus'd 't' impart the baneful trust. Pope.

2. Destructive.

The silver eagle too is sent before,
Which I do hope will prove to them as baneful,
As thou conceiv'st it to the commonwealth. Ben Jonson.

The nightly wolf is baneful to the fold,
Storms to the wheat, to buds the bitter cold. Dryden.

BARGER. n. f. [from barge.] The manager of a barge.
Many wafarers make themselves glee, by putting the inhabitants in mind of this privilege;
who again, like the Campellians in the north,
and the London bargers, forflow not to baigne them. Carew's Survey of Cornwall.
BARK. n. f. [bark, Dan.]
1. The rind or covering of a tree.
Trees last according to the strength and quantity of their sap and juice; being well munit by their bark against the injuries of the air.
Bacon's Natural History.
Wand'ring in the dark,
Physicians for the tree have found the bark. Dryd.
2. A small ship. [from barca, low Lat.]
The duke of Parma must have flown, if he would have come into England; for he could neither get bark nor mariner to put to sea.
Bacon on the War with Spain.
It was that fatal and perfidious bark,
Built in th' eclipse, and rigg'd with curses dark,
That sunk so low that sacred head of thine. Milt.
Who to a woman trusts his peace of mind,
Trusts a frail bark with a tempestuous wind.
Granville.
To BARK. v. n. [heopan, Saxon.]
1. To make the noise which a dog makes when he threatens or pursues.
Sent before my time
Into this breathing world, scarce half made up,
And that so lamely and unfashionably,
That dogs bark at me. Shaksp.
Why do your dogs bark so? be there bears i' th' town? Shaksp. Merry Wives of Windsor.
In vain the herdman calls him back again;
The dogs stand off afar, and bark in vain. Cowley.
2. To clamour at; to pursue with reproaches.
Vile is the vengeance on the ashes cold,
And envy base, to bark at sleeping fame. Fairy Q.
You dare patronage
The envious barking of your faucy tongue,
Against my lord! Shaksp.
To BARK. v. a. [from the noun.] To strip trees of their bark.
The severest penalties ought to be put upon barking any tree that is not felled. Temple.
These trees, after they are barked, and cut into shape, are tumbled down from the mountains into the stream. Addison.
BARK-

BAR

BARK-BARED. adj. [from bark and bare.] Stripped of the bark.

Excorticated and bark-bared trees may be preserved by nourishing up a shoot from the foot, or below the stripped place cutting the body of the tree sloping off a little above the shoot, and it will heal, and be covered with bark. Mortimer.

BARKER. n. f. [from bark.]

1. One that barks or clamours.

What hath he done more than a base cur barked and made a noise? had a fool or two to spit in his mouth? But they are rather enemies of my fame than me, these barkers. Ben Jonson.

2. [from bark of trees.] One that is employed in stripping trees.

BARKY. adj. [from bark.] Consisting of bark; containing bark.

Ivy so entrings the barky fingers of the elm.

Shakespeare.

BARLEY. n. f. [derived by Junius from bar bordeum.]

It hath a thick spike; the calyx, husk, awn, and flower, are like those of wheat or rye, but the awns are rough; the seed is swelling in the middle, and, for the most part, ends in a sharp point, to which the husks are closely united. The species are, 1. Common long-eared barley. 2. Winter or square barley, by some called big. 3. Sprat barley, or battle-door barley. All these sorts of barley are sown in the spring of the year, in a dry time. In some very dry light land, the barley is sown early in March; but in strong clayey soils it is not sown till April. The square barley or big, is chiefly cultivated in the north of England, and in Scotland; and is harder than the other sorts. Miller.

Barley is emollient, moistening, and expectorating; barley was chosen by Hippocrates as a proper food in inflammatory distempers.

Arbutnot on Aliments.

BARLEYBRAKE. n. f. A kind of rural play.

By neighbours prais'd he went abroad thereby, At barleybrake her sweet swift feet to try. Sidney.

BARLEY BROTH. n. f. [from barley and broth.] A low word, sometimes used for strong beer.

Can fadden water,

A drench for furreyn'd jades, their barley broth, Decoct their cold blood to such valiant heat?

Shakespeare.

BARLEY CORN. n. f. [from barley and corn.] A grain of barley; the beginning of our measure of length; the third part of an inch.

A long, long journey, choak'd with breaks and thorns,

Ill measur'd by ten thousand barley corns. Tickell.

BARLEY MOW. n. f. [from barley and mow.] The place where reaped barley is stow'd up.

Whenever by yon barley mow I pass,

Before my eyes will trip the tidy lass. Gay.

BARM. n. f. [burn, Welch; beorn, Sax.] Yeast; the ferment put into drink to make it work; and into bread, to lighten and swell it.

Are you not he

That sometimes make the drink bear no barm, Miflead light wand'ers, laughing at their harm?

Shakespeare.

Try the force of imagination, upon staying the working of beer when the barm is put into it.

Bacon.

BARMY. adj. [from barm.] Containing barm; yeasty.

Their jovial nights in frolics and in play They pass, to drive the tedious hours away; And their cold stomachs with crown'd goblets cheer,

Dryden.

Of windy cider, and of barmy beer.

BARN. n. f. [beorn, Sax.] A place or house for laying up any sort of grain, hay, or straw.

In vain the barns expect their promis'd load, Nor barns at home, nor reeks are heap'd abroad.

Dryden.

I took notice of the make of barns here: having laid a frame of wood, they place, at the four corners, four blocks, in such a shape as neither mice nor vermin can creep up.

Addison.

BARNACLE. n. f. [probably of beorn, Sax. a child, and aac, Sax. an oak.]

BAR

1. A kind of shell fish that grow upon timber that lies in the sea.

2. A bird like a goose, fabulously supposed to grow on trees.

It is beyond even an atheist's credulity and impudence, to affirm that the first men might grow upon trees, as the story goes about barnacles; or might be the lice of some vast prodigious animals, whose species is now extinct. Bentley.

And from the most refin'd of faints,

As naturally grow miscreants,

As barnacles turn Soland geese

In th' islands of the Orcaides. Hudibras.

3. An instrument made commonly of iron for the use of farriers, to hold a horse by the nose, to hinder him from struggling when an incision is made. Farrier's Dict.

BAROMETER. n. f. [from bar, weight, and metron, measure.] A machine for measuring the weight of the atmosphere, and the variations in it, in order chiefly to determine the changes of the weather. It differs from the baroscope, which only shews that the air is heavier at one time than another, without specifying the difference. The barometer is founded upon the Torricellian experiment, so called from Torricelli the inventor of it, at Florence, 1643; it is a glass tube filled with mercury, horizontally sealed at one end: the other open and immersed in a basin of stagnant mercury; so that, as the weight of the atmosphere diminishes, the mercury in the tube will descend, and, as it encreases, the mercury will ascend; the column of mercury suspended in the tube, being always equal to the weight of the incumbent atmosphere.

The measuring the heights of mountains, and finding the elevation of places above the level of the sea hath been much promoted by barometrical experiments, founded upon that essential property of the air, its gravity or pressure. As the column of mercury in the barometer is counterpoised by a column of air of equal weight, so whatever causes make the air heavier or lighter, the pressure of it will be thereby increased or lessened, and of consequence the mercury will rise or fall. Harris.

Gravity is another property of air, whereby it counterpoises a column of mercury from twenty-seven inches and one half to thirty and one half, the gravity of the atmosphere varying one tenth, which are its utmost limits; so that the exact specific gravity of the air can be determined when the barometer stands at thirty inches, with a moderate heat of the weather. Arbutnot on Air.

BAROMETRICAL. adj. [from barometer.] Relating to the barometer.

He is very accurate in making barometrical and thermometrical instruments.

Derham's Physico-Theology.

BARON. n. f. [The etymology of this word is very uncertain. Baro, among the Romans, signified a brave warrior, or a brutal man; and, from the first of these significations, Menage derives baron, as a term of military dignity. Others suppose it originally to signify only a man; in which sense baron or varon, is still used by the Spaniards; and, to confirm this conjecture, our law yet uses baron and femme, husband and wife. Others deduce it from ber, an old Gaulish word, signifying commander; others from the Hebrew בָּרָא, of the same import. Some think it a contraction of par bonum, or peer, which seems least probable.]

1. A degree of nobility next to a viscount. It may be probably thought, that antiently, in England, all those were called barons, that had such signiories as we now call court barons. And it is said, that, after the conquest, all such came to the parliament, and sat as nobles in the upper house. But when, by experience, it appeared, that the parliament was too much crouded with such multitudes, it became a custom, that none should come, but such as the king, for their extraordinary wisdom or quality, thought good to call by writ; which writ ran hac vice tantum. After that, men, seeing that this state of nobility was but casual, and depending merely on the prince's pleasure, obtained of the king letters patent of this dignity to them and their heirs male: and these were called barons by letters patent or by creation; whose posterity are now those barons that are called lords of the parliament; of which kind the king may create more at his pleasure. It is nevertheless thought, that there are yet barons by writ, as well as barons by letters patent, and that they may be discerned by their titles; the barons by writ being those, that to the title of lord have their own furnames annexed; whereas the barons by letters patent, are named by their baronies. These barons which were first by writ, may now justly also be called barons by prescription; for that they have continued barons, in themselves and their ancestors, beyond the memory of man. There are also barons by tenure, as the bishops of the land, who, by virtue of baronies annexed to their bishopricks, have always had place in the upper house of parliament, and are called lords spiritual.

2. Baron is an officer, as barons of the exchequer to the king: of these the principal is called lord chief baron, and the three others are his assistants, between the king and his subjects, in causes of justice, belonging to the exchequer.

3. There are also barons of the cinque ports; two to each of the seven towns, Hastings, Winchelsea, Rye, Romney, Hith, Dover, and Sandwich, that have places in the lower house of parliament. Cowel.

They that bear

The cloth of state above, are four barons Of the cinque ports. Shakespeare.

4. Baron is used for the husband in relation to his wife. Cowel.

5. A Baron of Beef is when the two sirloins are not cut asunder, but joined together by the end of the backbone. Dict.

BARONAGE. n. f. [from baron.]

1. The body of barons and peers.

His charters of the liberties of England, and of the forest, were hardly, and with difficulty, gained by his baronage at Staines, A. D. 1215. Hale.

2. The dignity of a baron.

3. The land which gives title to a baron.

BARONESS. n. f. [barones, Ital. baronessa, Lat.]

A baron's lady.

BARONET. n. f. [of baron and et, diminutive termination.] The lowest degree of honour that is hereditary; it is below a baron and above a knight; and has the precedency of all other knights, except the knights of the garter. It was first founded by king James I. A. D. 1611. Cowel. But it appears by the following passage, that the term was in use before though in another sense.

King Edward III. being bearded and crossed by the clergy, was advised to direct out his writs to certain gentlemen of the best abilities, entitling them therein barons in the next parliament. By which means he had so many barons in his parliament, as were able to weigh down the clergy; which barons were not afterwards lords, but baronets, as sundry of them do yet retain the name. Spenser.

BARONY. n. f. [baronnit, Fr. beorn, Sax.] That honour or lordship that gives title to a baron. Such are not only the fees of temporal barons, but of bishops also. Cowel.

BAROSCOPE. n. f. [baros, and scope.] An instrument to shew the weight of the atmosphere. See BAROMETER.

If there was always a calm, the equilibrium could only be changed by the contents; where the winds are not variable, the alterations of the baroscope are very small. Arbutnot.

BARRACAN. n. f. [barracan, or barracan, Fr.] A strong thick kind of camelot.

BARRACK. n. f. [barracca, Span.]

1. Little cabins made by the Spanish fishermen on the sea shore; or little lodges for soldiers in a camp.

2. It is generally taken among us for buildings to lodge soldiers.

BARRATOR. n. f. [from barat, old Fr. from which is still retained barateur, a cheat.] A wrangler and encourager of law-suits.

Will it not reflect as much on thy character

S &

Nic,

Nic, to turn barrator in thy old days, a stirrer up of quarrels amongst thy neighbours?

Arbutnot's History of F. Bull.
BA'RRATRY. n. f. [from barrater.] The practice or crime of a barrator; foul practice in law.

'Tis arrant barratry, that bears

Point blank an action 'gainst our laws. Hudibras.

BA'REEL. n. f. [baril, Welch.]

1. A round wooden vessel to be stopped close.

It hath been observed by one of the ancients, that an empty barrel knocked upon with the finger, giveth a diapason to the sound of the like barrel full. Bacon.

Trembling to approach

The little barrel, which he fears to broach. Dryden.

2. A particular measure in liquids. A barrel of wine is thirty-one gallons and a half; of ale, thirty-two gallons; of beer, thirty-six gallons, and of beer vinegar, thirty-four gallons.

3. [In dry measure.] A barrel of Essex butter contains one hundred and six pounds; of Suffolk butter, two hundred and fifty-six. A barrel of herrings should contain thirty-two gallons wine measure, holding usually a thousand herrings.

Several colleges, instead of limiting their rents to a certain sum, prevailed with their tenants to pay the price of so many barrels of corn, as the market went. Swift.

4. Any thing hollow; as, the barrel of a gun; that part which holds the shot.

Take the barrel of a long gun perfectly bored, set it upright with the breech upon the ground, and take a bullet exactly fit for it; then if you suck at the mouth of the barrel ever so gently, the bullet will come up so forcibly, that it will hazard the striking out your teeth. Digby.

5. A cylinder; frequently that cylinder about which any thing is wound.

Your string and bow must be accommodated to your drill; if too weak it will not carry about the barrel. Moxon.

6. Barrel of the Ear, is a cavity behind the tympanum, covered with a fine membrane. Di. 8.

To BA'REEL. v. a. [from the noun.] To put any thing in a barrel for preservation.

I would have their beef beforehand barrelled, which may be used as is needed. Spenser on Ireland.

Barrel up earth, and sow some seed in it, and put it in the bottom of a pond. Bacon.

BA'REEL-BELLIED. adj. [from barrel and belly.] Having a large belly.

Dauntless at empty noises; lofty neck'd, sharp headed, barrel-belly'd, broadly back'd. Dry.

BA'REEN. adj. [bare, Sax. naked; properly applied to trees or ground unfruitful.]

1. Without the quality of producing its kind; not prolific; applied to animals.

They hail'd him father to a line of kings.

Upon my head they plac'd a fruitless crown,

And put a barren sceptre in my gripe,

No son of mine succeeding. Shakespeare.

There shall not be male or female barren among you, or among your cattle. Deuteronomy.

2. Unfruitful; not fertile; sterile.

The situation of this city is pleasant, but the water is naught, and the ground barren. 2 Kings.

Telemachus is far from exalting the nature of his country; he confesses it to be barren. Pope.

3. Not copious; scanty.

Some schemes will appear barren of hints and matter, but prove to be fruitful. Swift.

4. Unmeaning; uninventive; dull.

There be of them that will make themselves laugh, to set on some quantity of barren spectators to laugh too. Shakespeare.

BA'REENLY. adv. [from barren.] Unfruitfully.

BA'REENNESS. n. f. [from barren.]

1. Want of offspring; want of the power of procreation.

I pray'd for children, and thought barrenness

In wedlock a reproach. Milton.

No more be mention'd then of violence

Against ourselves; and wilful barrenness,

That cuts us off from hope. Milton.

2. Unfruitfulness; sterility; infertility.

Within the self-same hamlet, lands have divers degrees of value, through the diversity of their fertility or barrenness. Bacon.

3. Want of invention; want of the power of producing any thing new.

The adventures of Ulysses are imitated in the Aeneids; tho' the accidents are not the same, which would have argued him of a total barrenness of invention. Dryden.

4. Want of matter; scantiness.

The importunity of our adversaries hath constrained us longer to dwell than the barrenness of so poor a cause could have seem'd either to require or to admit. Hooker.

5. [In theology.] Aridity; want of emotion or sensibility.

The greatest saints sometimes are fervent, and sometimes feel a barrenness of devotion. Taylor.

Whoe'er I woo, myself would be his wife. Shakespeare.

BARRICA'DE. n. f. [barricade, Fr.]

1. A fortification made in haste, of trees, earth, waggons, or any thing else, to keep off an attack.

2. Any stop; bar; obstruction.

There must be such a barricade, as would greatly annoy, or absolutely stop, the currents of the atmosphere. Derham.

To BARRICA'DE. v. a. [barricader, Fr.]

1. To stop up a passage.

Now all the pavement sounds with trampling feet,

And the mixt hurry barricades the street,

Entangled here, the waggon's lengthen'd team. Gay.

2. To hinder by stoppage.

A new volcano continually discharging that matter, which being till then barricaded up, and imprisoned in the bowels of the earth, was the occasion of very great and frequent calamities. Woodward.

BARRICA'DO. n. f. [barricada, Span.] A fortification; a bar; any thing fixed to hinder entrance.

The access was by a neck of land, between the sea on one part, and the harbour water, or inner sea, on the other; fortified clean over with a strong rampier and barricado. Bacon.

To BARRICA'DO. v. a. [from the noun.] To fortify; to bar; to stop up.

Faith found, faith shut

The dismal gates, and barricado'd strong! Milton.

He had not time to barricado the doors; so that the enemy entered. Clarendon.

The truth of causes we find so obliterated, that it seems almost barricaded from any intellectual approach. Harvey.

BA'RRIER. n. f. [barriere, Fr.] If is sometimes pronounced with the accent on the last syllable, but it is placed more properly on the first.

1. A barricade; an entrenchment.

Safe in the love of heav'n an ocean flows

Around our realm, a barrier from the foes. Pope.

2. A fortification, or strong place, as on the frontiers of a country.

The queen is guarantee of the Dutch, having possession of the barrier, and the revenues thereof, before a peace. Swift.

If you value yourself as a man of learning, you are building a most impassable barrier against improvement. Watts.

4. A bar to mark the limits of any place.

For jousts, and tourneys, and barriers, the glories of them are chiefly in the chariots, wherein the challengers make their entries. Bacon.

Prisoners to the pillar bound,

At either barrier plac'd; nor, captives made,

Be freed, or arm'd anew. Dryden.

5. A boundary; a limit.

But woe where'er to Cadmus may belong,

And fix, O muse, the barrier of thy song,

At Oedipus. Pope's Statius.

How inflexible varies in the grovelling swiney

Compar'd, half reasoning elephant! with thine:

'Twixt that and reason, what a nice barrier!

For ever separate, yet for ever near. Pope.

BA'RRISTER. n. f. [from bar.] A person qualified to plead causes, called an advocate or licentiate in other countries and courts. Outer barristers are pleaders without the bar, to distinguish them from inner barristers; such are the benchers, or those who have been readers, the counsel of the king, queen, and princes, who are admitted to plead within the bar. A counsellor at law. Blount. Chambers.

BA'RRON. n. f. bepepe, Sax. supposed by Skinner to come from bar.] Any kind of carriage moved by the hand, as a hand-barrow; a frame of boards, with handles at each end, carried between two men, a wheel-barrow; that which one man pushes forward by raising it upon one wheel.

Have I lived to be carried in a basket, like a barrow of butcher's offal, and thrown into the Thames? Shakespeare.

No barrow's wheel

Shall mark thy stocking with a miry trace. Gay.

BA'RRON. n. f. [bepepe, Sax.] A hog; whence barrow greafe, or hog's lard.

BARROW, whether in the beginning or end of names of places, signifies a grove; from beapere, which the Saxons used in the same sense. Gilpin.

BARROW is likewise used in Cornwall for a hillock, under which, in old times, bodies have been buried.

To BA'RTER. v. n. [baratter, Fr. to trick in traffick; from barat, craft, fraud.] To traffick by exchanging one commodity for another, in opposition to purchasing with money.

As if they scorn'd to trade and barter,

By giving or by taking quarter. Hudibras.

A man has not every thing growing upon his soil, and therefore is willing to barter with his neighbour. Gellius.

To BA'RTER. v. a.

1. To give any thing in exchange for something else.

For him was I exchang'd and ransom'd;

But with a safer man of arms by far,

Once, in contempt, they would have barter'd me. Shakespeare.

Then as thou wilt dispose the rest,

To those who, at the market rate,

Can barter honour for estate. Prior.

I see nothing left us, but to truck and barter our goods, like the wild Indians, with each other. Swift.

2. Sometimes it is used with the particle away before the thing given.

If they will barter away their time, methinks they should at least have some ease in exchange. Decay of Piety.

He also bartered away plums that would have rotted in a week, for nuts that would last good for his eating a whole year. Locke.

BA'RTER. n. f. [from the verb.] The act or practice of trafficking by exchanging of commodities; sometimes the thing given in exchange.

From England they may be furnished with such things as they may want, and, in exchange or barter, send other things, with which they may abound. Bacon.

He who corrupteth English with foreign words, is as wise as ladies that change plate for china; for which, the laudable traffick of old clothes is much the fairest barter. Felton.

BA'RTERER. n. f. [from barter.] He that trafficks by exchange of commodities.

BA'RTERY. n. f. [from barter.] Exchange of commodities.

BA'RTAM. n. f. A plant; the same with pelitory.

BA'RTON. n. f. The demesne lands of a manour; the manour-house itself; and sometimes the out-house. Blount.

BASE. adj. [bas, Fr. basso, Ital. basso, Span. basso, low Latin; basus.]

1. Mean; vile; worthless: of things.
The harvest white plumb is a base plumb, and the white date plumb are no very good plumbs.

Bacon.

Pyreicus was only famous for counterfeiting all base things, as earthen pitchers, a scullery; whereupon he was surnamed Rupographus. Peacham.

2. Of mean spirit; dissingenuous; illiberal; ungenerous; low; without dignity of sentiment: of persons.

Since the perfections are such in the party I love, as the feeling of them cannot come unto any un noble heart; shall that heart, lifted up to such a height, be counted base? Sidney.

It is base in his adventures thus to dwell upon the excellencies of a passion. Atterbury.

3. Of low station; of mean account; without dignity of rank; without honour.

If the lords and chief men degenerate, what shall be hoped of the peasants and base people?

Spenser on Ireland.

If that rebellion

Came like itself, in base and abject routs,
You reverend father, and these noble lords,
Had not been here. Shakespeare.

It could not else be, I should prove to base,
To sue and be denied such common grace. Shaksf.

And I will yet be more vile than this, and will be base in mine own fight. 2 Sam.

Insurrections of base people are commonly more furious in their beginnings. Bacon.

He whose mind

Is virtuous, is alone of noble kind;
Though poor in fortune, of celestial race,
And he commits the crime who calls him base. Dryden.

4. Base-born; born out of wedlock, and by consequence of no honourable birth; illegitimate.

Why bastard? wherefore base?

When my dimensions are as well compact
As honest madam's issue. Shakespeare.

This young lord lost his life with his father in the field, and with them a base son. Camden's Remains.

5. Applied to metals: without value. It is used in this sense of all metal except gold and silver.

A guinea is pure gold, if it has nothing but gold in it, without any alloy or base metal. Watts.

6. Applied to sounds: deep; grave. It is more frequently written bass, though the comparative baser seems to require base.

In pipes, the lower the note holes be, and the further from the mouth of the pipe, the more base found they yield. Bacon.

BASE-BORN. adj. Born out of wedlock.

But see thy base-born child, thy babe of shame.
Who, left by thee, upon our parish came. Gay.

BASE-COURT. n. f. [bas cour, Fr.] Lower court; not the chief court that leads to the house; the back-yard; the farm-yard.

My lord, in the base-court he doth attend,
To speak with you. Shakespeare.

BASE-MINDED. adj. Mean spirited; worthless. It signifies, as it seemeth, no more than abject, base-minded, false-hearted, coward, or nidget.

Camden's Remains.

BASE-VIOL. n. f. [usually written bass-viol.] An instrument which is used in concerts for the base sound.

At the first grin he cast every human feature out of his countenance; at the second, he became the head of a base-viol. Addison.

BASE. n. f. [bas, Fr. basis, Lat.]

1. The bottom of any thing; commonly used for the lower part of a building, or column.

What if it tempt thee tow'rd the flood, my lord?

Or to the dreadful summit of the cliff,
That beetles o'er his base into the sea. Shaksf.

Firm Dorick pillars found your solid base;
The fair Corinthian crowns the higher space. Dryden.

And all below is strength, and all above is grace,

Columns of polish'd marble firmly set,
On golden bases, are his legs and feet. Prior.

2. The pedestal of a statue.

Men of weak abilities in great place, are like little statues set on great bases, made the less by their advancement. Bacon.

Mercury was patron of flocks, and the ancients placed a ram at the base of his images. Broome.

3. That part of any ornament which hangs down, as housings.

Phalastus was all in white, having his bases and caparison embroidered. Sidney.

4. The broad part of any body; as the bottom of a cone.

5. Stockings, or perhaps the armour for the legs, from bas, Fr.

Nor shall it e'er be said that wight,
With gauntlet blue and bases white;
And round blunt truncheon by his side,
So great a man at arms defy'd. Hudibras.

6. The place from which racers or titlers run; the bottom of the field; the carcer, the starting-post.

He said; to their appointed base they went;
With beating heart th' expecting sign receive,
And, starting all at once, the barrier leave. Dryden.

7. The string that gives a base sound.

At thy well sharpen'd thumb, from shore to shore,

The trebles squeak for fear, the bases roar. Dry.

BASTION. n. f. [bastion, Fr.] A huge mass of earth, usually faced with fods, sometimes with brick, rarely with stone, standing out from a rampart, of which it is a principal part, and was anciently called a bulwark.

Toward : but how? ay there's the question; Fierce the assault, unarm'd the bastion.

BAT. v. a. [bat, Sax. This word seems to have given rise to a great number of words in many languages; as, baitre, Fr. to beat; baton, battle, beat, batty, and others. It probably signified a weapon that did execution by its weight, in opposition to a sharp edge; whence cut-bat and brick-bat.] A heavy stick or club.

A handsome bat he held
On which he leaned, as one far in eld.

They were fried in arm chairs, and their bones broken with bats.

BAT. n. f. [vespertilio, the etymology unknown.] An animal having the body of a mouse and the wings of a bird; not with feathers, but with a sort of skin which is extended. It lays no eggs, but brings forth its young alive, and suckles them. It never grows tame, feeds upon flies, insects, and fatty substances, such as candles; oil; and cheese; and appears only in the summer evenings when the weather is fine.

When owls do cry,
On the bat's back do I fly.
But then grew reason dark; that fair star no more

Could the fair forms of good and truth discern;
Bats they became who eagles were before;
And this they got by their desire to learn.

Some animals are placed in the middle betwixt two kinds, as bats, which have something of birds and beasts.

Where swallows in the winter season keep,
And how the drowsy bat and dormouse sleep.

BAT-FOWLING. n. f. [from bat and fowl.] A particular manner of birdcatching in the nighttime, while they are at roost upon perches, trees, or hedges. They light torches or straw, and then beat the bushes; upon which the birds flying to the flames, are caught either with nets or otherwise.

You would lift the moon out of her sphere, if she would continue in it five weeks without changing.—We should so, and then go a bat-fowl-ing.

Bodies lighted at night by fire, must have a brighter lustre than by day; as facking of cities, bat-fowling.

BATH. n. f. [bad, Saxon.]

1. A bath is either hot or cold, either of art or nature. Artificial baths have been in great esteem with the ancients, especially in complaints to be relieved by revulsion, as inveterate head-aches, by opening the pores of the feet, and also in cutaneous cases. But the modern practice has greatly recour'd to the natural baths; most of which abound with a mineral sulphur, as appears from their turning silver and copper blackish. The cold baths are the most convenient springs, or reservoirs, of cold water to wash in, which the ancients had in great esteem; and the present age can produce abundance of noble cures performed by them.

Why may not the cold bath, into which they plunged themselves, have had some share in their cure?

2. A state in which great outward heat is applied to the body, for the mitigation of pain, or any other purpose.

In the height of this bath, when I was more than half stewed in grease like a Dutch dish, to be thrown into the Thames.

Sleep, the birth of each day's life, fore labour's bath,
Balm of hurt minds.

3. In chymistry it generally signifies a vessel of water, in which another is placed that requires a softer heat than the naked fire. Balneum Mariæ is a mistake, for balneum maris, a sea or water bath. A sand heat is sometimes called balneum siccum, or cinerum.

We see that the water of things distilled in water, which they call the bath, differeth not much from the water of things distilled by fire.

4. A sort of Hebrew measure, containing the tenth part of an homer, or seven gallons and four pints, as a measure for things liquid; and three pecks and three pints, as a measure for things dry.

Ten acres of vineyard shall yield one bath, and the feed of an homer shall yield an ephah.

TO BATHE. v. a. [badian, Saxon.]

1. To wash, as in a bath.

Be then, the naval stores, the nation's care,
New ships to build, and batter'd to repair.

Dryd.

2. To wear with beating.

Crowds to the castle mounted up the street,
Batt'ring the pavement with their courser's feet.

Dryden.

If you have a silver saucepan for the kitchen use, let me advise you to batter it well ; this will shew constant good house-keeping.

Swift's Directions to the Cook.

3. Applied to persons ; to wear out with service.

The batter'd veteran strumpets here,
Pretend at least to bring a modest ear.

Southern.

I am a poor old battered fellow, and I would willingly end my days in peace.

Arbuth. Hist. of John Bull.

As the same dame, experienc'd in her trade,
By names of toasts retails each batter'd jade.

Pope.

To BATTEN. v. n. A word used only by workmen.

The side of a wall, or any timber that bulges from its bottom or foundation, is said to batter.

Moxon.

BATTEN. n. f. [from To batter.] A mixture of several ingredients beaten together with some liquor ; so called from its being so much beaten.

One would have all things little, hence has try'd
Turkey poultis fresh from th' egg in batter fry'd.

King.

BATTENER. n. f. [from batter.] He that batters.

BATTERY. n. f. [from batter, or batteris, Fr.]

1. The act of battering.

Strong wars they make, and cruel battery bend,
'Gainst fort of reason, it to overthrow.

Fairy Q.

Earthly minds, like mud walls, resist the strongest batteries.

Locke.

2. The instruments with which a town is battered, placed in order for action ; a line of cannon.

Where is best place to make our batt'ry next ? —
—I think at the north gate.

Shaksp. Henry VI.

B A T

It plants this reasoning and that argument, this consequence and that distinction, like so many intellectual batteries, till at length it forces a way and passage into the obstinate inclosed truth.

South.

See, and revere th' artillery of heav'n,
Drawn by the gale, or by the tempest driven :

A dreadful fire the floating batt'ries make,
O'erturn the mountain, and the forest shake.

Blackmore.

3. The frame, or raised work, upon which cannons are mounted.

4. [In law.] A violent striking of any man. In an action against a striker, one may be found guilty of the assault, yet acquitted of the battery.

There may therefore be assault without battery ; but battery always implies an assault.

Chambers.

Why does he suffer this rude knave now to knock him about the sconce with a dirty shovel, and will not tell him of his action and battery ?

Shakspere.

Sir, quo' the lawyer, not to flatter ye,
You have as good and fair a battery,

As heart can wish, and need not shame
The proudest man alive to claim.

Hudibras.

BATTISH. adj. [from bat.] Resembling a bat.

To be out late in a battish humour.

Gentleman Instructed.

BATTLE. n. f. [bataille, Fr.]

1. A fight ; an encounter between opposite armies. We generally say a battle of many, and a combat of two.

The English army that divided was
Into two parts, is now conjoin'd in one ;

And means to give you battle presently.

Shaksp.

The battle done, and they within our power,
She'll never see his pardon.

Shakspere.

The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the strong.

Ecclesi.

So they joined battle, and the heathen being discomfited fled into the plain.

I Maccabees.

2. A body of forces, or division of an army.

The king divided his army into three battles ;
whereof the vanguard only, with the wings, came to fight.

Bacon.

3. The main body, as distinct from the van and rear.

Angus led the avant-guard, himself followed with the battle a good distance behind, and after came the arrier.

Hayward.

4. We say to join battle ; to give battle.

To BATTLE. v. n. [batailler, Fr.] To join battle ; to contend in fight.

'Tis ours by craft and by surprize to gain :
'Tis yours to meet in arms, and battle in the plain.

Prior.

We receive accounts of ladies battling it on both sides.

Addison.

I own, he hates an action base,
His virtues batt'ling with his place.

Swift.

BATTLE-ARRAY. n. f. [See BATTLE and ARRAY.] Array, or order of battle.

Two parties of fine women, placed in the opposite side boxes, seemed drawn up in battle-array one against another.

Addison.

BATTLE-AXE. n. f. A weapon used anciently, probably the same with a bill.

Certain tinnars, as they were working, found spear heads, battle-axes, and swords of copper,

Carew.

BATTLEDOOR. n. f. [so called from door, taken for a flat board, and battle, or striking.] An instrument with a handle and a flat board, used in play to strike a ball, or shuttlecock.

Play-things, which are above their skill, as tops, gigs, battledoors, and the like, which are to be used with labour, should indeed be procured them.

Locke.

BATTEMENT. n. f. [generally supposed to be formed from battle, as the parts from whence a building is defended against assailants ; perhaps only corrupted from battiment, Fr.] A wall raised round the top of a building, with embrasures, or interstices, to look through, to annoy an enemy.

And fixed his head upon our battlements.

Shakspere's Macbeth.

Thou shalt make a battlement for thy roof that thou bring not blood upon thy house, if any man fall.

B A W

Deuteronomy.

Through this we pass
Up to the highest battlement, from whence
The Trojans threw their darts.

Denham.

Their standard planted on the battlement,
Despair and death among the soldiers sent.

Dry.

No, I shan't envy him, who'er he be,
That stands upon the battlements of fate ;

I'd rather be secure than great.

Norris.

The weighty mallet deals refounding blows,
Till the proud battlements her tow'rs inclose.

Gay.

BATTY. adj. [from bat.] Belonging to a bat.

Till o'er their brows death counterfeiting sleep,
With leaden legs and batty wings doth creep.

Shakspere.

BAVAROY. n. f. A kind of cloak or furout.

Let the loop'd bavaroey the fop embrace,
Or his deep cloke be spatter'd o'er with lace.

Gay.

BAURIE. n. f. A word used in Scotland, and the northern counties, for a halfpenny.

Tho' in the draw'rs of my japan bureau,
To lady Gripeall I the Cæsars show,

'Tis equal to her ladyship or me
A copper Otho, or a Scotch baubee.

Brampst. Man of Taste.

BAVIN. n. f. [of uncertain derivation.] A stick like those bound up in faggots ; a piece of waste wood.

He rambl'd up and down
With shallow jesters and rash bavin wits,

Soon kindled, and soon burnt.

Shaksp. Hen. IV.

For moulded to the life in clouts,
Th' have pick'd from dunghills thereabouts,

He's mounted on a hazel bavin,
A crop'd malignant baker gave him.

Hudibras.

The truncheons make billet, bavin, and coals.

Mortimer.

To BAULK. See BALK.

BAUBLE. n. f. [Baubulum, in barbarous Latin, signified a jewel, or any thing valuable, but not necessary. Omnia Baubula sua dedit Otiboni. Hoveden. Probably from beau, Fr.] A gewgaw ; a trifling piece of finery ; a thing of more show than use ; a trifle. It is in general, whether applied to persons or things, a term of contempt.

She haunts me in every place. I was on the sea bank with some Venetians, and thither comes the baubli, and falls me thus about my neck.

Shakspere's Othello.

It is a paltry cap,
A custard coffin, a bauble, a silken pie.

Shakspere.

If, in our contest, we do not interchange useful notions, we shall traffick toys and baubles.

Government of the Tongue.

This shall be writ to fright the fry away,
Who draw their little baubles, when they play.

Dryden.

A lady's watch needs neither figures nor wheels ;
'Tis enough that 'tis loaded with baubles and seals.

Prior.

Our author then, to please you in your way,
Presents you now a bauble of a play,
In ginging rhyme.

Granville.

A prince, the moment he is crown'd,
Inherits every virtue round,

As emblems of the sovereign pow'r ;
Like other baubles of the Tow'r.

Swift.

BAWELING. adj. [from bauble.] Trifling ; contemptible : a word not now in use, except in conversation.

A bawbling vessel was he captain of,
For shallow draught and bulk unpriz'd ;

With which such scathful grapple did he make,
With the most noble bottom of our fleet.

Shaksp.

BAWCOCK. n. f. [perhaps from beau, or baud, and cock.] A familiar word, which seems to signify the same as fine fellow.

Why, how now, my bawcock ? how dost thou, chuck ?

Shakspere's Twelfth Night.

BAWD. n. f. [baude, old Fr.] A procurer, or procuress ; one that introduces men and women to each other, for the promotion of debauchery.

If

BAW

If your worship will take order for the drabs and the knaves, you need not to fear the bawds.
Shakespeare.

This commodity,
This bawd, this broker, this all-changing word,
Hath drawn him from his own determin'd aid.
Shakespeare.

Our author calls colouring lena fororis, the bawd of her sister design; she dresses her up, she paints her, she procures for the design, and makes lovers for her.
Dryden.

To BAWD. v. n. [from the noun.] To procure; to provide gallants with trumpeets.

Leucippe is agent for the king's lust, and bawds, at the same time, for the whole court.
Addison.

And in four months a batter'd harridan;
Now nothing's left, but wither'd, pale, and shrunk,
To bawd for others, and go shares with punk.
Swift.

BA'WDILY. adv. [from bawdy.] Obscenely.
BA'WDINESS. n. f. [from bawdy.] Obsceneness.

BA'WDRICK. n. f. [See BALDRICK.] A belt. Fresh garlands too, the virgins temples crown'd;
The youths gilt swords wore at their thighs, with silver bawdricks bound.
Chapman's Iliad.

BA'WDRY. n. f. [contracted from bawdery, the practice of a bawd.]

1. A wicked practice of procuring and bringing whores and rogues together.
Ayliffe.

Cheating and bawdery go together in the world.
L'Estrange.

2. Obscenity; unchaste language.
Pry'thee say on; he's for a jig, or a tale of bawdry, or he sleeps.
Shakespeare's Hamlet.

I have no fault: no bawdry he doth mean:
For witty, in his language, is obscene. Ben Jonson.
It is most certain, that barefaced bawdry is the poorest pretence to wit imaginable.
Dryden.

BA'WDY. adj. [from bawd.] Obscene; unchaste: generally applied to language.

The bawdy wind that kisses all it meets,
Is hush'd within the hollow mine of earth,
And will not hear't.
Shakespeare's Othello.

Only they,
That come to hear a merry bawdy play,
Will be deceiv'd.
Shakespeare.

Not one poor bawdy jest shall dare appear;
For now the batter'd veteran trumpets here
Pretend at least to bring a modest ear.
Southern.

BA'WDY-HOUSE. n. f. A house where traffick is made by wickedness and debauchery.

Has the pope lately shut up the bawdy-houses, or does he continue to lay a tax upon sin?
Dennis.

To BAWL. v. n. [ballo, Lat.]
1. To hoot; to cry with great vehemence, whether for joy or pain. A word always used in contempt.

They bawl for freedom in their senseless mood,
And still revolt when truth would set them free.
Milton.

To cry the cause up heretofore,
And bawl the bishops out of door.
Hudibras.

Through the thick shades th' eternal scribler bawls,
And shakes the statues on their pedestals.
Dryden.

From his lov'd home no lucre him can draw;
The senate's mad decrees he never saw;
Nor heard at bawling bars corrupted law.
Dryden.

Loud menaces were heard, and foul disgrace
And bawling infamy, in language base,
Till sense was lost in found, and silence fled the place.
Dryden's Fables.

So on the tuneful Margarita's tongue
The list'ning nymphs, and ravish'd heroes hung;
But cits and fops the heav'n-born musick blame,
And bawl, and hiss, and damn her into fame.
Smith.

I have a race of orderly elderly people, who can bawl when I am deaf, and tread softly when I am only giddy and would sleep.
Swift.

2. To cry as a froward child.

A little child was bawling, and a woman chiding it.
L'Estrange.

If they were never suffered to have what they cried for, they would never, with bawling and peevishness, contend for matter.

BAY

Locke.

My husband took him in, a dirty boy; it was the business of the servants to attend him, the rogue did bawl and make such a noise.
Arbut. Hist. of John Bull.

To BAWL. v. a. To proclaim as a crier.
It grieved me, when I saw labours which had cost so much, bawled about by common hawkers.
Swift.

BA'WREL. n. f. A kind of hawk.
BA'WSIN. n. f. A badger.
BAW. adj. [badius, Lat.]

A bay horse is what is inclining to a chestnut; and this colour is various, either a light bay or a dark bay, according as it is less or more deep. There are also coloured horses, that are called dappled bays. All bay horses are commonly called brown by the common people.

All bay horses have black manes, which distinguish them from the forrel, that have red or white manes.

There are light bays and gilded bays, which are somewhat of a yellowish colour. The chestnut bay is that which comes nearest to the colour of the chestnut.
Farrist's Dict.

My lord, you gave good words the other day of a bay courser I rode on. 'Tis yours because you liked it.
Shakespeare.

Poor Tom! proud of heart, to ride on a bay trotting horse over four inch'd bridges.
Shakespeare.

His colour'd grey
For beauty dappled, or the brightest bay.
Dryden.

BAY. n. f. [bay, Dutch.]
1. An opening into the land, where the water is shut in on all sides, except at the entrance.

A reverend Syracusan merchant
Who put unluckily into this bay.
Shakespeare.

We have also some works in the midst of the sea, and some bays upon the shore for some works, wherein is required the air and vapour of the sea.
Bacon.

Hail, sacred solitude, from this calm bay
I view the world's tempestuous sea.
Rescommon.

Here in a royal bed the waters sleep,
When tir'd at sea, within this bay they creep.
Dryden.

Some of you have bay.
Dryden.

2. A pond head raised to keep in store of water for driving a mill.

BAY. n. f. [abbai, Fr. signifies the last extremity; as, innocence est aux abbais. Boileau. Innocence is in the utmost distress. It is taken from abbai, the barking of a dog at hand, and thence signified the condition of a stag when the hounds were almost upon him.]

1. The state of any thing surrounded by enemies, and obliged to face them by an impossibility of escape.

This ship for fifteen hours, fate like a stag among hounds at the bay, and was besieged and fought with, in turn, by fifteen great ships.
Bacon's War with Spain.

Fair liberty, pursu'd and meant a prey,
To lawless power, here turn'd, and stood at bay.
Denham.

Nor flight was left, nor hopes to force his way;
Embolden'd by despair, he stood at bay;
Resolv'd on death, he dissipates his fears,
And bounds aloft against the pointed spears.
Dryden.

2. Some writers, perhaps mistaking the meaning, have used bay as referred to the assailant, for distance beyond which no approach could be made.

All, fir'd with noble emulation, strive;
And, with a storm of darts, to distance drive
The Trojan chief; who held at bay, from far
On his Vulcanian orb, sustain'd the war.
Dryden.

We have now, for ten years together, turned the whole force and expence of the war, where the enemy was best able to hold us at bay.
Swift.

BAY. n. f. In architecture, a term used to signify the magnitude of a building; as if a barn consists of a floor and two heads, where they lay corn, they call it a barn of two bays. These bays are from fourteen to twenty feet long, and floors from ten to twelve broad, and usually twenty feet long, which is the breadth of the barn.

If this law hold in Vienna ten years, I'll rent the fairest house in it after threepence a bay.
Shakespeare.

There may be kept one thousand bushels in each bay, there being sixteen bays, each eighteen feet long, about seventeen wide, or three hundred square feet in each bay.
Mortimer.

BAY Tree. [laurus, Lat.] The tree, as is generally thought, which is translated laurel, and of which honorary garlands were anciently made.

I have seen the wicked in great power, and spreading himself like a green bay tree.
Psalms.

BAY. n. f. A poetical name for an honorary crown or garland, bestowed as a prize for any kind of victory or excellence.

Beneath his reign shall Eudon wear the bays.
Pope.

To BAY. v. n. [abbayer, Fr.]
1. To bark as a dog at a thief, or at the game which he pursues.

And all the while she stood upon the ground,
The wakeful dogs did never cease to bay.
Fairy Q.

The hounds at nearer distance hoarsely bay'd;
The hunter, close pursu'd the visionary maid;
She rent the heav'n with loud laments, imploring aid.
Dryden's Fables.

2. [from bay an inclosed place.] To encompass about; to shut in.

We are at the stake,
And bay'd about with many enemies.
Shakespeare.

To BAY. v. a. To follow with barking; to bark at.

I was with Hercules and Cadmus once,
When in the wood of Crete they bay'd the boar
With hounds of Sparta.
Shakespeare.

If he should do so,
He leaves his back unarm'd, the French and Welsh
Baying him at the heels.
Shakespeare.

BAY Salt. Salt made of sea water, which receives its consistence from the heat of the sun, and is so called from its brown colour. By letting the sea water into square pits or basons, its surface being struck and agitated by the rays of the sun, it thickens at first imperceptibly, and becomes covered over with a slight crust, which hardening by the continuance of the heat, is wholly converted into salt. The water in this condition is scalding hot, and the crystallization is perfected in eight, ten, or at most fifteen days.
Chambers.

All eruptions of air, though small and slight, give sound, which we call crackling, puffing, spitting, &c. as in bay salt and bay leaves cast into fire.
Bacon.

BAY Window. A window jutting outward, and therefore forming a kind of bay or hollow in the room.

It hath bay windows transparent as barricadoes.
Shakespeare.

BAY Yarn. A denomination sometimes used promiscuously with woollen yarn.
Chambers.

BA'YARD. n. f. [from bay.] A bay horse. Blind bayard moves the mill.
Philips.

Seventy senators died
 By their proscriptions, Cicero being one. Shakel.
 He hath to-night been in unusual pleasure. Shakel.

Be what thou hop'st to be, or what thou art,
 Refrain to death, it is not worth enjoying. Shakel.
 Be but about

To say she is a goodly lady, and
 The justice of your hearts will add thereto,
 'Tis pity she is not honest, honourable. Shakel.
 Let them shew the former things what they be,
 that we may consider them. Isaiah.

Therefore be sure,
 Thou, when the bridegroom with his feastful friends
 Passes to bliss at the mid hour of night,
 Hast gain'd thy entrance, virgin wife and pure.

It is not easy to discern what such men would be at. Stillingfleet

To say a man has a clear idea of quantity, without knowing how great it is, is to say, he has the clear idea of the number of the sands, who knows not how many they be. Locke.

2. It is the auxiliary verb by which the verb passive is formed.

The wine of life is drawn, and the meer lees
 Left this vault to brag of. Shakel.

3. To exist; to have existence.

The times have been,
 That when the brains were out the man would die.

Here cease, ye pow'rs, and let your vengeance end,
 Troy is no more, and can no more offend. Dryden.

All th' impossibilities which poets
 Count to extravagance of loose description,
 Shall sooner be. Rowe.

To be content's his natural desire;
 He asks no angel's wing, nor seraph's fire. Pope.

4. To have something by appointment or rule.

If all political power be derived only from Adam, and be to descend only to his successive heirs, by the ordinance of God, and divine institution, this is a right antecedent and paramount to all government. Locke.

5. Let BE. Do not meddle with; leave untouched.

Let be, said he, my prey. Dryden.

BEACH. n. f. The shore; particularly that part that is dashed by the waves; the strand.

The fishermen that walk upon the beach,
 Appear like mice. Shakespeare's King Lear.

Deep to the rocks of hell, the gather'd beach
 They fastened, and the mole immense wrought on,
 Over the foaming deep. Milton.

They find the washed amber further out upon the beaches and shores, where it has been longer exposed. Woodward.

BEACHED. adj. [from beach.] Exposed to the waves.

Timon hath made his everlasting mansion
 Upon the beached verge of the salt flood;
 Which once a day, with his embossed froth,
 The turbulent surge shall cover. Shakespeare.

BEACHY. adj. [from beach.] Having beaches.

The beachy girdle of the ocean
 Too wide for Neptune's hips. Shakespeare.

BEACON. n. f. [beacon, Sax. from becn, a signal, and becan, whence beckon, to make a signal.]

1. Something raised on an eminence, to be fired on the approach of an enemy, to alarm the country.

His blazing eyes, like two bright shining shields,
 Did burn with wrath, and sparkled living fire;
 As two broad beacons set in open fields,
 Send forth their flames. Fairy Queen.

2. A piece of brass like a beak, fixed at the end of the ancient galleys, with which they pierced their enemies. It can now be used only for the fore-part of a ship.

With boiling pitch another, near at hand,
 From friendly Sweden brought, the seams instops;
 Which well laid o'er, the salt sea waves withstand,
 And shakes them from the rising beak in drops. Dryden.

3. A beak is a little shoe, at the toe, about an inch long, turned up, and fastened in upon the fore-part of the hoof. Furrier's Dict.

The king seemed to account of Perkin as a May-game, yet had given order for the watching of beacons upon the coasts, and erecting more where they stood too thin.

No flaming beacons cast their blaze afar,
 The dreadful signal of invasive war. G. y.

2. Marks erected, or lights made in the night, to direct navigators in their courses, and warn them from rocks, shallows, and sandbanks.

BEAD. n. f. [beade, prayer, Saxon.]

1. Small globes or balls of glass or pearl, or other substance, strung upon a thread, and used by the Romanists to count their prayers; from whence the phrase to tell beads, or to be at one's beads, is to be at prayer.

That aged dame, the lady of the place,
 Who all this while was busy at her beads. Fairy Q.

Thy voice I seem in every hymn to hear,
 With every bead I drop too soft a tear. Pope.

2. Little balls worn about the neck for ornament.

With scarfs and fans, and double charge of brav'ry,
 With amber bracelets, beads, and all such knav'ry. Shakespeare.

3. Any globular bodies.

Thy spirit within thee hath been so at war,
 That beads of sweat have stood upon thy brow. Shakespeare.

Several yellow lumps of amber almost like beads, with one side flat, had fastened themselves to the bottom. Boyle.

BEAD TREE. [Azedorach.] A plant.

BEADLE. n. f. [bydel, Sax. a messenger; bedeau, Fr. bedel, Sp. bedelle, Dutch.]

1. A messenger or servitor belonging to a court.

2. A petty officer in parishes, whose business it is to punish petty offenders.

A dog's obey'd in office.
 Thou rascal beadle, hold thy bloody hand:
 Why dost thou lash that whore? Shakespeare.

They ought to be taken care of in this condition, either by the beadle or the magistrate. Spectator.

Their common loves, a lewd abandon'd pack,
 The beadle's lash still flagrant on their back. Prior.

BEADROLL. n. f. [from bead and roll.] A catalogue of those who are to be mentioned at prayers.

The king, for the better credit of his espials abroad, did use to have them curfed by name amongst the beadroll of the king's enemies. Bacon's Henry VII.

BEADSMAN. n. f. [from bead and man.] A man employed in praying, generally in praying for another.

An holy hospital,
 In which seven beadjmen, that had vowed all
 Their life to service of high heaven's king. Fairy Q.

In thy danger,
 Commend thy grievance to my holy prayer;
 For I will be thy beadjman, Valentine. Shakespeare.

BEAGLE. n. f. [bigle, Fr.] A small hound with which hares are hunted.

The rest were various huntings.
 The graceful goddess was array'd in green;
 About her feet were little beagles seen,
 That watch'd with upward eyes the motions of their queen. Dryden's Fables.

To plains with well-bred beagles we repair,
 And trace the mazes of the circling hare. Pope.

BEAK. n. f. [bec. Fr. pig, Welch.]

1. The bill or horny mouth of a bird.

His royal bird
 Prunes the immortal wing, and cloyes his beak,
 As when his god is pleas'd. Shakespeare's Cymbeline.

He saw the ravens with their horny beaks
 Food to Elijah bringing. Milton's Par. Regained.

The magpye, lighting on the stock,
 Stood chattering with incessant din,
 And with her beak gave many a knock. Swift.

2. A piece of brass like a beak, fixed at the end of the ancient galleys, with which they pierced their enemies. It can now be used only for the fore-part of a ship.

With boiling pitch another, near at hand,
 From friendly Sweden brought, the seams instops;
 Which well laid o'er, the salt sea waves withstand,
 And shakes them from the rising beak in drops. Dryden.

3. A beak is a little shoe, at the toe, about an inch long, turned up, and fastened in upon the fore-part of the hoof. Furrier's Dict.

4. Any thing ending in a point like a beak; as the spout of a cup; a prominence of land.

Cuddenbeak, from a well advanced promontory, which entitled it beak, taketh a prospect of the river. Carow's Survey.

BE'AKED. adj. [from beak.] Having a beak; having the form of a beak.

And question'd every gust of rugged winds,
 That blows from off each beaked promontory. Milton.

BE'AKER. n. f. [from beak.] A cup with a spout in the form of a bird's beak.

And into pikes and musqueteers,
 Stamp'd beakers, cups and porringers. Hudibras.

With dulcet beverage this the beaker crown'd,
 Fair in the midst, with gilded cups around. Pope's Odyssey.

BEAL. n. f. [bolla, Ital.] A wheek or pimple.

To BEAL. v. a. [from the noun.] To ripen; to gather matter, or come to a head, as a sore does.

BEAM. n. f. [beam, Sax. a tree.]

1. The main piece of timber that supports the house.

A beam is the largest piece of wood in a building, which always lies cross the building or the walls, serving to support the principal rafters of the roof, and into which the feet of the principal rafters are framed. No building has less than two beams, one at each head. Into these, the girders of the garret floor are also framed; and if the building be of timber, the teazel-tensons of the posts are framed. The proportions of beams in or near London, are fixed by act of parliament. A beam fifteen feet long, must be seven inches on one side its square, and five on the other; if it be sixteen feet long, one side must be eight inches, the other six; and so proportionable to their lengths. Builder's Dict.

The building of living creatures is like the building of a timber house; the walls and other parts have columns and beams, but the roof is tile, or lead, or stone.

He heav'd, with more than human force, to move
 A weighty stone, the labour of a team,
 And rais'd from thence he reach'd the neighb'ring beam. Dryden.

2. Any large and long piece of timber; a beam must have more length than thickness, by which it is distinguished from a block.

But Lycus swifter,
 Springs to the walls and leaves his foes behind,
 And snatches at the beam he first can find. Dryden's Aeneid.

3. That part of a balance, at the ends of which the scales are suspended.

Poise the cause in justice' equal scales,
 Whose beam stands sure, whose rightful cause prevails. Shakespeare.

If the length of the sides of the balance, and the weights at the ends be both equal, the beam will be in horizontal situation: but if either the weights alone be equal, or the distances alone, the beam will accordingly decline. Wilkins.

4. The horn of a stag.

And taught the woods to echo to the stream
 His dreadful challenge, and his clashing beam. Denham.

5. The pole of a chariot; that piece of wood which runs between the horses.

Juturna heard, and seiz'd with mortal fear,
 Forc'd from the beam her brother's charioteer. Dryden.

Tell him his pranks have been too broad to bear with. Shakespeare.

Bear with me then, if lawful what I ask. Milton.

BEAR. n. f. [bepra, Saxon, ursus, Lat.]

1. A rough savage animal.

Some have falsely reported, that bears bring their young into the world shapeless, and that their dams lick them into form. The dams go no longer than thirty days, and generally produce five young ones. In the winter, they lie hid and asleep, the male forty days, and the female four months; and so soundly for the first fourteen days, that blows will not wake them. In the sleepy season, they are said to have no nourishment but from licking their feet. This animal has naturally an hideous look, but when enraged it is terrible; and, as rough and stupid as it seems to be, it is capable of discipline; it leaps, dances, and plays a thousand little tricks at the sound of a trumpet. They abound in Poland. In the remote northern countries the species is white. Calm.

Call hither to the stake my two brave bears,

Bid Salisbury and Warwick come to me.—

—Are these thy bears? we'll bait thy bears to death.

And manacle the bearward in their chains. Shak.

Thou'dst shun a bear;

But if thy flight lay tow'rd the raging sea,

Thou'dst meet the bear i' th' mouth. Shakespeare.

We are drawn on into a larger speech, by reason of their so great earnestness, who beat more and more upon these last alledged words. Hooker.

How frequently and fervently doth the scripture beat upon this cause? Hakevill.

10. To beat up; as, to beat up for soldiers. The word up seems redundant, but enforces the sense, the technical term being to raise soldiers.

BEAT, part. passive. [from the verb.]

Like a rich vessel beat by storms to shore,
'Twere madness should I venture out once more. Dryden.

BEAT. n. f. [from the verb.]

1. Stroke.

2. Manner of striking.

Albeit the base and treble strings of a viol be tuned to an unison; yet the former will still make a bigger sound than the latter, as making a broader beat upon the air. Grew.

He with a careless beat,
Struck out the mute creation at a heat. Dryden.

3. Manner of being struck; as, the beat of the pulse, or a drum.

BEATEN, partic. adj. [from To beat.]

What makes you, Sir, so late abroad,
Without a guide, and this no beaten road? Dry.

BEATER. n. f. [from beat.]

1. An instrument with which any thing is comminuted or mingled.

The best schoolmaster of our time, was the greatest beater. Ascham's Schoolmaster.

BEATIFICAL. adj. [beatificus, low Lat. from BEATIFICK.] beatus, happy.] That which has the power of making happy, or compleating fruition; blissful. It is used only of heavenly fruition after death.

Admiring the riches of heaven's pavement
Than ought divine or holy elfe, enjoy'd
In vision beatifick. Milton.

It is also their felicity to have no faith; for enjoying the beatifical vision in the fruition of the object of faith, they have received the full evacuation of it. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

We may contemplate upon the greatness and strangeness of the beatifick vision; how a created eye should be so fortified, as to bear all those glories that stream from the fountain of uncreated light. South.

BEATIFICALY. adv. [from beatifical.] In such a manner as to complete happiness.

Beatificaly to behold the face of God in the fullness of wisdom, righteousness and peace, is blessedness no way incident unto the creatures beneath man. Hakevill.

BEATIFICATION. n. f. [from beatifick.] A term in the Romish church, distinguished from canonization. Beatification is an acknowledgment made by the pope, that the person beatified is in heaven, and therefore may be revered as blessed: but is not a concession of the honours due to saints, which are conferred by canonization.

To BEATIFY. v. a. [beatifico, Lat.]

1. To make happy; to bless with the completion of celestial enjoyment.

The use of spiritual conference is unimaginable and unspeakable, especially if free and unrestrained, bearing an image of that conversation which is among angels and beatified saints. Hammond.

We shall know him to be the fullest good, the nearest to us, and the most certain; and, consequently, the most beatifying of all others. Brown.

I wish I had the wings of an angel, to have ascended into paradise, and to have beheld the forms of those beatified spirits, from which I might have copied my archangel. Dryden.

2. To settle the character of any person by a publick acknowledgment that he is received in heaven, though he is not invested with the dignity of a saint.

Over against this church stands an hospital, erected by a shoe-maker, who has been beatified, though never fainted. Addison.

Playwright, convict of publick wrongs to men, Takes private beatings, and begins again. Ben Jonson.

BEATITUDE. n. f. [beatitudo, Lat.]

1. Blessedness; felicity; happiness: commonly used of the joys of heaven.

The end of that government, and of all men's aims, is agreed to be beatitude; that is, his being completely well. Digby.

This is the image and little representation of heaven; it is beatitude in picture. Taylor.

He set out the felicity of his heaven, by the delights of sense; slightly passing over the accomplishment of the soul, and the beatitude of that part which earth and visibilities too weakly affect. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

2. A declaration of blessedness made by our Saviour to particular virtues.

BEAU. n. f. [beau, Fr. It is founded like be, and has often the French plural beaux, founded as bois.] A man of dress; a man whose great care is to deck his person.

What will not beaux attempt to please the fair? Dryden.

The water nymphs are too unkind
To Vill'roy; are the land nymphs so?
And fly they all, at once combin'd

To shame a general, and a beau? Prior.

You will become the delight of nine ladies in ten, and the envy of ninety-nine beaux in a hundred. Swift.

BE'AVER. n. f. [bevere, French; fiber.]

1. An animal, otherwise named the castor, amphibious, and remarkable for his art in building his habitation; of which many wonderful accounts are delivered by travellers. His skin is very valuable on account of the fur.

The beaver being hunted, biteth off his stones, knowing that for them only his life is fought. Hakevill.

They placed this invention upon the beaver, for the sagacity and wisdom of that animal; indeed from its artifice in building. Brown's Vulgar Errors.

2. A hat of the best kind; so called from being made of the fur of beaver.

You see a smart rhetorician turning his hat, moulding it into different cocks, examining the lining and the button during his harangue: a deaf man

man would think he was cheapening a beaver, when he is talking of the fate of a nation. Addison.

The broker here his spacious beaver wears,
Upon his brow fit jealousies and cares. Gay.

3. The part of a helmet that covers the face. [bauiere, Fr.]

His dreadful hideous head
Close couched on the beaver, seem'd to throw,
From flaming mouth, bright sparkles fiery red. Spenser.

Big Mars seem'd bankrupt in their beggar'd host,
And faintly through a rusty beaver peeps. Shakesp.

He was slain upon a course at tilt, the splinters
Of the staff going in at his beaver. Bacon.

BEAVERED. adj. [from beaver.] Covered with a beaver; wearing a beaver.

His beaver'd brow a birchen garland bears,
Dropping with infant's blood, and mother's tears. Pope.

BEA'ISH. adj. [from beau.] Befitting a beau; foppish.

BEAU'TEOUS. adj. [from beauty.] Fair; elegant in form; pleasing to the sight; beautiful. This word is chiefly poetical.

I can, Petruccio, help thee to a wife,
With wealth enough, and young, and beauteous. Shakespeare.

Alas! not hoping to subdue,

I only to the flight aspir'd;

To keep the beauteous foe in view,

Was all the glory I desir'd. Prior.

BEAU'TEOUSLY. adv. [from beauteous.] In a beauteous manner; in a manner pleasing to the sight; beautifully.

Look upon pleasures not upon that side that is next the fun, or where they look beauteously; that is, as they come towards you to be enjoyed. Taylor.

BEAU'TEOUSNESS. n. f. [from beauteous.] The state or quality of being beauteous; beauty.

From less virtue, and less beauteousness,
The gentiles fram'd them gods and goddesses. Donne.

BEAU'TIFUL. adj. [from beauty and full.] Fair; having the qualities that constitute beauty.

He stole away and took by strong hand all the beautiful women in his time. Raleigh.

The most important part of painting, is to know what is most beautiful in nature, and most proper for that art; that which is the most beautiful, is the most noble subject: so, in poetry, tragedy is more beautiful than comedy, because the persons are greater whom the poet instructs, and consequently the instructions of more benefit to mankind. Dryden.

Beautiful looks are rul'd by fickle minds,
And summer seas are turn'd by sudden winds. Prior.

BEAU'TIFULLY. adv. [from beautiful.] In a beautiful manner.

No longer shall the boddice aptly lac'd,
From thy full bosom to thy slender waist,
That air and harmony of shape express,
Fine by degrees, and beautifully less. Prior.

BEAU'TIFULNESS. n. f. [from beautiful.] The quality of being beautiful; beauty; excellence of form.

To BEAU'TIFY. v. a. [from beauty.] To adorn;
to embellish; to deck; to grace; to add beauty to.

Never was sorrow more sweetly set forth; their faces seeming rather to beautify their sorrow, than their sorrow to cloud the beauty of their faces. Hayward.

Sufficeth not that we are brought to Rome,
To beautify thy triumphs and return,
Captive to thee and to thy Roman yoke? Shakesp.

These were not created to beautify the earth alone, but for the use of man and beast. Raleigh.

How all conspire to grace
Th' extended earth, and beautify her face. Blackmore.

There is charity and justice; and the one serves to heighten and beautify the other. Atterbury.

To BEAU'TIFY. v. n. To grow beautiful; to advance in beauty.

It must be a prospect pleasing to God himself,
to see his creation for ever beautifying in his eyes, and drawing nearer to him, by greater degrees of resemblance. Addison.

BEAU'TY. n. f. [beautē, Fr.]

1. That assemblage of graces, or proportion of parts, which pleases the eye.

Beauty consists of a certain composition of colour and figure, causing delight in the beholder. Locke.

Your beauty was the cause of that effect,
Your beauty, that did haunt me in my sleep.—

If I thought that, I tell thee, homicide,
These nails should rend that beauty from my cheeks. Shakespeare.

Beauty is best in a body that hath rather dignity of presence than beauty of aspect. The beautiful prove accomplished, but not of great spirit, and study for the most part rather behaviour than virtue. Bacon.

The best part of beauty is that which a picture cannot express. Bacon.

Of the beauty of the eye I shall say little, leaving that to poets and orators: that it is a very pleasant and lovely object to behold, if we consider the figure, colours, splendour of it, is the least I can say. Ray.

He view'd their twining branches with delight,
And prais'd the beauty of the pleasing sight. Pope.

2. A particular grace, feature, or ornament.
The ancient pieces are beautiful, because they resemble the beauties of nature; and nature will ever be beautiful, which resembles those beauties of antiquity. Dryden.

Wherever you place a patch, you destroy a beauty. Addison.

3. Any thing more eminently excellent than the rest of that with which it is united.

This gave me an occasion of looking backward on some beauties of my author in his former books. Dryden.

With incredible pains have I endeavoured to copy the several beauties of the ancient and modern historians. Arbutnot.

4. A beautiful person.
Remember that Pellean conquerour,
A youth, how all the beauties of the east
He slightly view'd, and slightly overpass'd. Milton.

What can thy ends, malicious beauty, be?
Can he, who kill'd thy brother, live for thee? Dryden.

To BEAU'TY. v. a. [from the noun.] To adorn;
to beautify; to embellish: not in use.

The harlot's cheek, beautied with platt'ring art,
Is not more ugly to the thing that helps it,
Than is my deed to your most painted word. Shakespeare.

BEAUTY-SPOT. n. f. [from beauty and spot.] A spot placed to direct the eye to something else, or to heighten some beauty; a foil; a patch.

The filthiness of swine makes them the beautyspot of the animal creation. Grew.

BECA'FO. n. f. [becafico, Span.] A bird like a nightingale, feeding on figs and grapes; a figpecker. Pineda.

The robin-redbreast, till of late, had rest,
And children sacred held a martin's nest;
Till becaficos fold so devilish dear,
To one that was, or would have been, a peer. Pope.

To BECA'LM. v. a. [from calm.] To calm;

1. To still the elements.
The moon shone clear on the becalm'd flood. Dry.

2. To keep a ship from motion.
A man becalm'd at sea, out of sight of land, in a fair day, may look on the sun, or sea, or ship, a whole hour, and perceive no motion. Locke.

3. To quiet the mind.
Soft whisp'ring airs, and the lark's matin song,
Then woo to musing, and becalm the mind
Perplex'd with irksome thoughts. Philips.

Banish his sorrows, and becalm his soul
With easy dreams. Addison.

Perhaps prosperity becalm'd his breast:
Perhaps the wind just shifted from the east. Pope.

4. To becalm and to calm differ in this, that to calm is to stop motion, and to becalm is to with-hold from motion.

BECA'ME. The preterite of become; which see.

BECA'USE. conjunct. [from by and cause.]

1. For this reason that; on this account that;

for this cause that. It makes the first part of an illative proposition either expressly or by implication, and is answered by therefore; as, I fled, because I was afraid; which is the same with, because I was afraid, therefore I fled.

How great soever the sins of any person are,
Christ died for him, because he died for all; and he died for those sins, because he died for all sins; only he must reform. Hammond.

Men do not so generally agree in the sense of these as of the other, because the interests, and lusts, and passions of men, are more concerned in the one than the other. Tillotson.

2. It has, in some sort, the force of a preposition;
but, because it is compounded of a noun, has of after it.

Infancy demands aliment, such as lengthens fibres without breaking, because of the state of accretion. Arbutnot.

To BECA'NCE. v. n. [from be and chance.] To befal; to happen to: a word proper, but now in little use.

My sons, God knows what has becanced them. Shakespeare.

All happiness became to thee at Milan. Shakesp.

BE'CHICKS. n. f. [bechicks, of bech, a cough.]
Medicines proper for relieving coughs. Diet.

To BECK. v. n. [beacn, Sax. bec. Fr. head.]
To make a sign with the head.

To BECK. v. a. To call or guide, as by a motion of the head.

Bell, book, and candle, shall not drive me back,
When gold and silver beck me to come on. Shakespeare.

Oh, this false soul of Egypt, this gay charm,
Whose eye beck'd forth my wars, and call'd them home. Shakespeare.

BECK. n. f. [from the verb.]
1. A sign with the head; a nod.

Hail thee, nymph, and bring with thee
Quips, and cranks, and wanton wiles,
Nods, and becks, and wreathed smiles. Milton.

2. A nod of command.
Neither the lusty kind shewed any roughness,
nor the easier any idleness; but still like a well-obeyed master, whose beck is enough for discipline. Sidney.

Then forthwith to him takes a chosen band
Of spirits, likest to himself in guile,
To be at hand, and at his beck appear. Milton.

The menial fair, that round her wait,
At Helen's beck prepare the room of state. Pope.

To BE'CKON. v. n. To make a sign without words.

Alexander beckoned with the hand, and would have made his defence unto the people. Acts. xix. 33.

When he had rais'd my thoughts by those transporting airs, he beckoned to me, and, by the waving of his hand, directed me to approach. Addison.

Sudden you mount! you beckon from the skies,
Clouds interpose, waves roar, and winds arise! Pope.

To BE'CKON. v. a. [from beck, or beacn, Sax.
a sign.] To make a sign to.

With her two crooked hands she signs did make,
And beckon'd him. Fairy Queen.

It beckons you to go away with it,
As if it some impartment did desire

To you alone. Shakespeare.

With this his distant friends he beckons near,
Provokes their duty, and prevents their fear. Dryden.

To BE'CLIP. v. a. [of be clyppan, Sax.] To embrace.

To BECO'ME. v. n. pret. I became; comp. pret.
I have become. [from by and come.]

1. To enter into some state or condition, by a change from some other.

The Lord God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and man became a living soul. Gen. ii. 7.

And unto the Jews I became a Jew, that I might gain the Jews. 1 Cor. ix. 20.

A smaller pear, grafted upon a stock that beareth a greater pear, will become great. Bacon.

My

B E C

My voice thou oft hast heard, and hast not fear'd,
But still rejoic'd; how is it now become
So dreadful to thee? Milton.

So the least faults, if mix'd with fairest deed,
Of future ill become the fatal feed. Prior.

2. To become of. To be the fate of; to be the end of; to be the subsequent or final condition of.
It is observable, that this word is never, or very feldom, used but with what, either indefinite or interrogative.

What is then become of so huge a multitude, as would have overspread a great part of the continent. Raleigh.

Perplex'd with thoughts, what would become
Of me and all mankind. Milton.

The first hints of the circulation of the blood were taken from a common person's wondering what became of all the blood which issued out of the heart. Graunt.

What will become of me then? for when he is free,
he will infallibly accuse me. Dryden.

What became of this thoughtful busy creature,
